RAYMOND v. GLOVER et al. (L. A. 1,282.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1904.)

APPEAL—DECISION—LAW OF THE CASE—SUBSEQUENT APPEAL—FINDINGS—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. Where, on a prior appeal, the appellate court held that there was such a substantial conflict in the evidence as to preclude it from disturbing the finding of the trial court that defendant bank purchased a note secured by mortgage from plaintiff's agent, which in fact belonged to plaintiff, with notice of plaintiff's right, but the judgment was reversed on another ground, such decision was conclusive on a subsequent appeal, and precluded the Supreme Court from reversing a contrary finding on identically the same evidence on a retrial of the case.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by Ellen D. Raymond against Sarah J. Glover and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant savings bank, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank James and Lee & Scott, for appellant. Walter Bordwell and Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain a decree that a certain note and mortgage were held by the defendant the German-American Savings Bank as trustee for her, or, in lieu thereof, have a decree establishing a vendor's lien in her favor upon the lands described in said mortgage. This is the third time this cause has been here on appeal. Upon both the former appeals, which were taken by the defendant bank from a decree in favor of plaintiff, the cause was remanded, with the same directions to the court below "to find whether or not the bank took the note as security without notice of the facts showing the equities in favor of the plaintiff. This fact may be found upon the evidence already taken, with such further evidence as the parties may see fit to submit. If the court finds that the appellant took the note as security without notice of the facts showing such equities, judgment should be rendered giving to the appellant (the bank) a first lien upon the property for the amount of its claim, and to the plaintiff a second lien thereon to the extent of thirteen hundred dollars and interest, as provided in the contract of sale." Raymond v. Glover, 37 Pac. 772, 918; Raymond v. Glover, 122 Cal. 477, 55 Pac. 398. Upon the last trial of this case in the court below, out of which the present appeal arises, the cause was submitted upon the testimony taken at the two previous trials and the additional testimony of one M. N. Avery, cashier of the defendant bank, a witness called in its behalf, and the court found that the defendant bank took the note and mortgage in good faith, as security from one Munroe, without notice of any of the facts showing equities in favor of the plaintiff, and pursuant to the direction of the court, on remanding the cause, as to the decree which should be entered upon such a finding, entered one in favor of the defendant bank. The plaintiff now appeals from an order denying her motion for a new trial, which motion was based solely upon alleged insufficiency of the evidence to justify this finding; and by stipulation the bill of exceptions used on the appeal disposed of in 122 Cal., 55 Pac., above referred to, which contains all the evidence adduced on the first and second trials, together with the evidence of the witness Avery taken at the last trial, constitutes the statement on motion for a new trial, upon which the validity of such order is to be determined on this present hearing.

*Rehearing denied September 30, 1904.

The facts, as disclosed by the record, are recited at considerable detail in the previous opinions referred to, particularly in 37 Pac. 772, and stated generally here are that plaintiff, in July, 1891, then a resident of the state of Massachusetts, owned a tract of land in Los Angeles county, this state. She had as her agent in Los Angeles one George Munroe, who, in her behalf, contracted a sale of the premises to the defendants Glover for $1,800; the sum of $500 to be paid in cash, the balance to be secured by mortgage on the property, to be executed by the Glovers in favor of plaintiff. On January 22, 1892, plaintiff acknowledged and forwarded to her agent, Munroe, a deed in favor of the Glovers, to be delivered on payment of the cash and execution in her favor by them of a note and mortgage for the balance of the contract price. Munroe, without authority, and fraudulently, inserted his own name as payee in the note, and as mortgagee in the mortgage, both of which instruments were dated February 11, 1892, and these the Glovers, deceived by him, and supposing that the papers ran to plaintiff, executed without reading, and paid the $500. About February 22, 1892, Munroe took the note and mortgage to the respondent bank, and applied for a loan of $1,000 thereon, which was made to him, the aforesaid note and mortgage being tendered to and accepted by the bank as collateral security for the loan. These facts are practically conceded as correctly presenting the general situation, and are supplemented by considerable evidence offered on the part of both plaintiff and defendant bank, bearing upon the sole question involved in the case, namely, whether the assignment of the note and mortgage so made was taken by the latter with notice of the facts showing the equities of the plaintiff. We will not particularly refer to or analyze this evidence, because, in the view we take of this case, it is unnecessary. Aside from the evidence which was before this court upon the previous appeals, and particularly the appeal disposed of in 122 Cal., 55 Pac., the only additional testimony now presented is that of the witness Avery, the cashier of the bank, who negotiated the loan to Munroe, and who testified that he never heard Munroe state to one U. S. Glover, before he took the assignment of the mortgage, that he (Munroe) had bought the mortgage in suit from plaintiff; nor did he know that plaintiff had anything to do with it, or any interest in the mortgage, until the trial of this action. This was offered in contradiction of the statement of Munroe, who had theretofore testified for plaintiff on these matters. And when this testimony of Avery upon the last trial is compared with his testimony given on the former trial, it will be found to be substantially a reiteration of such former testimony. So that for all practical purposes the evidence under which the present finding is attacked is in all respects identically the same as was before this court for consideration upon the last previous appeal. Upon that appeal, which was taken by the defendant bank, and wherein it assailed the finding then made against it that it had taken the note and mortgage in question with notice of the equities of plaintiff, the plaintiff (respondent on that appeal), in support of such finding, and upon identically the same evidence upon which it is contended for now, claimed that such evidence showed both constructive and actual notice to the bank. Particular stress was not given to the claim of actual notice, but it was elaborately and insistently argued that proof of constructive notice clearly appeared. In disposing of that appeal (122 Cal. 475, 55 Pac. 399) the court, in considering the sufficiency of the evidence (either as showing constructive or actual notice) to support the finding, set forth certain portions of it, and then said: "We think this evidence, taken together, was sufficient, if believed by the court, to warrant it in finding that the defendant bank was put upon inquiry, and, having failed to probe the facts, was, as a matter of fact, to be deemed as taking the mortgage with notice. In other words, that there was such a substantial conflict in the evidence as to preclude us from disturbing the finding of the court that appellant took the mortgage with notice of the equities in favor of plaintiff. The court below was the judge of the credit to be given to the several witnesses, and we cannot disturb its conclusions in the premises except in case of patent error." We think this conclusion of the court that there was such a substantial conflict in the evidence presented on the former appeal as not to warrant disturbing the finding of the lower court then under review is controlling in the disposition of this appeal. The same substantial conflict exists now as was found to exist then. It is of no moment that the present inquiry involves the sufficiency of the evidence as to a finding diametrically opposite to the finding then under consideration. The evidence was addressed to the same particular issue upon both the latter trials, which was, whether the bank did or did not take with notice, and this was the only matter upon which the substantial conflict occurred. The conflict which, if found to exist, precludes the appellate court from interfering with a particular finding is such a substantial and material variance in the evidence adduced upon both sides of a litigated question of fact as will sustain the determination of the lower court, no matter which way it may find therefrom. Unless the evidence presents this condition, it cannot be said to be substantially conflicting. So that to say that a finding cannot be disturbed because the evidence to sustain it as found is substantially conflicting is also to say that, if the finding was the other way, the same substantial conflict would equally preclude its disturbance by the appellate court. And this is the condition of this case on the appeal which we now have before us. The evidence is identically the same as came before the court on the former appeal as affecting the finding of notice, and which was decided to be conflicting. In the absence of any additional evidence strengthening or affecting the case, the judicial declaration that was then made that it was so substantially conflicting is, in our opinion, decisive of the point presented on this present appeal. It is true that on the former appeal there was a reversal, and the cause remanded for a new trial solely upon this issue. It was reversed, however, because the lower court failed to rule upon an objection of the bank to the admissibility of certain evidence which the court provisionally admitted, reserving a ruling on the objection, which it, however, omitted to finally make, and the effect of which failure to rule as to whether the evidence was to be definitely admitted and considered by the court or not was to afford no opportunity to the bank to rebut the evidence, if it could, and was so advised. This, however, only afforded an additional opportunity for the presentation of further evidence in the case. The decision on this point did not affect the other decision of the court that from all the evidence, taken together, as then presented, there was a substantial conflict in it. Neither, as a matter of fact, did any change in the evidence upon the last trial spring from the ruling under which the case was reversed. Whatever privileges this ruling accorded were not availed of by either side, and the record now contains exactly the same evidence as was presented and considered upon the former appeal.

Under these circumstances, then, there is nothing in the record on this appeal which presents a different condition for examination as to the only point litigated upon both trials than was presented on the former appeal, to which we have been addressing ourselves. And, as upon such former appeal, upon exactly the same evidence as is presented for consideration now, it was then held that that evidence was so substantially conflicting upon the matter as to whether the bank did or did not take the note and mortgage in question with notice that this court could not disturb a finding thereon made, we are of the opinion that the decision upon the former appeal in this point must be held controlling upon the present appeal, where the sufficiency of the present finding attacked is to be examined under the same conflicting evidence.

The order denying a new trial is for that reason affirmed.

¶ 1. See Limitation of Actions, vol. 33, Cent. Dig. § 652.

A. Dworack and Mary Dworack appeal from the judgment.

Under our views of the case, it is not necessary to state the facts with much detail, or to consider all the points made by appellants. The facts material for the purposes of this decision are these: On March 4, 1893, defendant Charles Dworack, being the owner of the land here involved, mortgaged it to one Roberts as security for $3,000, which said Charles then owed Roberts. Afterwards, on January 10, 1894, he made a second mortgage of the premises to his mother, the defendant Mary Dworack, to secure the sum of $8,500. Afterwards Roberts commenced an action to foreclose his mortgage. During the pendency of that action, Charles Dworack made to his mother a deed purporting to convey the land to her. Afterwards the action of Roberts resulted in a decree of foreclosure, under which the land was sold to Roberts for $3,515, and he received a certificate of sale. This decree and sale were regular and valid, and no question is raised as to any of the proceedings on the foreclosure. But during the period of redemption the defendant Mary Dworack, being desirous of redeeming from the sale, procured from plaintiff, for the purpose of making the redemption, a loan of $3,750, and with this money she did accomplish the redemption. At the time of this redemption said Mary executed a certain written instrument, designated as "Exhibit E," dated February 18, 1895, to one Moultrie, who took the same for the benefit of plaintiff, and afterwards, and before the commencement of this action, assigned the same to plaintiff. By this instrument the said Mary did "grant, bargain, sell, assign, transfer, and set over" to Moultrie "all my right as redemptioner or otherwise by reason of the redemption this day made by me"; also "all sums of money of every kind, character, and description which may at any time become due or owing to me from said sheriff, or otherwise, in the event said property be at any time redeemed by any other person or persons." By this instrument she also authorized and empowered Moultrie in her name to take all steps necessary to protect his interest, and, in the event that no other redemption be effected, to obtain from the sheriff "a deed to said property in pursuance of the redemption so made and effected by me, as aforesaid." This instrument is, on its face, an absolute assignment and grant of all her interest, and gives no intimation that it is only a mortgage or lien of any kind, and contains no reference to any sum of money, and no promise to pay any money. But plaintiff alleges that it was intended as a lien to secure the payment of the said money loaned said Mary to effect the redemption, and asks to have it foreclosed as a mortgage; and the court found, upon parol evidence, that this allegation was true, and rendered judgment accordingly. Before the commencement of this action, the defendant Bank of Madera, who was the creditor of Charles Dworack, had acquired the title of Charles and Mary Dworack to the premises, although with knowledge of the foregoing facts. This action was not commenced until more than three years after the loan of the said money by plaintiff to Mary Dworack and after the execution of said Exhibit E, although within four years thereafter.

Appellants contend that the instrument does not constitute a mortgage; that at most it either merely assigned her interest as a "redemptioner" under section 701, Code Civ. Proc., which gave the assignee only a right to a sheriff's deed in the event of no subsequent redemption, or else that her right as a redemptioner merged in the legal title which she held under the deed from Charles, and thus, being a successor in interest of the judgment creditor, she, or plaintiff as her successor, was simply restored to the estate. But under our views this point, and certain other points made by appellants, need not be considered. We will assume, for the purpose of this decision, that said instrument together with the parol evidence constituted a mortgage; and so assuming, nevertheless, in our opinion, the mortgage was extinguished at the time of the commencement of this action, and appellants' plea of the two years' provision of the statute of limitations should have been sustained. We are not concerned here with the statute of limitations as applicable to an instrument similar in its character to that which used to be called a "dry" mortgage—that is, where the mortgagor incurred no personal liability, where there was no debt in the sense of an obligation that could be enforced, and where the mortgagor had merely the right to remove the lien by payment of a certain sum of money within a certain time, but could not be compelled to do so. In the case at bar it was averred in the complaint that plaintiff advanced "and loaned" to said Mary the said sum of $3,750; that Exhibit E was made to plaintiff "to secure it in the repayment" of said money, and to "secure the payment by her to it of usual banking interest thereon"; that she has never repaid the plaintiff any part of said money, "and the whole thereof, principal and interest, is still due, owing, and unpaid from her to plaintiff," and the prayer of the complaint is that it be adjudged that "said Mary Dworack is justly indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $3,750 and interest," etc.; that the mortgaged premises be sold, and the proceeds applied to the satisfaction of the amount found due; and that plaintiff "have judgment and execution against said Mary Dworack for whatever deficiency may remain after applying all the proceeds of said sale," etc.; and the court rendered judgment in accordance with this prayer. The fact that afterwards plaintiff filed what he calls a "remitter" of the deficiency judgment is immaterial. We have here, therefore, the ordinary case of a mortgage given to secure a debt; and as the debt in this case rests merely in parol, and not upon a written instrument, it was barred by lapse of time in two years, and being thus barred the lien of the mortgage sued on was "extinguished" at the time of the commencement of this action. Civ. Code, § 2911.

We have not overlooked the authorities cited by respondent, and have examined many others on the subject. There are decisions in which it has been held, in the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, that the bar of a debt by limitation is not such a "discharge" thereof as will bar a mortgage securing it. It may be that the general law on the subject is correctly stated in Jones on Mortgages (section 899), as follows: "The rule that a discharge of a debt is a discharge of the mortgage has no application where the debt is merely discharged by the statute of limitations, or by discharge in bankruptcy." But section 2911, Civ. Code, provides as follows: "A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation." This language precludes the construction that the bar of the statute of limitations is not a discharge within the rule, and is an answer to the case of Union Water Company v. Murphy's Flat F. Co., 22 Cal. 621, and other cases cited by respondent; although it may be said that in the Union Water Company's case there was no personal liability. In the first part of the opinion in Newhall v. Sherman & Clay, 124 Cal. 509, 57 Pac. 387, there is some language relied on by respondent which was not necessary to the decision of the case. In that case the action on the mortgage was barred by the four years' limitation, and no other question was involved. But in the latter part of the opinion it is said that "whether plaintiff's cause of action is barred depends upon when the money loaned, for which the mortgage was given as security, was due and payable. It not appearing * * * that any time was given or fixed for the payment of the loan, 'the presumption would therefore necessarily arise that it was due immediately or upon demand, and therefore was barred at the time this action was commenced,' and that the debt secured by the mortgage being barred, it necessarily follows that the mortgage is also barred." Citing numerous California cases, and section 2911, Civ. Code. The "principal obligation" in the case at bar was clearly the indebtedness, and as it was not founded on a written promise, an action on it was barred in two years after it accrued. Indeed, the asserted mortgage itself rested only in parol. The written assignment or grant was only one link in the chain which was relied upon to sustain the action. The conclusion here reached may work a hardship on plaintiff; but such a result does sometime follow a neglect to keep within the statute of limitations, which upon the whole is a beneficial law.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

McCARTHY v. GASTON RIDGE MILL & MIN. CO. (Sac. 1,077.)

NUISANCES — WATER COURSE — POLLUTION — VOLUNTARY ABATEMENT — EFFECT — COSTS—DISCRETION — EQUITY JURISDICTION—SUPERIOR COURT—VERDICT—VACATION—DAMAGES —ASSESSMENT BY COURT.

1. Where defendant polluted water of a creek by throwing refuse mineral matter therein so that the water used by plaintiff was offensive and unwholesome, such act constituted a nuisance, within Code Civ. Proc. § 731, providing that anything which is injurious to health, or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the enjoyment of life or property, is a nuisance.

2. A suit for the abatement of a nuisance by an injunction, either prohibitive or mandatory, is within the equitable jurisdiction of the superior court, under the direct provisions of the Constitution.

3. Since in a suit to abate a nuisance the recovery of damages constitutes incidental relief only, and the defendant is not entitled to have such damages assessed by a jury as a matter of right, it was not error for the court to refuse to accept a verdict on the issue of damages in such an action on the ground that the verdict was not in accordance with the evidence, and to itself make a finding of damages.

4. The fact that at the time the court rendered its decision the nuisance had been voluntarily abated by defendant, by reason of which fact plaintiff's application for injunction was denied, did not deprive the court of jurisdiction to assess damages, since the action did not cease to be one for the abatement of a nuisance within the court's equitable jurisdiction because of such voluntary abatement.

5. A suit for the abatement of a nuisance and for damages is an action not mentioned in Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, prescribing actions in which costs are allowed of course to a successful plaintiff, and hence costs may be allowed therein in the discretion of the court, as authorized by section 1025.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilon, Judge.

Action by John McCarthy against the Gaston Ridge Mill & Mining Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Page, McCutchen, Harding & Knight, for appellant. J. M. Walling, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. The plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land in the county of Nevada, which he has occupied as his residence and cultivated for many years, irrigating it by means of water brought thither from the South Fork of Poorman's creek, through a ditch of which he is also the owner. The defendant, since January, 1900, has been engaged in mining and milling in that county, and has constructed a ditch through which sand and refuse matter have been carried from its works and discharged into said fork of Poorman's creek above the head of the plaintiff's ditch, and thence into and through said ditch upon the lands of the plaintiff. In his complaint herein the plaintiff alleges that by reason of these acts of the defendant the waters flowing through his ditch are rendered offensive to the smell, unwholesome, and so polluted as to be unfit for watering his stock, and that the sand caused to be deposited upon his land is injurious to it, and, if continued, will render it unfit for cultivation. He therefore asked that the defendant be enjoined from further committing said acts, and that he recover judgment for the damages already sustained therefrom. The action was commenced February 13, 1901, and on June 15th the defendant answered the complaint. The cause came on for trial October 17, 1901, and special issues as to the amount of damage sustained by the plaintiff were submitted to the jury. The jury found that the plaintiff had not sustained any damage, but the court refused to accept their verdict. After this verdict had been given, the defendant filed a supplemental answer November 16, 1901, alleging that since the commencement of the action defendant had constructed a ditch from its mine and mill to a point in said South Fork of Poorman's creek below the head of the plaintiff's ditch, into which it had, since its completion, discharged all the water used by it in the operation of its mine and mill that could in any way pollute or affect the waters flowing upon the plaintiff's land. Thereafter, January 8, 1902, the court rendered its decision, and found: "That since the 27th day of January, 1900, and until about the 18th day of October, 1901, the defendant had caused sand and tailings from its quartz mill to flow down into the South Fork of Poorman creek at a point on said stream above the head of plaintiff's ditch, and thence into and through said ditch upon the cultivated lands of plaintiff, and also filling the ditches of plaintiff with sand and débris, and contaminating the waters of plaintiff, and rendering said waters unfit for watering stock, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of fifty dollars. That since the commencement of this action plaintiff has constructed a ditch in such manner and of such capacity as to carry the sand and débris from its mill to said South Fork of Poorman creek and deposit the same in said creek at a point below the head of plaintiff's ditch, where the same will not injure plaintiff." Upon the facts found by it the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover judgment against the defendant for the sum of $50 for the damage sustained by its acts, and his costs expounded in the action, amounting to $137.50, but denied his application for an injunction. Judgment accordingly was thereupon entered. The defendant has appealed therefrom, bringing the appeal here upon the judgment roll, without any bill of exceptions, and presents as grounds for its reversal that the court erred in disregarding the verdict of the jury and awarding damages to the plaintiff, and also in allowing the plaintiff to recover his costs of suit. In support of its appeal the appellant contends that the complaint of the plaintiff presents merely an action at law, which it was entitled to have determined by a jury, and that, as the plaintiff recovered less than $300 damages, he is not entitled to recover his costs.

The action is one for the abatement of a nuisance and to recover damages sustained from its maintenance. The facts alleged in the complaint as the grounds for the action, and found by the court to be true, constituted a nuisance, and created a cause of action in his behalf, entitling him to a judgment for the damages sustained by him, and that the nuisance be enjoined or abated. Code Civ. Proc. § 731. The Constitution has conferred upon the superior court original jurisdiction "in all cases in equity," and also "of actions to prevent or abate a nuisance." If the plaintiff would merely seek judgment for the damages sustained by him his action may be brought either in the superior court or in the justices' court, according to the amount of damage claimed by him. If he would seek the abatement or prevention of the nuisance, he can bring his action only in the superior court. Such action may be maintained in that court whether he seeks in addition thereto to recover damages in excess of $300, or even if no damages are claimed. Whether the jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain the action is referred to the clause in the constitution giving it jurisdiction "in all cases in equity," or to the clause giving it jurisdiction "of actions to prevent or abate a nuisance" is immaterial. The prevention or abatement of a nuisance is to be accomplished by means of an injunction either prohibitive or mandatory, and an action therefor is within the equitable jurisdiction of the court, and is to be governed by the principles prevailing in that jurisdiction. Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 Pac. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51; Richardson v. City of Eureka, 110 Cal. 441, 42 Pac. 965. The Constitution does not give to a party the right to have the issues in such action tried by a jury, nor is the action within those in which the Legislature has authorized a jury trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 592. The prayer for damages is incidental to the relief sought (Hudson v. Doyle, 6 Cal. 102; Courtright v. Bear R. W. & M. Co., 30 Cal. 576), and, as the action is properly brought in a court of equity, it will determine all the issues in the case (McLaughlin v. Del Re, 64 Cal. 474, 2 Pac. 244). The court may call in a jury, and ask for its judgment upon one or more issues of fact, but the verdict of the jury is merely advisory, and may be disregarded by the court. Sweetser v. Dobbins, 65 Cal. 529, 4 Pac. 540. The evidence upon the issues submitted to the jury is not in the record, and, as the appellant is not questioning its sufficiency to sustain the finding of the court, we must assume that the court was justified in disregarding the verdict of the jury and making its finding in accordance with the evidence upon that issue.

In support of its claim that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover his costs the appellant has cited Himes v. Johnson, 61 Cal. 259, and Brown v. Delavau, 63 Cal. 303. These actions were to recover damages for trespass to real property, in one of which the plaintiff failed to show that he had ever had any right to equitable relief, and in the other abandoned such claim. It was held that the mere fact that he had asked for relief in equity in addition to seeking to recover damages did not entitle him to recover the costs of his suit; that in such a case the action is to be regarded merely as an action for damages. These decisions are, therefore, inapplicable to a case where the plaintiff, in addition to asking for relief in equity, has shown his right to such relief, and the court has made a finding of fact showing that he was entitled thereto.

In the present case the direct purpose of the action was to abate the nuisance, and the damages sought were merely incidental thereto. The court has found that at the commencement of the action the defendant was maintaining the nuisance complained of, and that it continued to maintain it until a time subsequent to the submission of the issues to the jury. It has also found that after the commencement of the action the defendant constructed a ditch for the purpose of diverting the flow of water in a different direction, and that thereby it had ceased to pollute the plaintiff's land. As the nuisance had been abated at the time the court rendered its decision, the occasion for an order for its abatement had ceased, and for that reason it was proper to deny the plaintiff's application for an injunction. The suggestion of the appellant that the reason why the court did not grant the injunction is not open to investigation is untenable. The finding of the court that at the commencement of the action the defendant was maintaining a nuisance, and that it continued to maintain it until after the cause had been tried, and that the plaintiff had thereby sustained damage, gave him the right to a judgment for its abatement. The omission to give such judgment is explained only by the finding of the court that the defendant had itself abated the nuisance before the judgment was rendered. The action did not cease to be an action for the abatement of a nuisance, and within the equitable jurisdiction of the court, because, after its commencement, the defendant, of its own motion, caused its abatement. It was, therefore, one of the "other actions than those mentioned in section 1022," in which, under section 1025, Code Civ. Proc., costs may be allowed or not, in the discretion of the court.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SCHNITTGER v. OLD HOME CONSOL. MIN. CO. et al. (Sac. 1,239.)

CORPORATIONS—ACTS OF DIRECTORS—VOTING—EFFECT OF INTEREST—INFORMATION—DUTY TO DISCLOSE—INTENT.

1. A loan of money by directors of a corporation to the corporation, while voidable at the instance of the beneficiary for any violation of the directors' duties as trustees, is not ipso facto void.

2. Where a proposition to borrow money from certain directors of a corporation was carried by sufficient votes of other members of the board of directors to render the same valid without the votes of the lending directors, the fact that such lending directors were present at the meeting and voted for the transaction did not invalidate the same.

3. That directors of a corporation loaning money to it did not disclose to the other members of the board of directors the fact that they were the real parties who were loaning the money, or that the person in whose name the transaction was had was merely a figurehead, did not invalidate it, in the absence of a showing that the corporation sustained some loss by reason thereof, or that the loaning directors thereby obtained an undue advantage over the corporation.

4. That directors of a corporation, in making a loan to it, did so for the purpose of bringing suit to foreclose the mortgage securing it, and finally acquiring the title to the property of the corporation, in violation of their trust, was immaterial, the corporation having retained the benefit of the loan; since such directors could only purchase at public sale under a decree of foreclosure, the same as other stockholders or third persons.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; F. T. Nilon, Judge.

Action by F. Schnittger against the Old Home Consolidated Mining Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Robt. Ash, for appellants. F. J. Castelhun, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. The Old Home Consolidated Mining Company is a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and having a board of five directors, who, at the times herein considered, were John McKewen, George T. Emery, Walter McG. Logan, F. Hahn, and C. W. Weld. August 16, 1897, it executed to the plaintiff's assignor its prom-issory note for $5,000, payable two years thereafter, with interest at the rate of 1 per cent. a month, and at the same time, for the purpose of securing its payment, executed a mortgage upon certain mining property within this state. The promissory note was also indorsed by each of its directors. The execution of the mortgage was duly authorized by a vote of more than two-thirds of its stockholders at a meeting called for that purpose. Prior to its maturity the note was assigned to the plaintiff. Interest on the note was paid by the corporation up to August 16, 1901. October 8, 1901, the present action was brought against the corporation and C. W. Weld and Walter McG. Logan, two of the indorsers, to recover the amount of the note, and for a foreclosure of the mortgage. The action was defended upon the ground that the money for which the promissory note was given and the mortgage executed was the money of and furnished by the directors Hahn and McKewen; that they are the real parties in interest in the transaction, and that they entered into it for the purpose of foreclosing the mortgage and obtaining the property of the corporation; that in so doing they violated their duties as trustees, and that for this reason the note and mortgage was void.

Upon the trial of the cause the court found that the corporation defendant had received the $5,000 for which its promissory note and mortgage had been executed, and that the transaction was thereafter ratified by the vote of more than two-thirds of its stockholders; that the money loaned to it was in fact the money of the directors Hahn and McKewen, and that they are the real parties in interest in the note and mortgage; that the note was made in the name of Helene Mayer; that the note and mortgage were given to and in her name with the purpose and object on the part of said Hahn and McKewen to obtain control of the property of the corporation; that the assignment from her to the plaintiff herein was not a bona fide transaction; that the name of the plaintiff was inserted in said assignment in order to cover up the interest of said Hahn and McKewen, and to give it the appearance of an actual bona fide transaction; that at the meeting of the board of directors of the defendant corporation at which the loan was authorized all of the directors were present, and that Hahn and McKewen participated therein; that at that meeting it was stated to the board by the attorney of Helene Mayer that the loan could be obtained from her, and that the directors other than Hahn and McKewen believed that the money would be furnished by her; that Hahn and McKewen did not at that meeting or at any other time state from whom the loan was to be obtained. The court also found that interest had been paid upon the note up to August 16, 1901, and that since that date no interest had been paid, and held that the plaintiff is entitled to no further interest. Upon these findings the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendants for the sum of $5,000, without any interest thereon, together with $300 as counsel fees, and $100 for costs of receiver, and for a decree of foreclosure against the defendant corporation, and sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy said amount. From the judgment thus entered the defendants have appealed upon the judgment roll alone without any bill of exceptions.

The appellants do not question the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court, or claim that the evidence before the court would have authorized any further or different findings, but urge in support of their appeal that, as Hahn and McKewen were directors of the corporation defendant, their relation to the corporation and to its stockholders was that of trustees, and that by virtue of that relation the transaction in which the loan was made to the corporation was void. A director of a corporation, like any other trustee, is bound to act in the utmost good faith toward his beneficiary (Civ. Code, § 2228), and is forbidden to take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he has an interest adverse to that of his beneficiary (Civ. Code, § 2230); but he is not absolutely precluded from dealing directly with the corporation of which he is a director. Any transaction between them is subject to rigid scrutiny, and is voidable at the instance of the beneficiary for any violation of his duty as trustee, but is not ipso facto void. "The mere fact that the creditor was a director of the company does not render the transaction fraudulent. There is nothing which forbids either members or directors of a corporation from making contracts with it like any other individual, and when the contract is made the director stands as to the contract in the relation of a stranger to the corporation." Stratton v. Allen, 16 N. J. Eq. 229. Mr. Thompson says (3 Thompson on Corp. § 2068): "We therefore find the prevailing doctrine to be that the director of a corporation may advance money to it, may become its creditor, may take from it a mortgage or other security, and may enforce the same like any other creditor; but always subject to severe scrutiny, and under the obligation of acting in the utmost good faith." See, also, Taylor on Corp. § 634; Twin Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587, 23 L. Ed. 328; Beach v. Miller, 130 Ill. 162, 22 N. E. 464, 17 Am. St. Rep. 291; Santa Cruz R. R. Co. v. Spreckles, 65 Cal. 193, 3 Pac. 661, 802; Sutter St. R. R. Co. v. Baum, 66 Cal. 44, 4 Pac. 916; Pauly v. Pauly, 107 Cal. 8, 40 Pac. 29, 48 Am. St. Rep. 98; Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 431, 62 Pac. 749.

The question presented upon this appeal does not involve the validity of a transaction in which the director of a corporation has executed a contract on behalf of the corporation in which he is personally interested, without any previous authority of the corporation, or where the resolution authorizing its execution depended upon his vote therefor. The transaction was had under the authority of the corporation, given at a meeting of the board of directors, at which all were present; and, although the court finds that at that meeting Hahn and McKewen "were present and participated therein," it does not find that they voted upon the proposition for the loan. But, even if they had voted for it, the transaction would not have been thereby vitiated, inasmuch as the votes of the other three members of the board were sufficient to make the resolution effective. Porter v. Lassen Co., etc., Co., 127 Cal. 261, 59 Pac. 563. It was not a fraud upon the corporation, or upon the other members of the board, for these directors not to disclose the fact that they were the real parties who were loaning the money, or that the person in whose name the transaction was had was merely a figurehead. It was no violation of their duty as trustee to loan the money in the name of another rather than in their own, unless it could be shown that thereby the corporation sustained some detriment, or they obtained some undue advantage over the corporation.

The allegation in the answer that Hahn and McKewen procured the loan to be made in the name of Helene Mayer "for the sole purpose at that time to bring suit to foreclose said mortgage, and finally acquire the title to the mining property of said corporation, in violation of their trust," is not found by the court to be a fact, and it must be assumed that there was no evidence tending to establish that allegation. The finding that the money was loaned and the note and mortgage given in her name "with the purpose and object on the part of said Hahn and McKewen, and both of them, of obtaining control of the property of said corporation," does not entitle the corporation to avoid its agreement and retain the money. Whatever may have been the underlying motive for entertaining this purpose, the corporation was in no respect injured thereby. They could obtain control of the mortgaged property only through a sale at public auction under a decree of foreclosure. If they should become the purchasers at such sale, the property would still be subject to redemption either by the corporation, or, in its behalf, by any of its stockholders. Wright v. Oroville M. Co., 40 Cal. 20. The transaction was not concealed from the stockholders. The resolution authorizing it was spread upon the records of the corporation. Hahn and McKewen, as well as the other directors, indorsed the note, and the note and mortgage were recorded in the county recorder's office, and thereafter the stockholders ratified the transaction.

The judgment should be affirmed.

The notice of appeal also purports to include an appeal from an order of the court made after the judgment ordering a sale of the property mortgaged, but, as the record contains no bill of exceptions in which this action of the court is presented, the order appealed from should also be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

HOLTUM v. GREIF, County Clerk, et al.

NEW TRIAL—CONDITIONAL ORDER—JUDGMENT FOR COSTS OF TRIAL—REVOCATION—POWER OF COURT — WRIT OF EXECUTION — ISSUANCE—DUTY OF JUDGE—CLERK—MANDAMUS—REMEDY BY APPEAL—STATUTE.

1. Where a new trial is granted on condition that the defendant pay to the plaintiff the costs of trial, a subsequent order of the trial court making the previous order absolute, on refusal of plaintiff to accept the amount because of intention to appeal therefrom, is void.

2. An order granting a new trial on condition that the defendant pay the costs of trial, without a specification of the time for payment, requires payment of the amount on demand.

3. An order granting a new trial was made on condition that defendant pay to plaintiff the costs of trial. Plaintiff refused to accept the sum when tendered, and appealed. The order was affirmed, and thereafter the plaintiff demanded payment, which was refused by defendant on the ground that no payment was due. Held, that the refusal to pay converted the order into a refusal of a new trial, finally disposing of the motion, and leaving the judgment in full force.

4. Notwithstanding the refusal of defendant to pay the amount of a money judgment for costs of trial on demand, as required by a conditional order granting a new trial, and thus converting the conditional order into the absolute refusal of a new trial, and leaving the judgment in full force, the duty of the clerk to issue execution thereon is not so plain as to warrant the granting of a writ of mandamus against him to compel him to issue the execution.

5. The remedy by appeal from an order overruling plaintiff's motion for execution is not such a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, as will prevent the issuance of a writ of mandamus against the judge of the court to compel the issuance of execution, where the result of a reversal of the order would merely confirm the petitioner's already complete right to execution.

Angellotti, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Application by Ferdinand Holtum, administrator of the estate of Karie Holtum, deceased, for writ of mandamus against John J. Greif, county clerk, and Hon. John Hunt, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ granted as to judge, and proceeding dismissed as to clerk.

M. T. Moses, for applicant. G. W. Baker (Thos. V. Cator, of counsel), for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a petition for a writ of mandate requiring the defendants to issue execution upon a judgment. The petitioner, in an action in the superior court, of which the defendants are, respectively, the judge and clerk, recovered a money judgment, with costs. March 12, 1900, on motion of defendant in that action, the court made and filed a written decision directing the entry of an order granting a new trial, "upon condition that the defendant, the Germania Life Insurance Company of New York, pay to the plaintiff, Ferdinand Holtum, the sum of one hundred and fifty-four dollars ($154.00) costs of trial" within 30 days from that date. The order, as entered on the court minutes, stated the condition as indicated by the quotation marks, and omitted the words italicized, limiting the time for performance. The defendant, however, on the 9th day of April, and within the 30 days, duly tendered the proper amount to the plaintiff's attorney, who declined to accept it for the reason that he intended to appeal from the order. The next day, and upon proof of said tender and refusal and the reason therefor, the court made and entered the following order ex parte: "Tuesday, April 10, 1900. In this action, upon motion of G. W. Baker, attorney for the defendant, and it being made to appear to my satisfaction, by the affidavit of the said G. W. Baker and the written acknowledgment of the attorney for the plaintiff in said cause, that the sum of one hundred and fifty-four ($154) dollars, the costs of the plaintiff in the trial of said cause, which was ordered paid by the court as a condition for granting a new trial herein, was by the defendant duly tendered to the plaintiff through his counsel, and declined, it is therefore ordered that said condition to the granting of said motion for a new trial be vacated and annulled, and that said motion for a new trial in said cause, for the reason given in the former opinion of this court, be, and the same is, made unconditional and absolute from date hereof." Subsequently, and within 60 days from the date of the original order, the plaintiff appealed therefrom to this court, where it was affirmed. Holtum v. Germania Ins. Co., 139 Cal. 645, 73 Pac. 591. The remittitur in that case was filed in the superior court August 29, 1903, and thereafter the plaintiff made repeated demands upon the insurance company and its attorney for payment, and finally, on January 9, 1904, made a formal written demand, which was refused. Demand was then made upon the clerk for the issuance of an execution, and upon his refusal a formal motion for an order directing the clerk to issue execution was made to the court and denied, whereupon this proceeding was commenced. The facts above stated all appear from the admissions, express or implied, in the answers of the judge and clerk, filed by way of return to our alternative writ.

The first question arising upon the facts stated is this: Was the order of April 10th, above quoted, void? If it was not void, it is of no consequence that it may have been erroneous; for the plaintiff, by failure to appeal, has allowed it to become final and effective as an order granting a new trial absolutely, and, the judgment being thereby vacated, no execution can issue. In other words, this proceeding must fail unless the order of April 10th was void in the extreme sense for want of power in the court to change in a substantial respect the order of March 12th, by which the right to a new trial was made conditional. The power of the court to make an order for a new trial conditional upon payment of costs by the moving party is unquestioned, and a failure to perform the condition converts the order into a denial of the motion. Garoutte v. Haley, 104 Cal. 497, 38 Pac. 194; Brown v. Cline, 109 Cal. 156, 41 Pac. 862. The condition is therefore an essential part of the order, and the right to revoke it ceases when the power of the court over the order ceases. When the power of the court to set aside the order as to the award of a new trial is at an end, its power to eliminate one of the substantial terms of the order must, for the same reasons, be held to have ended. The question, then, is as to the power of the trial court to vacate an order granting or denying a new trial after it has once been regularly made and entered. The decisions of this court are numerous and uniform to the effect that a judgment or order once regularly entered can be reviewed and set aside only in the modes prescribed by statute. If they have been entered prematurely or by inadvertence, they may be set aside on a proper showing (O. F. Bank v. Deuprey, 66 Cal. 170, 4 Pac. 1173, and cases cited), and, if the order as entered is not the order as made, the minutes may be corrected so as to make them speak the truth (Garoutte v. Haley, supra, and cases cited); but, subject to these exceptions, the order is reviewable only on appeal, and, the decision of the trial court having been once made after regular submission of the motion, its power is exhausted. It is functus officio. Bank v. Deuprey, supra; Dorland v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 484, 6 Pac. 135; Lang v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 492, 12 Pac. 306; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 597, 19 Pac. 174; Belser v. Hoffschneider, 104 Cal. 455, 38 Pac. 312.

It is contended that the doctrine of these cases was limited or qualified in its application to conditional orders for new trials in the case of Garoutte v. Haley, supra, but a reference to the opinion in that case will show that there was no qualification of the doctrine, though there may have been a failure to apply it. The amendment or correction of the conditional order which was made in that cause was upheld solely upon the ground that the court had the undoubted right to correct its minutes so as to make them speak the truth; in other words, it was assumed that the court did nothing except to make the minutes show correctly the order as it was in fact made. In this case it clearly appears from the terms and recitals in the order of April 10th that it was not a correction of an erroneous entry in the minutes, but a substantial amendment of the order, making it absolute, instead of conditional. It is contended that this was a proper thing to do, in view of the fact that the tender of the money and its refusal entitled the defendant to a new trial; but, if the order was erroneous, tender of the money did not entitle the defendant to a new trial, for until the right of the plaintiff to appeal had been lost by lapse of the time for appealing, or by waiver or abandonment, it could not be assumed that the conditional order would ever become final by affirmance, and the refusal to accept the money tendered, upon the express ground that the plaintiff intended to appeal, was a good reason for not making the order absolute. The party resisting the motion cannot be forced into a new trial until the right to appeal is at an end or the order has been affirmed.

Counsel are mistaken in assuming that such orders as that of April 10th have never been set aside or reversed, except upon appeal. In Lang v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 491, 12 Pac. 306, and in Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 597, 19 Pac. 174, such orders were annulled upon certiorari, for the reason that the statutory grounds of review are the measure of the power of the court to review its own orders or judgments. It would make no real difference, however, if the point had never been decided except on appeal, for the remedy by appeal is equally available to correct excesses in jurisdiction and errors in its exercise, and it may appear as clearly from the decision on appeal as from a decision in certiorari that an order is not only erroneous, but void, and whenever it does so appear the order must be disregarded when collaterally called in question, as it is in the present case. It follows, therefore, that the plaintiff in appealing from the order of March 12th was entirely justified in ignoring the order of April 10th, which was wholly inoperative, and the affirmance of the first order left it where the appeal found it, a conditional order; an order, that is to say, which would in effect deny a new trial if the condition was not complied with.

This brings us to the second question in the case: What was the duty of the defendant in the matter of performance? If the order had been entered as it was made, requiring payment in 30 days, or if the minutes had been corrected in this particular, as they might have been, so as to make them speak the truth, there might be a question which does not arise on the case as it is; for the entry on the minutes was never corrected, and the order remains without any provision as to time of payment. Such an order may well be construed as requiring payment on demand, and no more beneficial construction for either party has been suggested by counsel, or has suggested itself. The party resisting the motion may be trusted to demand the money when he wants it. If he concludes to accept the order without an appeal, he will demand the money at once, thus waiving an appeal, and press for a speedy retrial of the issues. If he determines to appeal, he will delay his demand until the order is affirmed. In the meantime the moving party is secure of losing no right by delay or failure in making a tender. Here, after affirmance of the order, demand was frequently and formally made in behalf of the petitioner for payment of his costs, and was refused upon the ground that no payment was due. This, in view of the decisions in Garoutte v. Haley and Brown v. Cline, supra, must be held to have converted the order into a refusal of a new trial, finally disposing of the motion, and leaving the judgment in full force. This did not, however, have the effect of making it the plain statutory duty of the clerk to issue execution. In cases of this kind the clerk cannot be expected to pass judicially upon the question whether a condition annexed to an order granting a new trial has been performed or not, and in any case he must be justified in awaiting the order of the court (where alone the question as to performance can be tried) before issuing execution. For this reason we do not think the petitioner has any right to a writ directed to the clerk.

But as to the court the case is different. Upon the undisputed facts it is the duty of the court to order execution, and the only question is whether that right is enforceable by writ of mandate, which does not issue where there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Code Civ. Proc. § 1086. Here it is suggested there is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by appeal from the order overruling the motion for execution; but this remedy, although plain, is neither speedy nor adequate. The appeal, in the ordinary course, would not be decided for a long time, and pending the appeal there would be no security for the payment of the judgment; and, besides, nothing would necessarily result from an appeal beyond a reversal of the order, and this would merely confirm the right of the petitioner to execution—a right already complete. So that, unless the judgment of reversal was accompanied by a mandatory direction to order the issuance of execution, the petitioner would find himself at the end of his appeal precisely where he is now—with a right to demand the issuance of the writ, but with no power to compel it. Considerations such as these must have been the ground of decision in Garoutte v. Haley, supra. But, whatever may have been the reasons for sustaining the proceeding by mandamus in that case, it certainly made a precedent which justified the petitioner here in seeking the same remedy. To change the rule of practice now, when it is too late for him to appeal, could not be justified.

It is ordered that the writ be made peremptory as to the superior court, and issue accordingly. The proceeding as to the clerk is dismissed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I dissent. In my opinion the order granting defendant's motion for a new trial upon condition that defendant pay $154 costs of trial within 30 days from the date thereof became absolute by reason of defendant's tender of the amount within that time. Compliance by the defendant with this condition, so far as it was not prevented from so complying by the acts of plaintiff, was all that was essential to render the order an absolute and unconditional order for a new trial. Its status was thereby finally determined, and it was thereafter for all purposes an order granting a new trial, and could not be converted into an order denying a new trial by reason of anything that might subsequently occur. The only right that could thereafter possibly remain in plaintiff thereunder was a right to recover the costs, which he has once refused to accept. It is unnecessary here to determine how that right could be enforced, for that question is not involved herein. There is nothing inconsistent with these views in any of the cases cited. I am of the opinion that the application for a writ of mandate should be denied.

VATCHER v. WILBUR, Judge. (L. A. 1,599.)

NEW TRIAL — STATEMENT—PREPARATION—CONTENTS—REPORTER'S TRANSCRIPT—NECESSITY—DISCRETION.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 648, declares that in preparing a bill of exceptions the objection shall be stated, with so much of the evidence as is necessary to explain it; section 650 requires the judge, in settling the bill, to strike out all redundant matter; and section 659 declares that the settlement of a statement on motion for a new trial shall be the same as the settlement of a bill of exceptions under section 650. Held, that a statement on a motion for a new trial of a will contest was only required to contain such evidence as was necessary to a determination of the points raised, and that it was not necessary that it should contain a transcript of the reporter's notes.

2. Where the defeated party in a will contest prepared a statement, on motion for a new trial, in support of his contention that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision on the question of testamentary capacity, and the opposite party objected to the statement, it was his duty to file proposed amendments thereto.

3. Where, on motion for a new trial of a will contest on the ground that the decision as to testamentary capacity was not sustained by the evidence, petitioner's statement offered for settlement, with slight amendments, would have presented all of the facts necessary to enable the court to pass on the question, and it appeared that the estate did not involve more than $500 or $600, it was not a proper exercise of discretion to order petitioner to obtain at his own expense a transcript of the reporter's notes on the trial, which would have cost from $250 to $275.

In Bank. Mandamus on the petition of A. J. Vatcher against Curtis D. Wilbur, as judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county. Peremptory writ granted.

Hester & Ladd, for petitioner. McNutt & Hannon, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an application for mandamus to compel the respondent, a judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, to settle a statement on motion for a new trial. Petitioner in his petition states that on the 7th day of April, 1903, one Lizzie Clapp filed a petition in said superior court of Los Angeles county for the probate of the alleged last will of Albert Clapp, deceased, dated November 17, 1899, and asking that letters testamentary upon the said estate be granted to her; and that afterwards, on the 19th day of November, 1903, this petitioner filed written objections to said petition of Lizzie Clapp, contesting the probate of said alleged will, denying that the same was the last will of said deceased, and alleging that the same had been revoked by the deceased in his lifetime, to wit, March 16, 1903, by the execution of a later and last will by said deceased, and also by deed conveying to said contestant, Vatcher, all his real property in California; that afterwards, on the 9th day of December, 1903, Lizzie Clapp filed a reply and objections to the contest of the petitioner herein, denying the allegations of said petition, and alleging that at the time said deceased executed the later will and the said deed he was of unsound mind, and the execution of said later will and deed was procured by undue influence; that the said proceeding was tried before the superior court of said Los Angeles county, respondent herein presiding as judge thereof, commencing on the 9th day of December, 1903, and continuing on the 10th, 17th, 22d, and 23d of said month, on which last day the proceeding was submitted to the court for decision; that thereafter, on February 23, 1904, findings in said proceeding were duly filed, to the effect that said Albert Clapp was of unsound mind when he executed the last-mentioned will and said deed, and that the first-mentioned will was the last will of said deceased, and should be admitted to probate as such, and judgment was entered thereon accordingly; that no notice of said decision or findings was at any time served on the petitioner, Vatcher, or his attorney in said proceeding, but that afterwards, on the 19th day of March, 1904, and within 10 days after said Vatcher had learned that said findings had been filed, he served upon the said Lizzie Clapp and her attorneys of record, and filed in the office of said superior court, notice of intention to move for a new trial in said proceeding upon the grounds, amongst others, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the said decision, and that it was contrary to law; that afterwards said Vatcher caused to be prepared a statement of said case on motion for a new trial, specifying the particulars therein in which the evidence was alleged to be insufficient to justify the said decision and alleged error of law, and setting forth substantially all the evidence given upon the said trial relating to said specified particulars, and on the 25th day of March, 1904, caused a copy of said statement to be delivered to, and the same was received without objections by, the said attorneys of the said Lizzie Clapp, said statement covering over 20 pages of typewritten matter; that on the 31st day of March, 1904, on notice to said Vatcher, the said attorneys of said Lizzie Clapp moved the court to strike out the said statement on motion for a new trial, served as aforesaid, on the alleged ground that the same did not contain a fair and correct statement of all the testimony given on the trial, but said Lizzie Clapp or her attorneys did not then, nor have they at any time, served upon said Vatcher or his attorneys any proposed amendments to said statement on motion for a new trial; that said motion to strike out the statement, after argument, was denied by the court, whereupon the attorneys for said Lizzie Clapp moved the court to require said Vatcher to procure a complete longhand transcript of the stenographic report of the testimony given on said trial, and to prepare a statement of the case from such transcript, which motion the court took under advisement, and thereafter, in the absence of said Vatcher and his attorneys, on April 2, 1904, made an order requiring said Vatcher to procure at his own expense a complete transcript of said stenographic report of said testimony, and to prepare therefrom, within 30 days, a statement of the case on motion for a new trial; that the legal charges for said transcript would not be less than from $250 to $275, and that the said reporters refused to furnish said transcript for less than their legal charges, while the total assets of said estate cannot, in any event, exceed $500 or $600; that said Lizzie Clapp having failed to serve upon said Vatcher or his attorneys any proposed amendments to said statement, and more than 10 days having elapsed since the service of the proposed statement upon her and her attorneys, said Vatcher, on April 11, 1904, delivered to the clerk of said court said proposed statement of the case, and notified the said judge that he had so delivered the same, and requested the said judge to proceed to the settlement thereof; that said Vatcher thereafter moved the court to revoke and set aside the order requiring him to procure the transcript of said testimony, and that the court settle said proposed statement of the case, but said court on April 22, 1904, denied said Vatcher's motion to vacate and set aside the former order requiring the transcript of said testimony, and refused to settle the said proposed statement of the case.

Upon this petition being filed, an alternative writ of mandamus was issued by this court, and the respondent has filed quite a voluminous answer to said petition. The facts, however, stated in said petition, are not denied, except that it is denied that the proposed statement of the case on motion for a new trial substantially sets forth all the evidence given upon said trial relating to said particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings, and proceeds at some length to detail wherein the said proposed statement failed to set forth the evidence bearing upon the question of said finding. In fact, respondent's answer herein is much more voluminous than would have been a properly prepared and settled statement on motion for a new trial in the matter of said contest. If it had been necessary, as appears to be contended by the respondent, and by the proponent of the will, who appears for him, to set forth in exact detail all the evidence given by the respective witnesses upon the question of the sanity of the deceased at the time of the later will, the refusal to settle the bill proposed would, perhaps, have been justified as imposing too much labor on the judge. We think, however, that the amount of labor necessary to have been done to present the substance of the evidence tending to show the insanity of the deceased at the time in question is greatly overestimated. It is not necessary, in preparing a statement or bill of exceptions for use in this court, to give the evidence in full, where the question to be presented is solely as to the sufficiency of conflicting evidence to sustain a particular finding. All that is required is that a sufficient amount of the evidence be inserted bearing upon each side of the question to show a substantial conflict, for in such case this court does not interfere with the decision of the court below. It is quite true, as claimed by the respondent and attorney for said Lizzie Clapp, that the duty devolved upon the petitioner herein to prepare a proper statement or bill of exceptions so as to sustain his contention of the insufficiency of evidence to justify the decision of the trial court upon the point in question, but this does not mean that the statement or bill of exceptions should embody all the reporter's notes. It is also equally true that, if the proposed statement had failed in this respect, it was the duty of the attorney of the petitioner, Lizzie Clapp, to propose amendments to said statement, and not, by failing to do so, to throw the labor of proposed amendments upon the judge who tried the cause. In fact, the law is plainly against any such practice. The Code declares that in preparing the bill of exceptions the objection must be stated "with so much of the evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain it, and no more." Code Civ. Proc. § 648. And it is made the duty of the judge, "in settling the bill, to strike out of it all redundant and useless matter, so that the exceptions may be presented as briefly as possible." Code Civ. Proc. § 650. On motion for a new trial "the same proceedings for the settlement of the statement shall be taken by the parties and the clerk and judge, as are required for the settlement of bills of exception by section 650," and it is made the duty of the judge, "in settling the statement, to strike out of it all redundant matter." Code Civ. Proc. § 659. The constant neglect or failure to observe these plain provisions of the Code results in our records being many times larger than there is any necessity for, and very greatly increases the cost to litigants as well as the labor of this court, without any corresponding benefit.

The respondent, judge of the court below, in making his order directing the contestant to procure a transcript of the reporter's notes, stated, within the space of a page of typewriting, sufficient facts, in connection with those given in the statement, to support the finding upon the question of the insanity of the deceased. He could have added an amendment to the proposed statement which would have sufficiently preserved the evidence in the case for the benefit of the proponent of the will with as little labor as was required to make the order in question. For instance, the court could have added to the statement the following: "Other evidence was given on behalf of the proponent of the will to the effect that the testator, within two years before his death, frequently complained of an affection in his head, and had at times fits of fainting spells during which he was unconscious; that shortly before his death, and without cause, he had changed his feelings towards the witness John A. Wood from that of friendship to one of hatred; that he was addicted to excessive drunkenness; that his feelings towards his wife were subject to sudden fluctuations from affection to hatred; that he had at times a desire to injure his wife; that he had made threats to commit suicide both before and after March 16, 1903, the date of the latter will and deed in question; and that he did, in fact, commit suicide on April 1, 1903, fifteen days after the execution of said later will and deed."

As proposed, the statement contains the evidence of five witnesses who testified that they were acquainted with the testator, and that, in their opinion, during the last two years of his life he was of unsound mind. It omits, however, to show that these witnesses were intimate acquaintances, and, for that reason, qualified to give an opinion as to his mental condition. But this omission could have been remedied by a few lines giving so much of the evidence as to each of these witnesses, naming them, as would be sufficient to show that they were intimate acquaintances of the testator, or by a general statement that the evidence showed them to be intimate acquaintances, and, as such, qualified to give an opinion as to his sanity. If these amendments had been made to the statement, and it had been settled as thus amended, it would have presented the substance of all the evidence bearing upon the question of sanity; and, in view of the fact that the petitioner did not himself present a more detailed statement of the testimony, although he appears to have been acting in good faith in the premises, he could not justly complain of the action of the court in inserting the amendments in general terms, as suggested, before settling the statement. At any rate, it was entirely unreasonable to require the contestant to incur the expense of $250 for a transcript of the reporter's notes as a condition for settling the statement, particularly in a small estate like this, conceded not to amount to more than $500 or $600. The respondent, as judge of said court, was not required to sign the proposed statement as it was presented. It was his duty merely to settle it, and this implies that he should amend it, or cause it to be amended, so as to make a fair statement, where it can be done with no more labor than was here required.

We think, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, it was not a proper exercise of the discretion vested in the respondent judge to require a transcription of the full reporter's notes as a condition for settling said statement, and for that reason a peremptory writ should issue requiring him to settle the same, and it is so ordered.

DIVORCE — DIVISION OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY —LIABILITY FOR JUDGMENT AGAINST HUSBAND—LIS PENDENS—EXECUTION SALE — INDEMNITY BOND—FRAUD—INADEQUATE PRICE.

1. A judgment obtained against a husband for a community debt prior to his wife obtaining a judgment of divorce, which divided the community property between them, but made no reference to alimony or maintenance, is a lien on the part of the property awarded to the wife, notwithstanding an order in the divorce suit setting aside the property as security for satisfaction of any judgment therein for plaintiff; Civ. Code, § 140, authorizing such security only for maintenance and alimony.

2. Filing notice of lis pendens by plaintiff in a divorce suit by a wife does not prevent a judgment obtained pending such suit against the husband, on a community debt, becoming a lien on the part of the community property awarded to the wife by the judgment in the divorce suit dividing such property.

3. By the judgment awarding plaintiff a divorce, the community property was divided between her and her husband. Prior to such judgment, defendant obtained a judgment against the husband on a community debt. Held that, though plaintiff was entitled to have the property awarded to the husband resorted to for satisfaction of defendant's judgment before that awarded to plaintiff could be sold therefor, yet, the husband having claimed as exempt certain property levied on by defendant, plaintiff could have it sold and applied on the judgment only on giving an indemnity bond, as defendant could not be held for the value of such property till it was determined, as against the husband, that it was not exempt.

4. An execution sale of the judgment debtor's property, at which the judgment creditor was the purchaser, will not be held fraudulent, against one whose property is secondarily liable for the judgment, merely because of inadequacy of price.

5. Before judgment is enforced against the property of one only secondarily liable thereon, it will be credited with the value of property of the judgment debtor, released from levy by the judgment creditor, and then sold by the judgment debtor, unless it be shown that it was exempt.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Emily Gray Mayberry against W. F. Whittier and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part.

Geo. D. Blake and E. C. Bower, for appellant. Otis & Gregg, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action against W. F. Whittier, who is the main defendant, and also W. A. Hammel as sheriff, to enjoin defendants from selling certain property of plaintiff under executions issued on judgments in favor of Whittier against E. L. Mayberry, plaintiff's former husband, and to quiet plaintiff's title to said property as against Whittier. The judgment was substantially in favor of defendants, and from the judgment, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff was divorced from her former husband by a judgment rendered November 22, 1899, the ground of divorce being extreme cruelty by her husband. By that judgment the community property was divided, and the property involved in this present action was awarded to plaintiff. There was nothing in the judgment in the divorce case about alimony or maintenance, and, before that judgment was rendered, Whittier had recovered judgments in quite large amounts against the husband, E. L. Mayberry. Under those judgments he had levied executions on property awarded to plaintiff by the divorce judgment, and was about to sell the same when this present action was commenced to enjoin such sale, etc. In the briefs there are elaborate discussions of a good many questions, but there are only a few points or propositions which need be noticed.

It is clearly the general rule that, upon a division of community property under a divorce decree, the former husband and wife each take the part awarded subject to prior liens; and it has been held that the part awarded either wife or husband is subject to community debts not reduced to liens. Panaud v. Jones, 1 Cal. 488; Packard v. Arellanes, 17 Cal. 535; Johnson v. S. F. Savings Union, 75 Cal. 134, 16 Pac. 753, 7 Am. St. Rep. 129; Frankel v. Boyd, 106 Cal. 608, 39 Pac. 939. Therefore in the case at bar property awarded to appellant by the divorce decree was subject to the lien of Whittier's judgments, unless this case comes within some exception which takes it out of the rule. And it is contended that, even if the general rule be as above stated, still appellant's right to the property awarded her is superior to respondent's liens by virtue of a certain interlocutory order made in the divorce case, which, it is contended, was warranted by section 140 of the Civil Code. By that section it is provided that during the pendency of a divorce suit "the court will require the husband to give reasonable security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under the provisions of this chapter, and may enforce the same by the appointment of a receiver, or by any other remedy applicable to the case"; and, during the pendency of the divorce suit of Mayberry v. Mayberry, the court in which said suit was pending made an order that, until the final judgment, certain property, including the property here involved, "be, and the same is hereby, set apart as security for the alimony and maintenance of said plaintiff, and is hereby charged with a lien in favor of plaintiff for the payment of alimony in said action and the maintenance of the plaintiff, and as security for the payment and satisfaction of any judgment which may be rendered in said action in favor of said plaintiff." But as is said in the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, "the only provision of that chapter concerning maintenance or payments to be made by the husband are section 137, giving the court power to require the husband to pay as alimony to the wife any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself or children, or to prosecute or defend the action, and section 139, which authorizes the court, where the divorce is granted for the offense of the husband, to compel him to provide for the maintenance of the children of the marriage, and to make such suitable allowance to his wife for her support as the court may deem just, having regard to the circumstances of the parties"; and we agree with the learned judge that the provisions of section 140 cannot be extended "so as to embrace the matter of the division of common property." Whether or not a decree for alimony and maintenance, which involve duties owing by the husband to the wife, would constitute a lien superior to the liens of general community creditors, is a question not here involved. The said interlocutory order of the court is therefore of no consequence in this case. And the notice of lis pendens filed by appellant during the pendency of the divorce suit had no legal significance. See Sun Ins. Co. v. White, 123 Cal. 196, 55 Pac. 902.

There is a good deal of discussion in the briefs of the subject of marshaling assets. Of course, under that doctrine, it was the right of the appellant to have Whittier resort first to the property awarded to the husband by the divorce decree, but it is found that he had levied upon and sold all of such property, except as hereafter noticed. One of the parcels of property set apart to the husband was the undivided one-third of a tract of land known as the "El Molino Ranch," and this was levied upon by Whittier; but by agreement the husband conveyed the property to Whittier for $20,000, which was credited on the latter's judgment, and the levy was released. The court below found that the appellant was not bound by this agreement, and that the property was of the value of $35,000; and the court correctly ordered that the difference—$15,000—be credited on Whittier's judgments. There was also a bay horse, named "McKinney," which was levied upon; but the husband claimed this horse as exempt from execution, and it was released. The court decreed that as the judgment in the present action cannot bind the husband, he not being a party to it, the horse must be sold, upon appellant giving therefor an indemnifying bond, and the proceeds of the sale credited on Whittier's judgment. We think that this ruling was correct, as Whittier should not be held for the value of the horse before it is determined, as against the husband, that it is not exempt. Under this view, it was not necessary for the court to find the value of the horse. There was also a black horse, which, while it was still community property, had been levied upon by Whittier and released. This was before the decree of divorce by which the property was divided, and this horse was sold by the husband, and was not included in the second levies made after the divorce judgment. Therefore what is said by appellant about this horse is not material.

It is contended by appellant that the sales made under the executions were the results of fraudulent conspiracy between the husband and Whittier, and were for inadequate prices. But the court below found that there was no fraud, although the sums were for less than the full value of the property sold. Upon this subject the learned judge, in an opinion delivered at the time of his decision, says: "But whether the prices are inadequate or not may be said to be immaterial, because the law is well settled that, while inadequacy of price may be given in evidence as a circumstance tending to show fraud on the part of the creditor who has purchased at his own execution sale, yet it is never of itself sufficient as a ground for vacating such sale. In this case none of the elements of fraud are sustained by the evidence, except the single circumstance of inadequacy of price. It is clear from the authorities referred to that the sale cannot be set aside for that cause alone." These views are correct, and, we think, amply warranted by the evidence, as were all the findings above referred to.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied. In the opinion heretofore rendered, it is assumed that the release of the levy on the black stallion occurred before the decree dividing the community property. In the petition for rehearing our attention is called to the dates shown in the transcript, and upon further examination we find that this was an error. It appears that the levy on this horse and the release occurred nearly a year after the decree, and that after the release, and before the second levy, this horse was pledged by Mayberry, and was afterwards sold by him for $1,000. There is no other evidence of its value. It is not a matter of much importance to the disposition of the case, inasmuch as, after crediting all other sums which the court finds plaintiff is entitled to have credited upon the Whittier judgments against E. L. Mayberry, there still remains a balance thereof unpaid amounting to over $40,000. The only benefit to plaintiff to be derived from a finding as to the value of this horse would be an additional credit of such amount on the judgment, and this slight benefit would not justify a retrial of all the other issues in the case. Nevertheless, the plaintiff is entitled to have the value of said horse credited on said judgments before the same are enforced against her allotment of the community property, provided it was not exempt or free from the execution at the time it was released. For the purpose of giving this relief, a new trial of that issue will be necessary.

The judgment and order are affirmed as to all matters and things found and determined thereby, except as to the said black stallion. The cause is remanded to the court below, and that court is directed to take evidence, and make an additional finding upon the question of the levy upon said black stallion by virtue of the execution on the judgment in Mayberry v. Whittier, the subsequent release thereof, the value of said stallion when released, and whether or not it was then subject to said execution; and if it shall determine that it was then subject thereto, and that said execution was levied thereon and afterward released, then to make a supplemental decree, to the effect that the value thereof shall be credited upon one of the said judgments before either of them shall be enforced against the property set apart to Emily Gray Mayberry by the decree of divorce from Edward L. Mayberry. Further proceedings to enforce said judgments are stayed until the entry of such supplemental decree. Each party shall pay his own costs on this appeal.

HAYES v. HAYES. (L. A. 1,408.)

DIVORCE — DESERTION—SEXUAL INTERCOURSE—REFUSAL—HEALTH—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 96, declaring that "persistent refusal to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse" shall be evidence of desertion justifying a divorce "when health and physical condition does not make such refusal reasonably necessary," evidence of the unexplained refusal of plaintiff's wife to have intercourse with him for three or four weeks after her marriage to plaintiff, in the absence of evidence as to her health and physical condition, was insufficient to entitle plaintiff to a divorce on that ground.

2. In an action for divorce for the wife's fault, her confession as well as plaintiff's testimony must be corroborated.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by Charles Holcomb Hayes against Mayne Hayes. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See 77 Pac. 452.

John L. Fleming, for appellant.

CHIPMAN, C. The action is for divorce on the ground of desertion alleged to have taken place about July, 1899. The default of defendant was duly entered, and service of summons was had by publication. The court found the following facts: That plaintiff and defendant were married in the city of New York, state of New York, on May 19, 1899; that plaintiff is now, and had been for more than four months prior to the commencement of the action, a resident of the county of Los Angeles, this state, but had not been such resident for one year prior to the commencement of the action; that defendant did not desert plaintiff in July, 1899, or at all, nor did she at that time or since refuse to live or cohabit with plaintiff. Judgment followed for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals on a bill of exceptions.

Plaintiff testified that shortly after the marriage he took his wife to England; that she refused to have matrimonial intercourse with him, and, after remaining with her about three or four weeks, he left her, and presumably found his way to Los Angeles, for he testified that in October, 1899, he again went abroad from there, and "was gone several years, and spent most of his time in Paris, Italy, and England"; that he was studying the languages of those countries, and at the same time vainly searching for his wife. He returned to Los Angeles in January, 1903. The complaint was filed in March, 1903. He testified that when he last saw his wife she was acting in the character of page in a dramatic company in London, but whether this was before or after he separated from her does not appear. There is no evidence that she refused to live with him while they were in London. As evidence of her desertion he testified that upon their arrival by steamer at Rotterdam she engaged two bedrooms at the hotel, one for him and one for herself, without his knowledge or consent. There may have been good reason for this; as, indeed, there may have been for her refusal to cohabit with him. Section 96 of the Civil Code makes "persistent refusal to have reasonable matrimonial intercourse" evidence of desertion "when health and physical condition does not make such refusal reasonably necessary," and as to defendant's then health or physical condition there was no evidence. Plaintiff testified that at first his wife refused to be married except by a Catholic priest, as she was a Catholic, but finally consented to be married by a city magistrate. Plaintiff testified, "I think she did not consider that marriage binding, because she gave no evidence of a wife to me." Still there may have been facts concerning her health or physical condition which caused her for the time to refuse cohabitation. Plaintiff does not testify that she deserted him, or refused to live with him. The burden of his complaint is her refusal to have matrimonial intercourse with him, and for this he left her. Furthermore, we doubt whether it can be said as matter of law that the unexplained refusal of a bride of three weeks to have marital intercourse with her husband is such "persistent refusal" as the statute contemplates as evidence of desertion, and as justifying the husband in separating from his wife. On this point there was an attempt made to corroborate plaintiff's testimony, but the most the witness knew was that defendant gave witness to understand that up to that time there had been no matrimonial intercourse between plaintiff and defendant, and this was told the witness in the stateroom of the steamer on their way to England. The witness did not pretend to know whether or not the refusal was "reasonably necessary." But the confession of the wife, as well as the testimony of plaintiff, required corroboration, and there was none. On the point of alleged desertion the finding is supported by the evidence. Whether the finding as to residence is or is not supported, the judgment may rest upon the other finding. Un-

SCHRODER et al. v. ADEN GOLD MIN. CO.

(S. F. 3,140.)

APPEAL—FINDINGS OF FACT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—ACTION TO DETERMINE TITLE TO MINING GROUND—TITLE TO SUPPORT.

1. Findings of fact cannot be disturbed on appeal where there is conflicting evidence, but only when it can be seen that they are contrary to all the evidence, and that there is no substantial evidence in their support.

2. An action to determine right to mining ground is in the nature of a suit to quiet title, so that plaintiff can recover only on the strength of his own title, and if he fails to show title, it is immaterial that defendant has none.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; John M. Corcoran, Judge.

Action by Albert Schroder and others against the Aden Gold Mining Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. J. Trabuco and C. D. Wright, for appellants. Congdon & Congdon, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action to determine the right to about seven acres of mining ground, situated in Mariposa county. The defendant, on a trial before the court without a jury, obtained a judgment, from which, and from an order denying them a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs claim the land as a part of the San Antonio mining claim. They endeavored to prove to the satisfaction of the court that the disputed ground was included within the lines of said mining claim as they were originally run and marked with monuments in the field. To this end they called a witness, who testified that he had helped to erect the original monuments inclosing the disputed tract, which monuments are numbered 3, 4, and 5 on the plat in evidence. He further testified that the deputy United States surveyor, S. J. Harris, had relocated these monuments, and established new monuments just where the old ones had formerly been. There was also some other evidence tending to corroborate the foregoing. There was also evidence in conflict with it. The original written notice of location of the "San Antonio mine" was at right angles with this direct testimony as to the location of these three monuments. Furthermore, it was shown that there was no evidence upon the ground, and none seems to have been discovered under the ground, that there was any lead or lode extending in a direction to warrant the placing of the monuments 3, 4, and 5 where they must have been to uphold plaintiffs' contention. On the contrary, it was shown by expert testimony that the lead in all probability continued in the direction indicated by its course, as it could be plainly traced for about one-half the length of the claim. This would also make it correspond to the said written notice of location.

The court found, in effect, that the mine extended in the direction indicated by the lead so far as it could be traced upon the surface, and that its location corresponded with the written notice of location, rather than with the evidence as to the location of these three monuments. Appellants attack this finding, and say that the monuments erected in the field should control courses and distances as indicated upon paper. This statement embodies a correct rule many times declared by this court. But in the present case the evidence as to the location of the original monuments was of an unsatisfactory character so far as it related to the three disputed monuments. The surveyor who attempted to relocate these monuments found no satisfactory evidence upon the ground as to their location, and was compelled to rely upon statements of others as to that matter. A considerable length of time had elapsed pending the original location of the monuments and the subsequent relocation of them. A fire had swept over the country, changing the appearance of things, and making the testimony as to their original location very uncertain. The case presents a conflict of evidence as to the original location of the disputed monuments. It was for the trial court to determine where the preponderance lay. The burden rested upon the plaintiffs to satisfy the court that their contention as to the location of the monuments was correct, and we think that, in view of the uncertain character of plaintiffs' evidence, and the surrounding circumstances in apparent conflict with that evidence, the finding of the court should not be disturbed. This court is warranted in interfering with the findings only when it can be seen that they are contrary to all the evidence, and that there is no substantial evidence in support of them.

The defendant claimed the disputed tract as part of two other mining locations designated by name as the "Ernestine" and the "Menlo." It is urged as additional ground for reversal that defendant failed to prove that the original locators of these claims were citizens, or had declared their intention to become citizens, of the United States, and hence it was not shown that they were qualified locators. It is also urged that there was no evidence that the locators of defendant's claims marked the boundaries thereof by monuments. These are matters which do not concern the plaintiffs. When it has been determined that they have no interest in the land in controversy, the case is ended. This is in the nature of a suit to quiet title, and in such a case the plaintiffs must obtain judgment upon the strength of their own title, and if it be shown that they have no title, it becomes immaterial to inquire into defendant's rights. The case is not a contest in the United States land office, and is to be governed and determined by the practice and rules of pleading governing in the state courts in ordinary suits brought to settle disputes as to interests in land. Altoona Q. M. Co. v. Integral Q. M. Co., 114 Cal. 100, 45 Pac. 1047. The want of title in plaintiffs renders it unnecessary to examine the title of defendant. City and County of San Francisco v. CONTINENTAL BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. HUTTON et al. (Sac. 1,074.)*

MECHANIC'S LIEN—NOTICE OF LIEN.

1. A notice of lien correctly stating the whole amount due plaintiff, but inaccurate in stating that such amount was due on the original contract, whereas some of the articles were furnished on subsequent orders, is valid as to the value of the materials actually furnished under the contract stated in the notice, the misstatement not being made with intent to deceive or defraud.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by the Continental Building & Loan Association against Charlotte A. Hutton, in which Corlett Bros. filed cross-complaint. From a judgment for cross-complainants, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Coghlan & Harvey, for appellant. Percy S. King and W. H. Grant, for respondents Corlett Bros. Raleigh Barcar, for respondent Continental Building & Loan Association.

GRAY, C. In this action the plaintiff sought to foreclose a mortgage upon certain real estate in the town of Vacaville, county of Solano. The cross-complainants, Corlett Bros., in the same action sought to enforce a mechanic's lien on the same property against the defendant Charlotte A. Hutton, the owner of said property. The said cross-complainants had judgment enforcing their lien for $1,425. The defendant Hutton appeals from said judgment and from an order denying her a new trial.

The questions presented relate alone to the validity of the notice of lien filed by said Corlett Bros. It is claimed that the notice of lien does not truthfully state the terms of the contract under which the materials were sold, that its statement as to the price is untrue, that it does not contain all of the contract, and that it does not truthfully state the agreement as to the place of delivery.

The notice of lien set forth an express oral contract by which the materials were to be delivered to the contractor at Vacaville for the "contract price" of $1,565.30. The evidence upon the trial showed that materials to the value of said $1,565.30 were in fact furnished by the respondents, and actually used in the building; but it also appeared that of the materials so furnished only $1,425 worth were furnished under the original contract between respondents and the contractor. The rest of the materials were furnished thereafter from time to time as ordered by the contractor. The judgment is only for the $1,425 found to have been furnished under the original contract. It is found that, so far as said sum of $1,425 is concerned, the notice of lien contained a true statement of the demand. It is further found that as to the balance of $140.30 the notice of lien did not truthfully state the terms of said contract, "in that said materials aggregating $140.30 were furnished upon an implied promise to pay therefor what the same were reasonably worth, and not upon an express promise for a specified sum, but such misstatement of the terms of said subsequent contract was not made with intent to deceive or defraud the owner or contractor or any person interested in the contract or said building, or the construction thereof, and no one was injured thereby."

The mechanic's lien law is a part of the Code of Civil Procedure, adopted in obedience to the requirements of the Constitution. It is remedial in its character, and should be "liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Section 4, Code Civ. Proc.; Corbett v. Chambers, 109 Cal. 184, 41 Pac. 873. Under this construction of it, the trial court was fully warranted in allowing the plaintiff a lien for the value of the materials actually furnished under the terms of the contract as specified in the claim of lien, and it was immaterial that too great an amount was claimed as due under this contract unless it appeared that the excessive claim was for a fraudulent purpose. The whole amount due plaintiff was correctly stated in the claim; the only inaccuracy consisted in saying that that amount was due on the original contract, when in fact only $1,425 of it arose from that contract. The respondent obtained judgment only for the amount due under the contract stated in his claim of lien. The fact that he failed to state any further contract seems to have resulted in the loss to him of all lien on account of the articles furnished under such further contract. The appellant ought to be satisfied with a result which thus operates only to his advantage and can do him no possible harm in any other direction. "It is quite clear that a recorded lien, good in other respects, cannot be rejected because the amount claimed is somewhat larger than can be sustained by the proofs, unless it be so willfully false as to amount to a fraud; and nothing of that kind appears here." Snell v. Payne, 115 Cal. 218, 46 Pac. 1069, at page 222, 115 Cal., page 1070, 46 Pac.

*Rehearing denied October 5, 1904.

The finding was that the materials were to be delivered at Vacaville, and so was the statement contained in the lien, and both are sustained by the evidence. To be sure, the materials were to be delivered in the first instance on board the cars at Napa, where the respondents' place of business was; but as Waggoner, the contractor, testifies, "the mill work was to be furnished from there to Vacaville," the purchaser paying the freight. "The glass was to be put in place by Mr. Corlett in the building." Mr. Corlett testified that the goods were "to be paid for on delivery at Vacaville." Taking the evidence altogether, it was fair to find from it that the materials were to be delivered at Vacaville, and not paid for until so delivered.

The fifth finding, to the effect that, so far as the sum of $1,425 is concerned, the notice contained a true statement of respondents' demand, was and is in accord with the evidence. The notice of lien was valid, and properly received in evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

ROHRBACHER v. SUPERIOR COURT et al. (S. F. 3,898.)

PLEDGES—FORECLOSURE—APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 949, provides that on appeal from a judgment or order the $300 undertaking required thereby shall stay proceedings in the trial court on the judgment or order appealed from, except as provided in sections 942–945. Section 943 declares that, if the judgment appealed from directs the assignment or delivery of documents or personal property, it is not stayed unless the things required to be assigned or delivered are placed in the custody of an officer of the court, unless an undertaking be given that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court; and if the judgment appealed from direct the sale of personal property on foreclosure of a mortgage thereon the execution of the judgment or order cannot be stayed on appeal unless an undertaking be entered into to deliver the mortgaged property to the officer if the judgment be affirmed. Held, that an action for the foreclosure of a pledge of stock was not within the exceptions provided by section 943, and hence, on defendant giving the $300 bond required by section 949 on appeal from an adverse judgment, she was entitled to a supersedeas.

In Bank. Application by Mary S. Rohrbacher for a supersedeas on appeal. Writ granted.

Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for petitioner. Aitken & Skaife, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an application for supersedeas upon the giving of the ordinary undertaking of $300 on an appeal from a judgment in an action brought by J. C. Cullen, as assignee of John R. Aitken, against the petitioner, Mary S. Rohrbacher. The action of Cullen v. Rohrbacher is founded upon a promissory note made and executed by the defendant therein, Rohrbacher, bearing date March 20, 1899, and payable to the order of John R. Aitken, for the sum of $3,250, six months after the date thereof, and as collateral security for the payment of said note the maker thereof, Mary S. Rohrbacher, transferred and deposited with said Aitken, by way of pledge, a certificate of the capital stock of the Sunnyside Land Company, and also a certain order of said superior court in the matter of the estate of Philip Rohrbacher, deceased, for family allowance of $300 per month during the progress of the settlement of said estate. It is found by the court below, as a conclusion from the facts in the case, that the plaintiff in said action have judgment against the defendant, petitioner herein, for the sum of $4,199.16, "and a decree of this court foreclosing the pledged property described in the complaint, and to a sale of said property to satisfy the liens thereon," and by the decree R. H. Fitzgerald was appointed commissioner for the purpose of making the said sale.

To the petition filed herein respondents interposed a general demurrer. The question presented, therefore, is whether, upon the facts stated in the petition, the case falls within section 943 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as claimed by the respondents. That section provides, among other things, that if the judgment or order appealed from direct the assignment or delivery of documents or personal property, the judgment is not stayed unless the things required to be assigned or delivered be placed in the custody of such officer or receiver as the court may appoint, or unless an undertaking be given in the amount to be fixed by the court, to the effect that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court upon the appeal; or, if the judgment or order appealed from direct the sale of personal property upon the foreclosure of a mortgage thereon, the execution of the judgment or order cannot be stayed on appeal unless an undertaking be entered into, in such amount as the court or judge thereof may direct, to the effect that the appellant will on demand deliver the mortgaged property to the officer if the judgment be affirmed, etc. This however, was not a mortgage of personal property, but was a pledge; that is, a delivery of the certificate of stock and an assignment of the order, which was all that could be done on the part of the defendant in said action to transfer and assign the said property as security for said indebtedness. As stated in Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 33, 26 Pac. 617: "The general rule, as declared in section 949 (Code Civ. Proc.) is that the $300 undertaking mentioned in section 941 stays proceedings in the court below from the judgment or order appealed from. The exceptions are contained in sections 942 to 945, inclusive; and those sections apply to cases where the appellant has money or other property in his possession which has been adjudged by the lower court to belong to the respondent, or where the appellant has been directed to do some act for the benefit of the respondent, and where it would be unjust to allow the appellant to retain the possession of the property, and perhaps dissipate it, or put it out of his power to perform the act required, without securing respondent by a bond." See, also, In re Schedel, 69 Cal. 241, 10 Pac. 334; Born v. Horstmann, 80 Cal. 452, 22 Pac. 169, 338, 5 L. R. A. 577; In re Wood, 94 Cal. 567, 29 Pac. 1108; McCallion v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 98 Cal. 442, 33 Pac. 329. The certificate of stock and order in question were personal property, and as such the former may be transferred by the owner. Civ. Code, §§ 953, 954. We may, for the purposes of this case, assume that the latter also may be assigned. A pledge is a deposit of personal property by way of security for the performance of another act, and every contract by which the possession of personal property is transferred as security only is to be deemed a pledge. Civ. Code, §§ 2986, 2987. In the petition herein it is stated that the petitioner is not now in the possession of said personal property, and cannot, on demand or otherwise, deliver the said alleged pledged property to said R. H. Fitzgerald, the officer directed by said judgment and decree to sell the same, if the said judgment appealed from be affirmed; and that said J. C. Cullen is now in possession of said property, and can at any time deliver the same to said R. H. Fitzgerald should said appeal be affirmed. And it appears that the court below, by its finding and decree as well as by the allegation of the petition herein, treated the choses in action in question as having been transferred by way of pledge, and within the control and possession of the plaintiff in said action.

Under the facts in the case the petitioner is entitled to supersedeas, and the writ will accordingly issue.

TIFFIN v. CUMMINGS et ux. (L. A. 1,519.)

CONTINUANCE — APPLICATION — DENIAL—DISCRETION.

1. An action was begun September 12, 1902. Defendants filed a general demurrer on October 9th, and, not appearing to present the same, it was overruled on November 10th, and defendants allowed 10 days to answer. On December 1st defendants filed an evasive answer, and the case was set for June 25, 1903. Defendants filed an affidavit for continuance, dated June 23, 1903, that they did not know, until informed by plaintiff's attorney on June 10th, that the case had been set for June 25th; that both members of the firm of attorneys representing defendant were then engaged in the trial of another case in a different city, and had been subpœnaed as witnesses therein; that they had had no sufficient time to locate or communicate with their clients or to subpœna their witnesses. The motion was made at 10 a. m. on June 25th, was not supported by evidence, and no notice of the motion was given to plaintiff's attorneys, nor any reasons stated why it was not made sooner. It did not appear that a continuance had been requested of plaintiff's attorneys, nor why defendants' attorneys had not had sufficient time to reach their clients and subpœna witnesses, nor that any attempt had been made in that direction. Held, that an order denying the continuance was a proper exercise of discretion.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by William W. Tiffin against George W. Cummings and wife. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Anderson & Kaye, for appellants. John W. Kemp and Smith & Allen, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to secure a promissory note made by defendants for the sum of $2,000. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendants prosecute this appeal, and make the sole point that the court abused its discretion in refusing to grant their motion for a continuance.

We have carefully examined the record, and find no abuse of discretion in the order of the court denying the motion. The action was commenced September 12, 1902. Defendants appeared and filed a general demurrer to the complaint on October 9, 1902.

Counsel did not appear to present the demurrer, and on November 10, 1902, the court made an order overruling it and allowing defendants 10 days to answer. On December 1, 1902, the defendants filed their answer. The complaint was verified, and the answer did not deny the execution of the promissory note and mortgage as alleged in the complaint. It attempted to deny the amount due, but its denial was in the following language: "Deny that nine months of interest, and no more, on said principal sum mentioned in said promissory note and said mortgage has been paid, and is indorsed on said promissory note; and deny that two thousand ($2,000) dollars gold coin of the United States, the principal sum mentioned in said promissory note and mortgage, together with interest thereon at the rate of two per cent. per month from July 1, 1902, still remains due and unpaid from said defendants." It denies for want of information or belief that plaintiff was the lawful owner or holder of said promissory note. It alleged affirmatively that the defendants, at the time of executing the said note and mortgage, were directors of a corporation known as "Great Northern Gold Mining Company," and that in the execution of said note and mortgage they acted solely as the agents of the said corporation, and for its use and benefit. The case was set for trial and tried June 25, 1903. In support of the motion for a continuance the defendants' attorneys filed an affidavit dated June 23, 1903, which stated that they did not know until informed by plaintiff's attorneys June 10, 1903, that the case had been set down for the 25th of June; that both members of the firm were then, and would be on the 25th, engaged in the trial of the case of Neal v. Exposed Treasure Mining Company, and that it would be impossible for either member of the said firm to be present in Bakersfield on the 25th day of June, the time so set for the trial of this case; that they had not had sufficient time, since the case was set for trial, to locate or communicate with their clients or to subpœna their witnesses; that both the attorneys, members of the firm, had been subpœnaed as witnesses in the said action so pending in Los Angeles for the 25th day of June, 1903. There was no other evidence offered in support of the motion. The motion was made at 10 o'clock a. m. on June 25th, at the time the action had been set for trial. No notice of the motion had been given to plaintiff's attorneys. No reason is stated as to why the motion was not made sooner. It does not appear that appellant's attorneys even requested the attorneys for plaintiff to consent to a continuance of the case. If between the 10th and the 25th of June the attorneys for appellants had in good faith and upon a proper showing made a motion for a continuance in time to prevent any great inconvenience to plaintiff, the court no doubt would have granted it. If such showing had been made with a proper request to plaintiff's attorneys, they would, in all probability, have consented to setting the case for a time that would suit all parties. While the affidavit states that the attorneys had not had time to locate or communicate with their clients, the reasons are not stated. It does not appear why, between the 10th and 23d days of June, they could not have reached their clients. It does not appear that it was necessary to subpœna any witnesses, nor that any attempt was made to subpœna any. The affidavit does not even state that it is made in good faith, nor that, if the case should be continued, that the attorneys will be present at a future time to be set for the trial. The court does not appear to have acted hastily. With the time that had expired since the suit had been commenced, the kind of answer that had been filed, and the generalities contained in the affidavit, the court was familiar. It had the right to act in view of all these matters.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; SMITH, C.

WARNER v. WARNER. (Sac. 1,072.)

ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACT — FILING OF HOMESTEAD DECLARATION BY WIFE — NONSUIT — GROUNDS NOT SPECIFIED IN MOTION—CONSIDERATION ON APPEAL.

1. An antenuptial contract by which the woman relinquishes all right, claim, and interest in and to the property of the man, either as heir or otherwise, does not preclude her, after their marriage, from filing a declaration of homestead on property of his; the marriage imposing on him the obligation to furnish her a home, and the only effect of a declaration of homestead being to exempt the property from execution, and restrain him from alienating it without her consent.

2. The rule that a ground for nonsuit not specified in the motion therefor cannot be urged in support of the court's action in granting it does not apply where the defect in plaintiff's case was inherent, and could not be cured.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Adam Warner against Katie Warner to have a declaration of homestead canceled. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

HARRISON, C. Plaintiff and defendant entered into an antenuptial agreement May 17, 1889, wherein, in consideration of the marriage then contemplated between them, the plaintiff agreed to pay to the defendant certain moneys during her lifetime, and to care for, maintain, and educate a child of the defendant, and wherein the defendant, in addition to agreeing to be a dutiful and faithful wife, "does hereby relinquish and disclaim any and all right, claim, and interest in and to the property of said first party [the plaintiff], either as heir or otherwise." Within a few days thereafter they were married to each other, and are still living together as husband and wife. At the time of their marriage the plaintiff was the owner of certain land, upon which he resided, which was his separate property, and where, since their marriage, they have continued to reside. July 24, 1899, the defendant, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, executed and caused to be recorded in the office of the county recorder a declaration of homestead upon the said land. The plaintiff has brought the present action to have it declared that the said declaration of homestead is a cloud upon his title, and that the same be canceled of record. At the trial the only evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff was his own testimony, and at the close thereof the court, upon the motion of the defendant, granted a nonsuit. From the judgment entered thereon he has appealed.

The provisions of the Civil Code by which the wife is authorized to select a home for herself and the family out of the separate property of the husband, that shall be exempt from the effect of misfortune or improvidence on his part, as well as from the importunity or rapacity of his creditors, have been enacted in pursuance of a public policy declared in the Constitution, and, being remedial in their nature, are to receive a liberal construction. Keyes v. Cyrus, 100 Cal. 322, 34 Pac. 722, 38 Am. St. Rep. 296. To the extent that these provisions are enacted in the interest of the wife, the policy in pursuance of which they are enacted, as well as the purposes of their enactment, are to be considered in the construction of any agreement by her in reference thereto. She is not to be held to have surrendered the rights conferred by these provisions, except by clear and explicit language. The relinquishment and disclaimer by the defendant of all right and interest in and to the property of the plaintiff, "either as heir or otherwise," was an agreement on her part not to seek to deprive him of any of his property, or to assert any claim thereto adverse to him, during his lifetime, or any claim of inheritance therein after his death. Her declaration of homestead was not a violation of this obligation thus assumed by her, or an infringement of any right acquired by him by virtue of the agreement. In the same instrument he agreed "to take care of, and to care for, keep, maintain, and support," her; and by the contract of marriage into which they subsequently entered there was imposed upon him an obligation to provide her with a home, and upon their marriage he took her to the property described in the complaint, wherein they have ever since lived, and thereby made it their home. The defendant did not by her aforesaid agreement relinquish her right to a home, or preclude herself from taking the precaution to make the home secure to her during their married life. The only effect of declaring a homestead thereon was to exempt it from execution or forced sale in satisfaction of judgments against him, and to restrain him from alienating the property without her consent. As the property was his separate property, by her declaration of homestead she acquired no estate or proprietary interest therein which she could assert adversely to him, but merely secured the right to a home therein during the common lifetime of herself and her husband. She has no right of survivorship in the property, but on his death it will vest in his heirs, discharged of all claim or interest on her part by virtue of such declaration. Code Civ. Proc. § 1474. The right given to the superior court by this section to set it apart "to the family of the decedent" for a limited period is not controlled, or in any way affected, by the wife's previous selection of a homestead. Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 653, 54 Pac. 254. The respondent is not precluded from urging this point in support of the action of the superior court because it was not specified as one of the grounds of her motion for a nonsuit. The reason for the rule that only such grounds can be considered upon an appeal is that, if other grounds were specified, the plaintiff might overcome the objection by additional evidence; but if the defect is inherent in his cause of action, and cannot be cured, the reason for the rule ceases to exist, and the rule itself has no application. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867; Fontana v. Pacific Can Co., 129 Cal. 51, 61 Pac. 580.

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—MUTUAL OBLIGATIONS —RESULTING TRUST.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 3386, providing that a party to an obligation cannot be compelled specifically to perform it unless the other party has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, specific performance will not be granted of an agreement of locators of oil land to convey it to a corporation on transfer to them of one-fourth the stock to be issued by it, their object and purpose in making the agreement being to secure the development of the land to determine whether it contained oil, and the development not having been made, and the court not being able to compel it to be made, personal labor and services being involved therein.

2. Where a conveyance of land is in consideration of valuable property of the grantee and an agreement of a third person to issue shares of stock having only a speculative value, the court cannot determine what interest in trust in the land such third person has, and therefore cannot enforce it.

3. Where two locations are made on land as mineral land, and no mineral has been discovered in it, the interest of the second locator, conveyed to the person having the interest of the first locator, cannot be measured as to its value, or as to its fractional dimensions, as compared with the whole tract, and therefore a resulting trust in such interest cannot be enforced.

4. A resulting trust can only be created by a writing.

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. M. Mahon, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles & Bakersfield Oil & Development Company of Arizona against the Occidental Oil Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. M. McNamara, Goodrich & McCutchen, and Calvin Edgerton, for appellant. J. W. Ahern and A. F. McCormick, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action to have it declared that defendant holds certain real estate in trust for and to enforce the specific performance of a contract to convey the same to plaintiff. The defendant had judgment on a demurrer to the complaint, and plaintiff appeals. The question for decision here is, does the complaint state a case for the equitable interposition of the court?

The property in dispute consists of three different pieces of public land in Kern county located as oil land under the laws of the United States, and upon which, as appears from the complaint, no oil had been discovered at the date of the alleged contract. The complaint alleges that such title as was acquired by such locations was "vested in, or owned or under the absolute control of, a combination or association of persons," and that this association was represented and wholly controlled by five persons, whose names are given. An agreement is alleged to have been entered into between Charles M. Martin, the promoter and organizer of the plaintiff corporation, and said five persons as follows: Said five persons agreed that they would place in escrow in the Kern Valley Bank a quitclaim deed conveying to Martin all the interest of the locators in said lands. Martin agreed to organize a corporation, and to cause to be transferred and delivered to a trustee to be designated by said five persons one-fourth of the entire capital stock of said corporation in payment for said lands. It was further agreed that said corporation "should have immediate possession of said lands, and proceed with the development thereof, to the end that it might be determined whether oil existed thereunder, and that said deed should be delivered when oil was struck on said lands or any part thereof, or that said deed should be delivered at any time after the issuance of said stock to said trustees." The complaint further alleges that the object and purpose of said persons, as stated and declared by them, in making the said agreement with said Martin, was that by transferring a portion of the lands so located and acquired upon the understanding that they should be developed by the transferee, the said association of persons would secure the development of said territory without expense to themselves; and also with the purpose and object of acquiring the capital stock of said corporation so to be organized by said Martin for its speculative value; and that there was an understanding between such persons and said Martin that in forming such corporation he should associate together men of financial responsibility as incorporators and directors thereof, so that said stock would have a speculative value in the market. That Martin thereafter organized the plaintiff corporation according to his said agreement, using men therein of "known probity, business ability, and financial responsibility" as directors and incorporators; that he communicated the names of those men to said association of persons, and the latter "expressed themselves as more than satisfied with the character and standing of said incorporators and directors"; that the sole object of forming this corporation was to comply with the said agreement, and the only property intended to be held by said corporation was the oil property covered by said agreement; and of all this the said incorporators were fully advised, and entered into the incorporation relying thereon. It is also alleged that said combination or association of persons were acting as the promoters of the defendant corporation in making the agreements aforesaid, and that in furtherance of their previous agreement they promoted and caused to be organized the defendant corporation for the purpose of carrying out the foregoing agreement, and that the incorporators, officers, and directors thereof were composed of said persons and their immediate relatives, "and that the management and control of affairs of said corporation defendant was at all the times herein mentioned" in the hands of the said five persons mentioned in the complaint by name.

The complaint further sets forth that a part of the agreement was that the land should be free and clear of all claims and incumbrances, so that a quitclaim deed from the defendant corporation (which corporation had succeeded to whatever title had been acquired by the said association of persons) "should pass all the interest which was or could be acquired by reason of the location of said lands as aforesaid"; that Martin procured abstracts as to the title of said land, and it was ascertained that a second mining location had been made some two days later than the location hereinbefore referred to by G. W. McCutchen et al., on one of the tracts consisting of 160 acres in a certain section 2, and the attorneys examining said abstract gave it as their opinion that in the case of these conflicting applications the first discoverer of oil would get good title to the land, notwithstanding the prior location. Defects in the title to several other tracts were also discovered.

The complaint further alleges: That Martin was instructed by said defendant and said persons to do whatever was necessary to clear the said titles, and accordingly Martin proceeded from Los Angeles to Bakersfield, and in company with Batz, the latter acting as agent for defendant, they together arranged a compromise of the conflicting claims of the defendant and said McCutchen et al. in said section 2. This arrangement was that McCutchen et al. should convey 80 acres of the disputed quarter of section 2 to said Batz in trust for said Martin and defendant, "and that said defendant should convey to certain persons named by said McCutchen et al. a like 80 acres of said quarter section; and that said Martin should, as an additional consideration, agree to issue or cause to be issued to the said McCutchen et al. 2,000 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation." That Martin did so agree in writing, and that both Martin and plaintiff corporation are able, ready, and willing to comply with the said agreement. Thereupon said Batz, by consent of Martin, transferred by deed of quitclaim all the interest which he had acquired in said lands in said section 2 to the defendant corporation, but upon the express understanding "that said defendant should convey to plaintiff a one-half interest in said 80 acres of said section 2." That Martin, to secure a quitclaim deed from McCutchen et al., sent agents at his own expense to various points, "and at his own expense secured from each person his signature to said deed." It is also alleged that Martin procured the correction of the defects in the title to the property in other respects not necessary to be here stated.

The foregoing statement contains only a part of a very long complaint, but it is deemed sufficient for the decision of the appeal. It is clear to us that the complaint does not state a case for specific performance, and this for several reasons, only one of which we will state. The main object of the contract was to secure the development of the land to the end that it might be determined whether it contained oil, and this was the principal consideration that induced the defendant to make such contract. And the performance of this part of the contract on the part of plaintiff cannot be enforced in a court of equity, because it involves the performance of personal labor and services. Hence there is a want of mutuality as to the remedy sought to be enforced. Equity will not enforce specific performance of a contract as against the defendant unless the plaintiff has performed, or can be compelled specifically to perform, his side of the contract. Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 Pac. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334. Under this rule the contract cannot be divided up into "independent covenants" and "subsequent conditions" for the purpose of enforcing a part of it and leaving the parties to some subsequent remedy as to the rest of it, but the whole contract, including conditions subsequent as well as precedent, must be kept in view; for our statute says "neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it unless the other party thereto has performed or is compellable specifically to perform everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance." Civ. Code, § 3386. The forming of the corporation and the issuance of one-quarter of the stock to the defendant was but a small part of the consideration to be performed by plaintiff. The contract was not "nearly" performed on plaintiff's part by the forming of this corporation and transfer of a quarter of the stock. The main object, purpose, and consideration of the contract—the development of the land for oil—was yet to be performed by plaintiff. And, though plaintiff may be entitled at law to a conveyance and to be let into possession before he performs this part of the consideration, yet, as this part of the consideration has not been performed, and its performance cannot in equity be specifically enforced, no enforcement of any part of the contract can be had. This principle is clearly illustrated and the reasons plainly given in Lattin v. Hazard, 91 Cal. 87, 27 Pac. 515. To the same effect is the more recent case of Moore v. Tuohy (Cal.) 75 Pac. 896.

But in his closing brief appellant urges that the facts stated in the latter part of the complaint establish a resulting trust in the land. A resulting trust arises "when a transfer of real property is made to one person and the consideration thereof is paid by or for another." Civ. Code, § 853. The main consideration of the transfer to the defendant of the outstanding claim to one 80-acre tract of section 2 was the transfer of defendant's interest in the other 80 acres of the same section. Martin's efforts as the promoter or agent of the parties and the traveling and other expense he incurred in bringing about this transfer cannot be held to form even a part of the consideration for the alleged transfer. This consideration proceeded not from Martin or the plaintiff, but from defendant, and, the conveyance being to the same party from which the consideration emanated, there can be no resulting trust in favor of another. If it be admitted that the agreement to issue to McCutchen et al. 2,000 shares of the stock of plaintiff constituted a part of the consideration for this transfer, how are we to determine what interest in trust this would carry with it in the property conveyed? No value is assigned to this stock; indeed, the complaint clearly recognizes that it was only of "speculative value." The law recognizes actual values or market values, but, so far as we can learn, has no dealings with speculative values; and equity follows the law. Besides, under the doctrine of resulting trusts it is not the interest in property orally agreed to be conveyed that will be looked to (agreed trusts come under the head of express trusts, and must be created by a writing), but a court of equity will regard only that interest or property as held by virtue of a resulting trust which is conveyed to one by virtue of the consideration emanating from another. What interest was conveyed to defendant in this 80-acre tract by McCutchen et al.? Certainly it cannot be contended that defendant holds under a resulting trust any greater or different interest from that which it obtained from McCutchen et al. These latter parties had only a second location on mineral land upon which no mineral had been discovered. The defendant was already the successor to all the claim that the prior locators had in the same land. Certainly no resulting trust could attach to this prior location. It is impossible to enforce a trust interest that cannot be measured as to its value, or as to its fractional dimensions as compared with the whole tract divided or undivided. The agreement to convey one-half the 80 acres referred to cannot be specifically enforced for the same reasons already given as limiting the power of the court as to the enforcement of the original contract set out in the complaint.

As to the other tracts, it does not appear that any consideration whatever proceeded from Martin or from plaintiff for any interest therein conveyed to defendant; and hence the doctrine of implied or resulting trusts can in no way apply to the transactions had in relation thereto.

Without taking time to critically examine the other points urged against the complaint, we deem it sufficient to say that for the reasons stated the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance upon the ground that the agreement to convey was not supported by an adequate consideration, and that the contract as pleaded was not, as to the locators of the mining ground, reasonable or just. Civ. Code, § 3391. The first thing to be done was the deposit in escrow of a deed conveying all their title to Martin, and this deed was to be delivered, thereby investing Martin with the complete title and power of alienation, upon the delivery by him to the trustee of the locators of one-quarter of the shares of a corporation to be formed. The contract contained no stipulation binding Martin to convey the claims to the corporation, and provided no effective means of binding the corporation to make a thorough development of the ground. On this point it was extremely vague and indefinite. It was not provided that any condition subsequent should be expressed in the deed, and the only condition precedent to its delivery was the issuance to a trustee of the locators of one-quarter of the shares of a corporation with no capital except its stock subscriptions, and with no guaranty that the remaining three-fourths of the shares would be subscribed. It is not alleged in the complaint that any definite number of shares in the corporation have been subscribed, and it is entirely consistent with the case as stated that the one-quarter of the stock issued to the trustee of the locators is practically all that ever will be issued. Besides this, the contract did not provide that the stock issued to the locators should be issued as fully paid, or unassessable in whole or in part, and the complaint does not allege that it was to be held on conditions in any respect more favorable than those affecting the stock of other subscribers. So that, if these locations should now be conveyed to the corporation, as assignee of Martin, the locators would be liable as stockholders for a share of the expense of development exactly proportioned to their interest in the ground—a result utterly at variance with the alleged purpose of the locators in entering into the contract.

Upon this ground, irrespective of others, I concur in the judgment.

WILLIAMS v. ASHURST OIL, LAND & DEVELOPMENT CO. (Sac. 1,189.)

CORPORATIONS—SALE OF STOCK—CONTRACT—PROVISION AS TO ISSUANCE OF CERTIFICATE—CONTEMPORANEOUS CONSTRUCTION—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. It is evidence, on the theory of a contemporaneous practical construction, that a contract of a corporation for sale of shares of its capital stock was for shares for which a certificate should not be issued for five years, that the purchaser on making a resale had the secretary of the corporation explain to the person to whom he was making the resale that such was the fact.

2. Provision in a contract of purchase from a corporation of shares of its stock that a certificate therefor shall not be issued for five years is binding.

3. Parol evidence that a written contract for sale of "shares of capital stock" of a corporation was for shares a certificate for which was not to be issued for five years does not contradict or vary the terms of the writing.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Action by Walter E. Williams against the Ashurst Oil, Land & Development Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. O. B. Parkinson, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to compel the specific performance of a contract made by defendant with plaintiff's assignor for the delivery of 6,500 shares of the capital stock of defendant in payment for a conveyance made by plaintiff's assignor to defendant of the oil in certain lands. Findings were filed and judgment ordered that plaintiff is entitled to receive from defendant "six thousand five hundred shares of the capital stock of said corporation of the class designated as 'pool stock' upon the delivery to said corporation by said plaintiff for cancellation to the extent of said number of shares" of the agreement made by the defendant and plaintiff's assignor as to the shares. It was found that prior to the commencement of the action the defendant tendered to plaintiff the said 6,500 shares of "pool stock," and that defendant has kept its tender good, and hence the court ordered that defendant recover its costs. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The principal contention is as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to ordinary certificates of shares of the capital stock of defendant, or to the kind of stock designated in the judgment. The court found that on the 7th day of April, 1900, the defendant made the following agreement with plaintiff's assignor:

"This agreement made this 7th day of April, 1900, between The Ashurst Oil, Land and Development Company, a corporation, and Benjamin F. Thompson, E. E. Thrift and T. D. Kennard, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of the execution and delivery of a certain deed of conveyance of oil rights this day made by the parties of the second part herein to the party of the first part herein, the party of the first part agrees to deliver upon demand to the parties of the second part, 21,154 shares of the capital stock of the corporation named herein as the party of the first part, or upon demand by any one of the parties of the second part, will deliver 7051 shares of said stock to such party making such demand.

"[Signed] The Ashurst Oil, Land and Development Company.
"By O. B. Parkinson, Secretary.
"Jacob Simon, President."

The court further found as follows: "That the capital stock of said defendant corporation was, at the time said above-mentioned agreement was entered into, divided into two classes: First, what was known as 'treasury stock,' being the regular ordinary stock of the corporation, upon which certificates in regular form were duly issued and sold; second, what was known as 'pool stock,' upon which no certificates of stock in regular form should be issued for at least the space of five years from said 7th day of April, 1900, but for which special receipts, showing ownership of said stock, should be issued to the holders of said stock as evidence of their ownership. That at the time of entering into said agreement between said Kennard and said corporation, said distinction between said stock was explained to said Kennard, and it was agreed then and there between said Kennard and the promoters of said corporation and between said Kennard and said corporation that said stock mentioned in said above-quoted agreement was 'pool stock,' and that no certificate should be issued to said Kennard or his assigns thereon until the expiration of said period of five years; and, further, that said agreement above quoted was at said time simply held by said Kennard as merely a memorandum to be held until the full agreement containing all of the propositions as agreed to orally should be reduced to writing. That the shares of stock mentioned in said agreement were and are the 'pool stock' of said corporation." It seems clear that, if it be conceded that the latter finding is correct, the judgment is the legal conclusion therefrom. It is earnestly urged, however, that the part of the finding that the agreement had reference to "pool stock," and that no certificate in the regular form should issue until the expiration of five years, is not supported by the evidence. The witness Abrams testified that he made the agreement with Kennard (the plaintiff's assignor) as to the kind of stock he was to get on the 7th day of April, 1900, in the presence of Dr. De Vinney. The witness further testified: "We had a talk with Mr. Kennard in this way: I stated to Mr. Kennard that the company was formed with five hundred thousand shares, of which we set aside 275,000. Those 275,000 shares were divided into thirteen blocks of 21,154 shares each. I told him just exactly what we were doing with this stock, that we were dividing this 275,000 shares into thirteen blocks of 21,154 shares each; that we would give him one of these blocks for the oil rights to these lands, and that we would pool this stock, and not to issue any certificates on this stock until the expiration of five years;" and that Kennard agreed to the arrangement as detailed by the witness. The witness Parkinson testified substantially as did Abrams. He said: "I told him [Kennard] that, as it was 'pool stock,' we, of course, could not give him a certificate, but we could give him an equitable assignment of any number of shares that he wished." This conversation referred to a sale of some stock made by Kennard to one Butler. Shortly after the agreement of April 7th, the plaintiff's assignor sold some stock to one Galway and some to one Butler. In cross-examination the witness Kennard said: "I sold some of my stock to Mr. Galway, and gave him a written assignment for it. I sold part of the 7,054 shares of Galway. I did not present the agreement [plaintiff's Exhibit 2] for cancellation at any time. I went to Mr. Parkinson's office with Mr. Galway, and asked him to explain to Mr. Galway that my stock was 'pool stock,' and that he [Galway] could not get any certificate for five years. I asked Mr. Parkinson to explain this to him, which he did, and wrote out an assignment to Mr. Galway, which I signed. I also sold some of my stock in a similar manner to Mr. C. J. Butler, and took him to Mr. Parkinson's office, and requested Mr. Parkinson to explain to Mr. Butler how it was that he [Butler] could not get any certificate of stock, because this was the kind known as 'pool stock.' These transactions were had, I think, in May, 1900." The above testimony supports the finding. The transactions in regard to the sale of stock by Kennard to Galway and Butler show how Kennard understood the contract as to the kind of stock he was to get. "The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence as to its meaning, if its terms are equivocal." Keith v. Electrical Engineering Company, 136 Cal. 180, 68 Pac. 598. Kennard would not have asked Parkinson to explain to Galway and to Butler that his stock was "pool stock" unless he so understood his agreement himself. Having made the agreement as to the time at which he would be entitled to regular shares of stock, Kennard was bound by it, and plaintiff, as his assignee, is entitled to no greater rights. He has been given the precise kind of stock that plaintiff agreed to take as consideration. "Restrictions may be created by a contract mutually agreed to by the stockholders." Cook on Stock and Stockholders, § 408. It is claimed that it was error to admit parol evidence for the purpose of contradicting or varying the terms of the written contract of April 7, 1900. But the evidence was not for the purpose of contradicting or varying the terms of the written contract. The agreement did not refer in language to certificates of shares, but "shares of the capital stock of the corporation." The evidence was introduced for the purpose of showing that the terms "shares" referred to and was understood as "pool shares." The writing did not show the kind of shares that Kennard was to receive, but the evidence showed that out of 500,000 shares, 275,000 shares were "pool stock," on which no certificates were to be issued until the expiration of five years, and that the shares Kennard was to get were of the "pool shares." If the writing does not show upon its face that it was intended to express the whole agreement between the parties, parol evidence is admissible to show other conditions or explain latent ambiguities. Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 255, 31 Pac. 109; Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 521, 32 Pac. 571; Balfour v. Fresno Canal & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 Pac. 876.

Plaintiff cannot assume the role of innocent purchaser even if that doctrine could be invoked in a case like this. He testified that he was told that no certificates could be issued for five years, that it was "pool stock," and that he was to pay $5,000 for the shares when he could realize on them. It is claimed that it was the duty of defendant to issue the stock when fully paid up. Defendant has offered to issue stock to plaintiff, and the judgment is that it issue 6,500 shares of pool stock to plaintiff. A certificate of stock is a mere muniment of title. It is evidence of ownership of the stock. Cook on Stocks and Stockholders, § 14.

It is not argued that the agreement as to "pool stock" was void, and hence it is not necessary to pass on the question. The offer to issue the stock was in conformity with the agreement made by plaintiff and defendant. It is not necessary to discuss other minor questions argued. We do not deem them of sufficient importance to justify a reversal of the case.

The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

144 Cal. 511

RULE OF PROPERTY—DECISIONS ASSUMING VALIDITY OF STATUTE—MINING CORPORATIONS—ASSIGNMENT FOR CREDITORS—TRANSFER OF MINING GROUND—RATIFICATION OF STOCKHOLDERS—ASSENTING CREDITORS—ESTOPPEL—WITHDRAWAL OF CLAIM—FRAUDULENT SALE.

1. Decisions which, while not discussing the constitutionality of Act April 23, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 131, c. 118) § 1, stating the requisites of a valid disposition by a mining corporation of its mining ground, recognize the validity of and enforce its provisions, and have been generally considered and acted on as judicial recognitions of the validity of the section, will be considered as a rule of property.

2. One who takes an assignment of claims from creditors of an insolvent knowing that they have filed their claims with the assignee for creditors of the insolvent, and have had them allowed, and who thereafter allows the claims to remain on file, is an assenting creditor within Civ. Code, § 3459, declaring that, unless the provisions of section 3458 requiring an assignment for the benefit of creditors be in writing, subscribed by the assignor, or his agent authorized in writing, the assignment shall be void against creditors not assenting thereto.

3. Under Act April 23, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 131, c. 118) § 1, declaring it unlawful for the directors of a mining corporation to dispose of its mining ground unless such act be ratified by the holders of two-thirds of the capital stock, a mining corporation's assignment for creditors lacking the assent or ratifications of the necessary stockholders is void as against the corporation as to its mining ground; so that as to such ground creditors of the corporation are not estopped to dispute the validity of the assignment, though they have assented to the assignment; so that under Civ. Code, §§ 3458, 3459, they would waive objection to the validity of the assignment because not in writing subscribed by the assignor or by his agent authorized in writing.

4. For a creditor of an assignor for creditors to sue on his claim and reduce it to judgment is not a repudiation of the assignment, or a withdrawal of his claim which he has filed and had allowed and kept on file.

5. A creditor of a mining corporation, though obtaining a judgment against it before ratification by its stockholders of its assignment for creditors, necessary under Act April 23, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 131, c. 118) § 1, to give validity thereto, so far as its mining ground is concerned, yet having continued to maintain the relation of an unsecured creditor, keeping his allowed claims on file, till after ratification by stockholders, making the assignment valid as to the mining ground, and till after sale thereof by the assignee for creditors, is estopped to deny the validity of the title thus transferred to the purchaser, as he would have been had the assignment been originally authorized by the necessary stockholders.

6. A sale by an assignee for creditors will not be held fraudulent merely because of inadequacy of price.

7. Under Act April 23, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 131, c. 118) § 1, declaring it unlawful for the directors of a mining corporation to dispose of mining ground owned by it without the ratification of the holders of two-thirds of the capital stock, a previous consent or direction by the actual owners of such amount of stock, though purporting to have been made by them in their capacity of directors, is, at least as against creditors, equivalent to a subsequent ratification.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth C. Lacy and others, as executrices of B. T. Lacy, deceased, against C. E. Gunn. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. E. Alexander, for appellant. S. N. Reed, Chas. T. Howland, and J. W. McKinley, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant, C. E. Gunn, within 60 days after its rendition, appealed from the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, and he brings up the evidence by bill of exceptions. The complaint is in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title. The answer avers title in the defendant, Gunn. The action was begun in the name of B. T. Lacy, who has since died, and the present respondents have been substituted in his stead.

The evidence shows that both the plaintiff and the defendant, Gunn, claim through the Amalie Mining Company, and the question which has the better title depends on the validity of the respective conveyances by which each claims to have acquired the title of that company. The plaintiff claims title by virtue of a judgment, execution sale, and sheriff's deed. On May 9, 1898, B. T. Lacy recovered judgment in the superior court of Kern county against the Amalie Mining Company for the sum of $7,909.56, which was then duly docketed, and became a lien on the real estate of said company within the county. Execution was duly issued thereon on April 27, 1899, and in virtue thereof the sheriff sold the mining claim in controversy to B. T. Lacy, the plaintiff in the action, for $7,500, and, no redemption being made, a deed was executed to the purchaser on October 2, 1900, in pursuance of the sale. The claim of the defendant, Gunn, is upon a deed from J. B. Ferris, as assignee of the Amalie Mining Company under an assignment made by that company for the benefit of its creditors. The assignment, covering the property in question and other property of the company, was executed to the sheriff of the county as provided in section 3449 of the Civil Code. It is dated April 8, 1897, and was duly recorded on April 9, 1897. By the usual proceedings the creditors of the company met, and elected J. B. Ferris assignee, to whom, on April 19, 1897, the sheriff conveyed the property. The assignee took possession of all the property and held the property in question here until November 16, 1898, when, as such assignee, he sold and conveyed it to Gunn for $3,514.82. The assignment antedates the judgment under which plaintiffs claim, and therefore, if the assignment is valid, the plaintiffs' judgment did not become a lien on the property, and the deed of the assignee transferred the title to Gunn, and constitutes a complete defense to the action.

The respondents claim that the assignment for the benefit of creditors is void. The principal ground for this contention is that the property in question constituted the mining ground of the Amalie Mining Company, a mining corporation; that the assignment was neither ratified nor authorized by the holders of two-thirds of the stock of the corporation; and hence that it is void under section 1 of the act of April 23, 1880 (St. 1880, p. 131, c. 118). That section is as follows: "It shall not be lawful for the directors of any mining corporation to sell, lease, mortgage, or othewise dispose of the whole or any part of the mining ground owned or held by such corporation, nor to purchase or obtain, in any way, any additional mining ground, unless such act be ratified by the holders of at least two-thirds of the capital stock of such corporation. Such ratification may be made either in writing, signed and acknowledged by such stockholders, or by resolution duly passed at a stockholders' meeting called for that purpose." The appellant claims that the statute is unconstitutional, and cites the case of Krause v. Durbrow, 127 Cal. 682, 60 Pac. 438, in support of his contention. That case holds that section 3 of the act is unconstitutional on the ground that it is an attempt to enact a law for a mining corporation different from that prescribed for other corporations, with respect to a subject which, in its relation to a mining corporation, possesses no natural or intrinsic quality different from that which it possesses in its relation to other corporations. Section 3 prescribes rules for the conducting of elections at stockholders' meetings of mining corporations different from those prescribed for corporations generally. It was held that no reason existed for making a law for such elections with regard to mining corporations different from that for other corporations, and hence that it was special legislation on a subject as to which a general law could be and had been made applicable. It does not follow that, because no reason could be perceived for a classification of such corporations for the purpose of making rules for the conduct of elections, there is likewise no reason for a classification with respect to the method of selling and disposing of the property of such corporations which constitutes its real capital, namely, its mining ground. We do not consider it necessary to enter into a discussion of this point, for the reason that the question would seem to be foreclosed by the previous decisions of this court recognizing the validity of the first section of the act and enforcing its provisions. While its constitutionality has not been discussed, section 1 of the act has been treated as valid, and its provisions enforced by the court in bank in McShane v. Carter, 80 Cal. 310, 22 Pac. 178; Pekin Mining Co. v. Kennedy, 81 Cal. 363, 22 Pac. 679; and Johnson v. California Lustral Co., 127 Cal. 283, 59 Pac. 595. In Granite Gold M. Co. v. Maginness, 118 Cal. 137, 50 Pac. 269, this section, although strictly construed, was recognized as a valid statute. These decisions have been generally considered and acted on as judicial recognitions of the validity of the section, and it must now be considered as a rule of property. Even if the question were an open one, we are not prepared to hold that there is not a natural or intrinsic distinction or difference between the mining property of mining corporations, with respect to the advisability of investing in the directors the absolute power of acquiring or disposing of the same, and the ordinary property of those and other corporations, which would justify a law, applicable to that class of corporations and property, different from the general rule. We must therefore decide the case upon the theory that the section quoted is a valid law.

We think, however, that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs cannot question the validity of the assignment so far as it affects the mining property. Section 3458 of the Civil Code declares that "an assignment for the benefit of creditors must be in writing, subscribed by the assignor, or by his agent thereto authorized in writing"; and section 3459 is as follows: "Unless the provisions of the last section are complied with, an assignment for the benefit of creditors is void against every creditor of the assignor not assenting thereto." Aside from the provisions of the Code, there is a general rule that a creditor who files his claim under an assignment in the manner prescribed by law thereby waives all objections to the regularity of the assignment and to the title of the assignee to the assets. Littlejohn v. Turner, 73 Wis. 113, 40 N. W. 621; Olson v. O'Brien, 46 Minn. 87, 48 N. W. 453; Boynton F. Co. v. Sorensen, 80 Wis. 596, 50 N. W. 773; Lawson v. Stacy, 82 Wis. 304, 51 N. W. 961, 52 N. W. 306; Chafee v. Bank, 71 Me. 526, 36 Am. Rep. 345; Jones v. Tilton, 139 Mass. 418, 1 N. E. 741; Appeal of Smith, 86 Mich. 158, 48 N. W. 864. In Olson v. O'Brien, supra, the court says: "Whatever may be the legal status of creditors who have not availed themselves in any manner of the assignment, or the benefits to be derived therefrom, the plaintiff, by making proof of his claim, delivering it to the assignee, and thereafter, although notified of the fact of its allowance, permitting it to stand as a proved-up claim against the estate, has, in law, accepted the instrument, and barred himself from disputing its validity, or from taking any action which will defeat its purpose as a transfer of the property in question to the assignee." And in Appeal of Smith, supra, it is said: "It is well settled that where one comes in under the assignment proceedings in such a way as to entitle himself to share in the dividend arising from the assets in the hands of the assignees, he waives all objections to the title of the assignees to such assets." That B. T. Lacy, the original plaintiff in this action, occupied the position of an assenting creditor, is beyond question. He was the assignee of a number of the creditors of the company, and the judgment under which he bought the property at sheriff's sale was for the recovery of the amounts due him on the claims so assigned. The evidence tends strongly to establish that he was a mere assignee for collection. At all events, he stands in no better position on this question than his assignors, for he unquestionably took with full notice of all the facts with respect to their assent to the assignment. The findings and evidence show that each of these creditors, before the assignment to Lacy, upon receiving notice from the sheriff of the time and place of the meeting to elect an assignee under the assignment, as provided in section 3449, Civ. Code, made due proof of his claim to the sheriff, attended the meeting of the creditors, participated in the election of an assignee, and thereafter filed his verified claim with the assignee, as required by section 3468, Civ. Code, and procured the allowance thereof. So far as the record here shows, these claims still remain on file with the assignee, and are entitled to share in any dividend that may be forthcoming out of the proceeds of the sale to the defendant. These proceedings by the plaintiff's assignors in recognition and acceptance of the assignment were sufficient to make them assenting creditors thereto under the statute and principles aforesaid. The plaintiff received the assignment of the claims with full knowledge of the fact that they had been so filed and allowed, and that they remained on file, and with that knowledge he allowed them to remain on file after he secured his judgment and until the time of the trial. Whatever force would attach to the fact that these claims were on file and were entitled to share in the dividends would be as effective against the plaintiff after he had thus received the assignment of the claims as it would be against the original holders prior to the assignment.

We think, however, that, as to the mining property, the deed of assignment, so long as it lacked the assent or ratification of the necessary stockholders, was void as against the corporation itself, and hence no estoppel to dispute its validity could arise against a creditor during such time as the transfer remained invalid as against the corporation. The effect of the contrary doctrine would be that neither the assenting creditors by their execution sale, nor the assignee by sale under the assignment, could reach this part of the property to apply it to the payment of the debts, and therefore, if all the creditors should file their claims under the assignment in such a case, in order to share in the proceeds of other property included in the assignment, as they would have the right to do, the insolvent corporation could hold this mining property free from the demands of any and all creditors. This would be conclusive of the case if nothing further appeared. But the additional facts and subsequent events justify a different rule. It appears that the assignee had possession of the mining property immediately after his election, and continued to hold possession thereof until the sale to the defendant. The plaintiff's judgment was docketed on May 9, 1898, and thereupon it became a general lien upon all property of the corporation subject to execution. The plaintiff, however, took no steps whatever to enforce the judgment against this or any other property, but allowed the same to remain passive for almost a year. In the meantime, on November 7, 1898, the stockholders ratified the assignment and the deed constituting such ratification was recorded November 25, 1898. Nine days after the ratification the assignee sold the property to the appellant. The sale purports to be a sale of the entire interest therein. There is nothing to indicate that it was a sale subject to plaintiffs' judgment lien, and it is apparent from the entire proceedings in the case that it was not so understood. The deed of the assignee to the defendant, Gunn, was duly recorded on November 25, 1898. No proceedings to enforce the judgment were taken until April 27, 1899, at which time Lacy, the judgment plaintiff, caused the execution to issue on which the sheriff's sale to him was made. During all this time following the sale to the defendant, Gunn, and until the issuance of the execution, the judgment creditor, Lacy, did nothing to withdraw the creditor's claim from full participation in the proceeds of the property sold by the assignee; but, on the contrary, kept the claims on file as unsecured claims, to share fully in the proceeds of the mining property and other assets.

The suit on the claims cannot be considered as a repudiation of the assignment, or a withdrawal of the claims. There is nothing forbidding such suit, either in the statute or in the assignment, and therefore the creditors had the right to sue on the claims after they were filed and allowed, and to collect the judgment recovered out of any property not covered by the assignment. There is no inconsistency in the contemporaneous prosecution of the two remedies, unless there is an attempt to seize the assigned property on the execution. Williams v. Cox, 78 Ala. 325; Lawrence v. McVeagh, 106 Ind. 210, 6 N. E. 327; Trotter v. Williamson, 6 T. B. Mon. 38; Rice v. Catlin, 14 Pick. 221; Nonantum W. Co. v. Holliston Mills, 149 Mass. 359, 21 N. E. 670; Morehead v. Adams, 18 Neb. 569, 26 N. W. 242; First N. Bank v. Newman, 62 N. H. 410; Thompson v. Reeves, 26 Or. 46, 37 Pac. 46; Kingsbury v. Deming, 17 Vt. 367, note; Foster v. Deming, 19 Vt. 313; Limbocker v. Higinbotham, 52 Kan. 696, 35 Pac. 783; Detroit S. W. v. Osmun, 74 Mich. 7, 41 N. W. 845; Smith v. St. P. G. F. Ins. Co., 56 Minn. 202, 57 N. W. 475. There may be very good reasons for such a suit aside from the intention to repudiate or withdraw from the assignment proceedings, as, for instance, to prevent the bar of the statute of limitations.

The purchaser at the assignee's sale had the right to take the conditions existing at the time of his purchase as the measure of his rights and of the claims and rights of other parties to the assignment, and, having made the purchase, presumably, on the faith of these conditions, the other parties to the assignment should not be allowed to change their relations to his prejudice. By continuing to maintain the relation of an unsecured creditor and keeping his claims on file to the full amount thereof, after the ratification by the necessary stockholders had made the assignment valid as to the mining ground, and until the sale to the defendant, and thus keeping himself in a position to share fully in the proceeds of the sale to defendant, the plaintiff became estopped to deny the title thus transferred to defendant as fully as he would have been estopped if the assignment had been originally authorized by the two thirds of the stockholders.

If there was anything in the nature of a claim that the defendant had purchased the property subject to the lien of the plaintiffs' judgment, this estoppel, of course, would not apply to the case; but, as before stated, it is not claimed upon the face of this record that there was any such understanding, and the contrary appears to be the fact. If upon a new trial it shall be shown that there was such an understanding, or possibly if, for any reason, it should appear that the defendant's purchase was unfair or inequitable as against the creditors, we do not wish to be understood as holding that the plaintiff in that case would be estopped from asserting title to the property as against the defendant.

It is suggested that to permit the appellant's purchase from the assignee to stand would be inequitable on account of the low price paid, and the fact that appellant now owns almost all of the stock. It is settled, however, that inadequacy of price alone is not sufficient to justify a court in declaring a sale fraudulent. We are of the opinion that, as against the plaintiffs, the assignment and the sale by the assignee to the defendant must be considered as valid, and that the findings and judgment holding it void are not sustained by the evidence. We cannot, however, direct the court below to enter judgment in favor of the appellant. There is a general finding that he has no interest in the property, and hence a new trial is necessary.

There is evidence tending to show that the directors who instructed the president and secretary to make the assignment were at the time the actual owners, as distinguished from those who appeared to be such on the books, of more than two-thirds of the stock. The resolution authorizing the assignment was passed on April 7, 1897. The evidence shows that the directors who were present at the meeting and assented to this resolution were, on April 9, 1897, the owners of more than two-thirds of the stock. We cannot say from this statement that they were the owners of such two-thirds on April 7th, at the time the resolution was passed, though there may be a strong inference to that effect. Hence we cannot disturb the finding that the assignment was not ratified until after the judgment in favor of Lacy was docketed. But, in view of the probability of a new trial, we think it proper to say that the statute of 1880 was enacted primarily for the benefit of stockholders, rather than creditors, and that a previous consent or direction by two-thirds of the stockholders, although purporting to have been made in their capacity as directors, is, at least as against creditors, equivalent to a subsequent ratification, and that it is the actual owners of the stock, and not those who appear to be so, who are under the protection of the statute, and whose ratification or consent is required.

There are some other points presented in the case, but in view of the conclusions we have reached as above we do not think it necessary to consider them.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

In re KENNEDY. (Cr. 1,176.)

HABEAS CORPUS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE TO WARRANT INDICTMENT.

1. The sufficiency of the evidence before a grand jury to warrant the indictment found by it cannot be inquired into on habeas corpus, though it was taken down by a stenographer, as authorized by Pen. Code, § 925, as amended by St. 1897, p. 204, c. 142.

In Bank. Application for habeas corpus in behalf of William B. Kennedy. Writ discharged.

Wm. H. Schooler and A. S. Newburgh, for petitioners. I. Harris, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is a petition to this court in behalf of William B. Kennedy for his discharge on habeas corpus. The writ issued, and upon the return of the sheriff who holds Kennedy the matter was heard and submitted. The petition sets forth a large number of arrests of Kennedy on various charges, and subsequent discharges from such arrests by superior court judges on habeas corpus; but while these various proceedings may tend to support the contention that these prosecutions were somewhat in the nature of persecutions, they are irrelevant to this present case. Kennedy is now held under a warrant of arrest regularly issued upon an indictment found against him by a grand jury charging him with murder. There is no question of the regularity of the formation of the grand jury, or that the requisite number of jurors acted on the indictment, or as to any other matters touching the general jurisdiction of the grand jury to find the indictment here in question, or that it does not charge a public offense, or as to any deficiency of the indictment in the matter of form or substance. His claim to a discharge is founded on these facts: He was once before tried on a former indictment for the same alleged crime as the one charged in the present indictment. On the former trial he was convicted, but the superior court granted him a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict, because there was no evidence supporting the charge except the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The people took an appeal from the order granting a new trial, and this court affirmed the order, deciding that the only direct testimony against Kennedy was that of an accomplice, and that there was no sufficient corroborating evidence, and intimating that the testimony of the accomplice himself would not have been sufficient even if the law did not require corroborating evidence. After the remittitur had gone down, the prosecution not being able to state its ability to furnish additional evidence, the court dismissed the indictment under section 1385 of the Penal Code, and ordered Kennedy discharged from custody. Afterwards the grand jury found and returned the said indictment under which he is now held. The testimony introduced before the grand jury upon which the last indictment was found was, on demand of the district attorney, taken down and written out by a stenographer, under section 925 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1897 (St. 1897, p. 204, c. 142), which provides that the testimony should be so taken if the district attorney demands it, and that a copy of it shall be given to the defendant upon his arraignment. This testimony is made part of the petition in this present proceeding, and it is contended by petitioner that it is the same testimony that was given at the former trial, which was held by this court to be insufficient to support a verdict of guilty, and that, therefore, it was insufficient to justify the grand jury in finding a second indictment. And this is the sole ground on which the discharge of Kennedy is asked for on this present proceeding.

We think it clear that upon habeas corpus the sufficiency of the evidence before a grand jury to warrant an indictment is not a proper subject of inquiry. If it could be inquired into in this case, it could be in any case, and the writ of habeas corpus would, for this purpose, be turned into a writ of review for the purpose of inquiring whether the grand jury committed an error reversible on appeal, and an entirely new field of litigation in criminal cases would be opened up, and few indictments would come to trial without this preliminary contest. But there is no such appeal, and no provision for reviewing the action of a grand jury in finding an indictment. Upon habeas corpus we can look only to the matters hereinbefore indicated. We cannot look to the sufficiency of the evidence on which it acted, for as to that matter its action is conclusive. There are no cases decided by this court which are directly in point, this being the first time, within our knowledge, where the validity of an indictment has been attacked upon mere ground of insufficiency of evidence to support it; although in People v. Tinder, 19 Cal. 539, 81 Am. Dec. 77, it was held that for the purpose of determining whether an indicted party should be admitted to bail the evidence taken before the grand jury could not be considered, and in Ex parte Sternes, 82 Cal. 245, 23 Pac. 38, although the point was not necessarily involved, it is correctly stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Fox that an indictment is a charge "made by a judicial body," and that it is held so conclusive that for centuries, until an information was recently allowed in this state, all courts have been powerless to put a man on trial for a felony except upon indictment, "or to dismiss one without trial who had been in proper form so charged." But in other jurisdictions the question has been directly raised, and we are satisfied that the law always has been and is as stated in Bishop on Criminal Procedure, § 872, that "the court cannot inquire into the sufficiency of proof, or the mode of examining witnesses, to invalidate an indictment." See State v. Boyd, 2 Hill (S. C.) 288, 27 Am. Dec. 376; Smith v. State, 61 Miss. 759; Hight v. U. S., 43 Am. Dec. 111; U. S. v. Reed, 2 Blatchf. 437, Fed. Cas. No. 16,134; Hammond v. State, 74 Miss. 214, 21 South. 149, and cases there cited. In U. S. v. Reed, supra, it is said, "No case has been cited, nor have we been able to find any authority for looking into and revising the judgment of the grand jury upon the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not the finding was founded upon sufficient proof;" and in Hammond v. State, supra, it is said, "The doctrine appears to be general that the court cannot inquire into the sufficiency of the proof to invalidate an indictment." There are many other authorities to the same point. The statutes of the states where the decisions above referred to were made do not differ materially on the subject of grand juries and indictments from those of this state.

The fact that section 925 of the Penal Code now allows the district attorney, if he so desires, to have the testimony given before a grand jury taken by a stenographer does not affect the rule as above stated. It is true that judges and text-writers, when stating the rule, have sometimes alluded to the secrecy of proceedings before the grand jury, and the difficulty of proving what the evidence before a grand jury was; but the rule itself does not rest upon these considerations. An indictment is a record of the action of a judicial body, and such action is final when there is no appeal therefrom and no other method provided for revising it; and there is no method for revising it on the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to support it. The provision that a party who has been "committed" without probable cause may be discharged refers to the preliminary commitment by a magistrate. See Ex parte Sternes, supra. The provision of section 925 is evidently for the benefit of the district attorney—probably for the purpose of preventing witnesses of a certain character from safely giving testimony before the trial jury different from that which they have given before the grand jury; but the district attorney need not have a stenographer before the grand jury, and clearly the provision does not change the rule as above stated. The provision of section 921 of the Penal Code that a grand jury "ought to" find an indictment upon certain evidence is "plainly only matter of advice to the jury." State v. Boyd, supra. The case of Ex parte Jenkins, 2 Wall. Jr. 521, Fed. Cas. No. 7,259, cited by petitioner, is not in point. That case involved a conflict between federal and state courts under the fugitive slave law. A law of Congress provided that judges of federal courts should have the power to issue writs of habeas corpus where prisoners were confined "on, or by any authority of law, for any act done or omitted to be done in pursuance of the law of the United States, or any order, process, or decree of any judge or court thereof." In that case the prisoners were held under an indictment in the state court which merely charged them with riot and assault to kill, and contained no intimation that the parties indicted were officers of the United States, and did the things alleged while acting in pursuance of an act of Congress; and the federal court merely held that the act of Congress could not be evaded by the artifice of an indictment in the state court which did not disclose the facts which brought the case within the operation of the law of Congress. That law included cases where federal officers were held under "any authority of law," whether by the interposition of a grand jury or otherwise.

Said Kennedy is remanded to the custody of the sheriff, and this writ is discharged.

PEOPLE v. MILLER. (Cr. 1,166.)

RAPE—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. An indictment alleging that defendant on a certain day had intercourse with H., a female under 16 years of age, "and not the wife of defendant," unequivocally alleges that the female was not the wife of defendant at the time of the commission of the offense.

2. Evidence as to the number of boxes witness could pack in a given time is not admissible to show how many defendant could pack.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Clarence T. Miller was convicted of rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

Henry M. Willis, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SMITH, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, and sentenced to a term of seven years' imprisonment in the state prison at Folsom. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The grounds for reversal alleged are: (1) The insufficiency of the indictment in failing to allege that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant at the time of the commission of the offense; (2) error of the court in allowing a question to the prosecutrix, and the insufficiency of her answer to establish an essential element of the crime; (3) the exclusion of certain testimony; and (4) that the verdict is contrary to the evidence.

The objection to the indictment is obviously untenable. The actual allegation is that the defendant on the day named "did wilfully, etc., * * * commit an act of sexual intercourse with one Eva Hilberg, a female person under the age of sixteen years, and not the wife of said Clarence T. Miller;" and this, whether we have regard to the mere grammatical construction or to the manifest intent of the allegation, unequivocally alleges that the act was committed on a female under the age of 16 years, and not the wife of the defendant at the time of the act. Nor is the allegation susceptible of a different meaning.

As to the second of the grounds urged, the question asked we regard as proper, and the answer of the witness as susceptible of but one inference, which is adverse to the appellant on the point complained of.

The third ground is also without merit. The evidence excluded related to the number of boxes of oranges the witness Hilberg could pack in a given time, which could furnish no grounds for any inference as to how many the defendant could pack which was the purpose for which it was offered. Code Civ. Proc. § 1832.

As to the appellant's fourth point, the evidence against the defendant is, indeed, not so strong as to exclude doubt. But it cannot be said there was no evidence to sustain the verdict, nor can we say there was such abuse of discretion in the lower court in refusing a new trial as to justify the interference of this court. Const. art. 6, § 4.

We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—COMPLAINT—ALLEGATION OF DAMAGES.

1. A complaint in an action for assault and battery, alleging that defendant assaulted plaintiff, knocked him down, and kicked him in the face and on the body, and that he "thereby seriously wounded and bruised plaintiff, and rendered him sick, sore, and lame, to his damage in the sum of $5,000," constituted a sufficient allegation that plaintiff had suffered damages to such amount.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County.

Action by Alf. Pennington against F. L. Caughey. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Sturtevant, for appellant. T. L. Carothers, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The defendant appeals from a judgment against him in favor of the plaintiff, in a suit for assault and battery for $100. There was a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled, and the only point made by the appellant is the alleged insufficiency of the latter, as to which it is claimed that there is no allegation in the complaint that "the respondent has sustained damages." But it is alleged in the complaint, not only that the defendant assaulted the plaintiff, and knocked him down, and kicked him in the face and on the body, but that he "thereby seriously wounded and bruised the plaintiff, and rendered him sick, sore, and lame, to his damage in the sum of $5,000." This is but to say, in language technically defined by long use, that by reason of the acts complained of the plaintiff suffered damage in, or sustained damage to, the amount of $5,000. Stephen on Pleadings, 33 et seq. 38; Baker v. Hope, 49 Cal. 598. Nor can the language used be otherwise construed. The complaint is entirely sufficient. Childers v. HENRY v. GARDEN CITY BANK & TRUST CO. OF SAN JOSE. (S. F. 3,387.)

TAX ON MORTGAGE—PAYMENT BY PURCHASER OF PROPERTY AFTER MORTGAGE LIEN HAS BEEN EXTINGUISHED — RIGHT TO RECOVER FROM MORTGAGEE.

1. Const. Cal. art. 13, § 4, carried into the Political Code as section 3627, provides that a mortgage securing a debt shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property mortgaged; that the value of the security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner thereof, and the value of the property, less the value of the security, to the owner of the property; that the taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property, and may be paid by either party to the security; that if paid by the holder of the security the tax upon the property shall become a part of the mortgage debt, and if paid by the owner of the property the tax upon the security shall be applied as a credit on the mortgage debt. Held, that the owner of a first mortgage, who bought the property at a foreclosure sale thereunder and obtained title, and who thereafter redeemed from a sale for the tax levied on a second mortgage, and paid other taxes levied on such mortgage to free the property from the lien thereof, had no cause of action to recover such taxes from the owner of the second mortgage, there being no contractual relation between them which would support such an action, and no personal obligation to pay the taxes resting on the defendant.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. G. Lorigan, Judge.

Action by J. H. Henry against the Garden City Bank & Trust Company of San Jose, a corporation. Judgment for defendant on demurrer, from which plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jackson Hatch, for appellant. S. F. Leib, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The court below sustained the demurrer to the second amended complaint, and, the plaintiff declining to further amend, judgment was entered accordingly and in favor of the defendant, from which this appeal is taken. The complaint consists of two counts. In the first it is alleged that one Murphy, being the owner of a certain tract of land situate in the county of San Luis Obispo, executed a mortgage to the plaintiff October 1, 1895, to secure the sum of $30,000, with interest; that subsequently, to wit, February 16, 1897, said Murphy executed a second mortgage to the defendant to secure the sum of $16,670; that on May 9, 1898, plaintiff brought an action to foreclose his said mortgage, making the defendant herein a party defendant in said action; that said defendant made default, and plaintiff, August 11, 1898, had the usual decree of foreclosure; that on September 5, 1898, said property was sold under said decree of foreclosure, and plaintiff became the purchaser for the amount specified in the judgment and decree, and, there being no redemption, a deed was duly executed and delivered to the plaintiff by the sheriff on said sale, April 15, 1899, and ever since said sale the plaintiff has been, and now is, the owner of said land; that on the first Monday of March, 1898, the debt, amounting to $16,670, due defendant, and so secured by said mortgage executed by said Murphy, was assessed by the assessor of said county against the defendant corporation for the purpose of state and county taxes and for special school tax; that said defendant neglected and refused to pay said tax, and that such proceedings were thereafter had by the proper officers of said San Luis Obispo county, because of such failure and refusal to pay said tax, amounting, with interest and penalties, to the sum of $405.77; that the lands covered by the said mortgage were duly and regularly sold to the state of California and purchased by said state; that thereafter, to wit, on March 5, 1900, the plaintiff, in order to remove the lien and incumbrance resulting from such sale, was obliged to pay, and did pay, the sum of $406.30 to effect a redemption of said lands from the sale to the state. The second count is the same as the first, except that it relates to the taxes of 1899, which defendant failed to pay, and which became delinquent, and which the plaintiff paid before any sale thereof to the state.

Among other grounds stated in the demurrer was that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, and we think it was properly sustained on that ground. The appellant bases his claim for a recovery of the amount paid by him to remove the incumbrance and lien on the property he purchased upon the provision of the Constitution, carried into the Political Code (Const. art. 13, § 4; Pol. Code, § 3627). The provision in the Constitution reads: "A mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or other obligation, by which a debt is secured, shall, for the purposes of assessment and taxation, be deemed and treated as an interest in the property affected thereby. Except as to railroad and other quasi-public corporations, in case of debts so secured, the value of the property affected by such mortgage, deed of trust, contract, or obligation, less the value of such security, shall be assessed and taxed to the owner of the property, and the value of such security shall be assessed and taxed to the owner thereof, in the county, city, or district in which the property affected thereby is situate. The taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property and security, and may be paid by either party to such security; if paid by the owner of the security, the tax so levied upon the property affected thereby shall become a part of the debt as secured; 'if the owner of the property shall pay the tax so levied on such security, it shall constitute a payment thereon, and to the extent of such payment, a full discharge thereof;' provided, that if any such security or indebtedness shall be paid by any such debtor or debtors, after assessment and before the tax levy, the amount of such levy may likewise be retained by such debtor or debtors, and shall be computed according to the tax levy for the preceding year."

The constitution, it will be seen, says: "The taxes so levied shall be a lien upon the property and security, and may be paid by either party to such security." Here, however, the plaintiff was not a party to the security in question. After becoming the owner of the property he redeemed from the state, and paid the taxes assessed upon the land, as stated, for the purpose of relieving his property from this cloud upon his title. The defendant, however, derived no benefit therefrom, and is under no obligation to refund the amount so paid. The question here presented has, however, been directly decided by this court adversely to the contention of the appellant, in Canadian Co. v. Boas, 136 Cal. 419, 69 Pac. 18. The appellant concedes this to be so, but contends that the principles involved in that case do not appear to have been thoroughly considered by the court, and that they are in conflict with the decision in San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Co. v. Witmer Bros. Co., 96 Cal. 623, 29 Pac. 500, 31 Pac. 588, 18 L. R. A. 465, 470, and that the importance of the question involved calls for a re-examination before being the basis of subsequent decisions. The opinion in San Gabriel Co. v. Witmer, relied upon by appellant, was by a divided court of four to three, and was followed in Angus v. Plum, 121 Cal. 608, 54 Pac. 97, as stated in the court opinion, "whether that decision was right or wrong," upon the ground that the parties to the controversy in the latter case had acted upon the rule laid down in the former. In McPike v. Heaton, 131 Cal. 109, 63 Pac. 179, 82 Am. St. Rep. 335, the defendant was the owner of the undivided half of certain land on the first Monday of March, 1897, and had been such owner for some time, and on the 24th of March conveyed his interest to one Jackson, who on the next day conveyed it to the plaintiff by a grant deed. The land was assessed to defendant Heaton for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1897, and taxes were levied on the land for that year, and on November 29, 1897, plaintiffs, for the purpose of removing the lien of these taxes, paid the same to the proper officers, and brought the action under consideration to recover from the defendant the amount thus paid. Plaintiff had judgment in the lower court, which was reversed here. In the opinion of this court it is said: "The plaintiffs had no contractual relation with the defendant, and his covenant with Jackson did not pass to them. They could have protected themselves against these taxes either by assuming their payment as part of the consideration for the purchase, or by suitable covenants with Jackson, but they have no right of action therefor against the defendant. San Gabriel, etc., Co. v. Witmer, etc., Co., 96 Cal. 623, 29 Pac. 500, 31 Pac. 588, 18 L. R. A. 465, 470, cited by the respondents, involved a consideration of the relative obligations between a mortgagee and the owner of the land mortgaged, by reason of the peculiar provisions of the Constitution in reference to the assessment and payment of taxes upon these respective interests in the land, and was determined upon the ground that by virtue of these provisions there is a personal obligation upon the mortgagee in favor of the mortgagor for the payment of the taxes assessed upon the mortgage, and that if these taxes are paid by the owner of the land he may reimburse himself therefor, either by deducting the amount from the mortgage debt or in a separate action therefor. There is, however, no personal obligation upon the owner of land for the taxes levied against it, and the payment of such taxes can be enforced only by a sale of the land in the mode prescribed by the statute. The defendant was under no personal liability for the taxes paid by the plaintiffs, and the case cited is not applicable to the present case." The opinion in that case was signed by one of the justices composing the majority of four in San Gabriel v. Witmer, supra. The opinion in The Canadian Company v. Boas, supra, was written by another of the justices who concurred in San Gabriel v. Witmer. This last case, as already stated, is on all fours with the one at bar. After stating the facts, the court says: "We see no ground upon which the action could be maintained. There was no contractual relation whatever between appellant and respondent with respect to the money sued for. * * * The judgment and lien created by the tax on respondent's second mortgage interest had been satisfied and removed by the sale to the state. Pol. Code, § 3716. The money paid by the appellant to the state was not for the benefit of the respondent, whose entire interest in the property had been first taken by the state for taxes, and afterwards had again been entirely swept away by the judgment of foreclosure. The appellant is in no different position from that of any other purchaser of land who finds his title clouded." This case contains a clear interpretation of the constitutional provision under consideration, and we are not at all inclined to either overrule or modify it, and this disposes of the case now before us.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. The facts, briefly stated, are that plaintiff held a senior mortgage on lands on which the defendant held a junior mortgage; that the land was valued for taxation high enough to cover the mortgage interest of both mortgagees for the years 1898 and 1899; that in May, 1898, the plaintiff began suit to foreclose his mortgage, and in due course of proceedings purchased the land at foreclosure sale, and obtained a sheriff's deed on April 15, 1899; that in the meantime the taxes assessed on the mortgage interest of the defendant in the land for 1898 and 1899 had not been paid, and the plaintiff, in order to prevent the sale of his land therefor, and protect his property, was compelled to pay the tax for 1899 after it became delinquent, and to redeem a sale to the state for the defendant's taxes for 1898. The action was to recover of the defendant the sums thus paid for taxes. Under the provisions of the Constitution, and section 3627 of the Political Code, the mortgage interest of the mortgagee in lands is to be considered as an estate therein, the same as any other interest in property.

The principle upon which the action was based is as old as the common law. It is stated and approved as follows in San Gabriel Company v. Witmer Co., 96 Cal. 635, 29 Pac. 502, 18 L. R. A. 465: "Where the plaintiff, either by compulsion of law, or to relieve himself from liability, or to save himself from damage, has paid money, not officiously, which the defendant ought to have paid, a count in assumpsit for money paid will be supported." "In such case the law implies a request on the defendant's part, and a promise to repay, and the plaintiff has the same right of action as if he had paid the money at the defendant's express request. The right of contribution or reimbursement for money necessarily paid for another's benefit does not necessarily depend upon contract, but may arise from the equity of the case." In equity the same principle is the foundation of the doctrine of subrogation. "The general rule is that any person having an interest in property on which there is a lien or incumbrance may, if necessary for his own protection, pay off the same and be substituted to the rights and remedies of the holder thereof." 27 Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 235.

The principle is so well established that it seems useless to cite authorities, but the following examples may elucidate the proposition: Hogg v. Longstreth, 97 Pa. 255, is substantially the same as the case at bar. The plaintiff, a mortgagee, had purchased the land at the foreclosure sale, and afterwards, in order to protect his land from sale for taxes, was compelled to pay certain taxes assessed against the land while it was held by a purchaser from the mortgagor. It was held he could recover in assumpsit from the grantee of the mortgagor the amount of the taxes thus paid. In Graham v. Dunigan, 6 Duer, 629, it was held that a tenant for life of a part, having been compelled to pay the taxes against the whole property, can recover of the other owners their proper proportion of the taxes thus paid. There was, of course, no contractual relation between the tenants with respect to these taxes, and it was further decided that such relation is not necessary to support the action. In Goodnow v. Moulton, 51 Iowa, 557, 558, 2 N. W. 395, the plaintiff, in the belief that he owned the land, had paid the taxes thereon during litigation with the real owner as to the title. The real owner had not paid the tax nor had he caused it to be assessed in his name. There were no contractual relations between the parties. It was held that the plaintiff could recover of the real owner the taxes thus paid. Where, by operation of law, A. is compelled to pay a debt which, in equity and good conscience, B. should have kept from being claimed, A. may recover of B. the amount so paid. Ticonic Bank v. Smiley, 27 Me. 225, 46 Am. Dec. 593. The following authorities are to the same effect: Nutter v. Sydenstricker, 11 W. Va. 535; Bailey v. Bussing, 28 Conn. 455; Nichols v. Bucknam, 117 Mass. 488; Kemp v. Cossart, 47 Ark. 62, 14 S. W. 465; Blythe v. Luning (C. C.) 7 Sawy. 506, 14 Fed. 281; Taylor v. Porter, 7 Mass. 355 (in which there was a mortgage on two parcels sold to different persons, one of whom paid all and recovered half of the other); 2 Greenl. Ev. § 114; 35 Century Dig. cols. 44, 48. This principle was applied in San Gabriel Water Co. v. Witmer Co., supra, and that case was followed in Angus v. Plum, 121 Cal. 608, 54 Pac. 97.

I can see no point lacking in the facts of this case that would be necessary to bring it within the rule of the foregoing authorities: (1) The plaintiff was compelled to pay the taxes in order to protect his own property. (2) The taxes were the personal obligations of the defendant. "Every tax has the effect of a judgment against the person." Pol. Code, § 3716. In People v. Seymour, 16 Cal. 343, 76 Am. Dec. 521, it was expressly decided that a tax is a debt, and that when a tax is duly assessed the owner of the property becomes personally liable, and may be sued therefor in all cases when there is a statute authorizing such suit. To the same effect is Oakland v. Whipple, 39 Cal. 115. There is a statute authorizing such suit. St. 1880, p.

136, c. 123, provides that any county, or city and county, "may sue in its own name for the recovery of delinquent taxes, whether the same be for county, or city and county, and state purposes, or either of them." In Los Angeles County v. Ballerino, 99 Cal. 595, 32 Pac. 581, 34 Pac. 329, this statute was said to be still in force, and it was held that under its provisions a county could sue a taxpayer to recover the taxes delinquent. (3) Being debts or at least personal obligations of the defendant, it follows that he ought to have paid them, and that under the act of 1880 he was liable to a suit by the county to recover them, and hence the payment by the plaintiff, in a legal sense, inured to the benefit of the defendant. It was the duty of the defendant to pay the tax on his property, and this duty was performed by the plaintiff under compulsion. The fact that with respect to the taxes of 1898 there had been a sale to the state before the plaintiff made payment is not material. The right of the plaintiff to be subrogated to the rights of the state include the right to be subrogated to all the remedies which the state originally had against the taxpayer. (4) Moreover, it cannot be said, from the facts of this case, that the second mortgagee suffers any hardship by being compelled to pay the taxes in question. The presumptions of law are in favor of the plaintiff. The mortgage debtor is presumed to be solvent, and there was nothing in the record here to show the contrary. Therefore the valuable element of the property upon which the taxes were assessed, namely, the debt due from the mortgagor to the second mortgagee, is presumed to be, even at the present time, worth the amount thereof, owing to the solvency of the debtor. Under the ruling of the majority, the second mortgagee will secure the payment of his taxes by another, without any liability on his part to repay them.

The opinions in McPike v. Heaton, 131 Cal. 109, 63 Pac. 179, 82 Am. St. Rep. 335, and Canadian Co. v. Boas, 136 Cal. 420, 69 Pac. 18, are clearly inconsistent with the above principles, and also with Angus v. Plum and the Witmer Case, and both of these cases proceed on erroneous lines. McPike v. Heaton rests on two propositions: First, that McPike was the second grantee, and that there was no covenant running to him from the person against whom the taxes were assessed, or, in other words, that there was no contractual relations between the plaintiff and defendant; and, second, that, as "there is no personal obligation upon the owner of land for the taxes levied against it, * * * the defendant was under no personal liability for the taxes paid by the parties"; and hence it was said San Gabriel Co. v. Witmer Co. did not apply. In the Boas Case the same propositions were made as the foundation for the decision, and it was put on the ground that the money paid by the plaintiff was not for the benefit of the defendant because of this absence of personal liability. The answer to both of these points is clear from the foregoing authorities. There was a personal liability, and the tax paid by the plaintiff was necessary to remove a burden upon the plaintiff's land arising from the neglect of the defendant to discharge his obligations to the state. The payment discharged his obligation and operated directly to his benefit.

If the defendant should show in his defense that the mortgagor was insolvent, that he had no other security, and, consequently, that his whole estate in the premises and right to the debt had been swept away and destroyed by the foreclosure of the first mortgage, and substantially merged therein, I think the same principles of justice and equity upon which the plaintiff depends would then be operative in aid of the defendant, and would require judgment in his favor. But he should be required to show this, and not have it presumed in his favor.

SAN DIEGO COUNTY v. SCHWARTZ, County Treasurer. (L. A. 1,429.)*

COUNTY TREASURER—COMPENSATION — COLLECTIONS OF INHERITANCE TAX—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. The provision of Collateral Inheritance Tax Law Act March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168) § 20, that the county treasurer shall receive, in addition to the compensation provided by the county government act, certain commissions on collections by him for the state under the act, is repealed, so far as it entitles such treasurer personally to such commissions, by County Government Act March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 507, c. 234; St. 1895, p. 10, c. 2) § 216, providing that the salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by county officers either as officers or ex officio officers, and section 236 (St. 1893, p. 513), expressly repealing all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with such act; and this though the prior county government act contained both of such provisions; Pol. Code, § 325, providing that where a section or part of a statute is amended it is not to be considered as having been repealed and re-enacted in the amended form, but the portions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted, not being applicable to such repealing provision.

*Rehearing denied October 29, 1904.

SMITH, C. This is an agreed case submitted under the provisions of section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case is properly entitled as above, though in the transcript otherwise entitled. The defendant is the treasurer of the county of San Diego, and was such during the preceding term, commencing in January, 1899. He now has in his hands of the sum collected by him as collateral inheritance taxes under the act of March 23, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 193, c. 168), a balance of $601.96, for which he is sued, and to which he claims he is personally entitled under section 20 of the act, which reads as follows: "The treasurer of each county shall be allowed to retain, on all taxes paid and accounted for by him each year, under this act, in addition to his salary or fees now allowed by law, 5 per centum on the first fifty thousand dollars so paid and accounted for by him, three per centum on the next fifty thousand dollars, so paid and accounted for by him, and one per centum on all additional sums so paid and accounted for by him." The question submitted was whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the money in question, and this again resolves itself into the question whether the provisions of section 20 of the collateral inheritance act have been so affected or modified by the county government act of March 24, 1893 (St. 1893, p. 507, c. 234; St. 1895, p. 10, c. 2), or by the subsequent county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 573, c. 277), as to entitle the plaintiff to recover. The court adjudged the contrary, and the plaintiff appeals.

The case is in principle similar to that of the County of Kern v. Fay, 131 Cal. 547, 63 Pac. 857, where a judgment for the county was affirmed; and the same judgment, we think, should have been rendered here. In that case the suit was against the district attorney to recover the sum of $630 collected by him as fees in suits for the foreclosure of certificates of purchase of state school lands, and to which defendant claimed he was entitled under section 3553 of the Political Code, which reads: "The district attorney is entitled to receive ten dollars for each suit brought to be taxed as costs." The question considered was as to the effect upon this provision of the provisions of section 216 of the county government act of 1893, which reads: "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, either as officers, or ex-officio officers, their deputies and assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided." St. 1893, p. 507, c. 234; St. 1895, p. 10, c. 2. It was held in effect: First, "that the salary prescribed by said act was intended to compensate said officer [the district attorney] in full for all services rendered by him in his official capacity," and that he could not "retain for his own use any moneys collected by him in [such] capacity;" second, that the act did not necessarily repeal the section of the Political Code in question; and, third, that whether that section was repealed or otherwise, the county was entitled to recover—the reason given for the last proposition being that "the money was collected by the appellant, Fay, in his official capacity as district attorney, and he cannot now be heard to say that it was paid to him illegally, and that he therefore has a right to retain it." These propositions effectually dispose of all the points urged by the respondent's counsel, unless the difference between the office of the district attorney and that of the treasurer is to be regarded as material; or unless the decision in that case is to be repudiated on the ground that, under the rule stated in section 325, Pol. Code, the sections of the county government act, having been a part of the previous act, are not to be considered as having been re-enacted when the act was amended in 1893, and again in 1897, but as having been the law from the time they were first enacted in 1883, and hence, that they do not repeal by implication the inconsistent provisions of the collateral inheritance tax law of 1893. We do not think the character of the particular office was regarded as material by the court, but, even if it were so, the principle would be the same in its application; for the provisions of the county government act relating especially to the treasurer even more clearly show that these and other fees were not thereafter to be received by him to his own use. St. 1893, p. 368 et seq., c. 234, §§ 70–72, 80–82, 84–89. As to the repeal by implication, it is not important to the decision of this case, for there was also an express repeal. The act of 1893, and that of 1897 as well, contained a section declaring that "all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed." St. 1893, p. 513, c. 234, § 236; St. 1897, p. 577, c. 277, § 232. It is true that this section was also contained in the previous act of 1885, but the rule of section 325, Pol. Code, cannot be applied to such repealing provisions, for, if so, it would render all such provisions after the first absolutely ineffective. The provisions of the county government act on the subject of the fees of the treasurer for the collection of inheritance taxes are directly contrary to those of the tax law in so far as the latter provides that he may apply them to his own use, and the later law is therefore a direct repeal of the former, in virtue of the repealing provision above quoted. The principles of the decision in Kern Co. v. Fay are therefore clearly applicable, even if the ground upon which the repeal was declared in that case be wrong.

As to the application of the points decided to this case, the first proposition is obviously applicable. As to the second, we are of the opinion that section 20 of the collateral inheritance act was not wholly repealed by the county government act, but was modified so that thereafter the fees retained were not for the use of the treasurer as an individual. As to the third, it is immaterial whether the moneys retained are to be held for the use of the state or for the county. If the former, they were legally in the custody, or ought to have been in the custody, of the county, until paid over to the state; and there can be no doubt that the county, even before the passage of the county government act, was entitled to sue for and recover them. Since the passage of that act there can be no doubt of the county's title. St. 1897, p. 573, § 216 et seq.

The principles of the decision in Kern Co. v. Fay, relating to the personal right of the treasurer to the fees under the county government act, have been substantially reaffirmed in the later cases of Dodge v. San Francisco, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973, and Humboldt v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 Pac. 324.

We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount in controversy.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount in controversy: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I dissent. It would serve no useful purpose to here indulge in an extended discussion, or to do more than to state that, in my opinion, there has been no repeal or modification of the provision of the collateral inheritance tax law, enacted March 23, 1893, by which the Legislature provided that the county treasurer should receive and retain, in addition to the compensation provided by the county government act, certain commissions upon all amounts collected by him for the state, under the provisions of the inheritance tax law. The three cases cited in the majority opinion do not appear to me to be at all in point. Kern Co. v. Fay, 131 Cal. 547, 63 Pac. 857, presented a question as to the right of the district attorney to retain for himself an attorney fee, collected as costs, in a certain class of actions; the alleged right being based on a section of the Political Code (section 3553) as enacted in 1872. It was very properly held therein that the effect of the subsequently adopted county government act system was to deprive the district attorney of any right to retain money under the provisions of the old section of the Political Code. The intention of the Legislature to this effect was so clearly indicated by the first county government act adopted under the Constitution of 1879 (St. 1883, p. 299, c. 75) that it could not well have been held otherwise. The County of Humboldt v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 Pac. 324, involved an entirely different question, viz., as to whether a county officer could enter into a valid contract with the county for the performance of services other than those pertaining to his office. Four of the justices held that the effect of the provisions of the county government act was "to render the officer incompetent to enter into a contract for compensation for any services he may render the county, and to render such contract void." Whether that decision was correct or not, it in no degree assists in the determination of the question here presented. Dodge v. San Francisco, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973, involved a question as to the effect of certain provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco relative to the compensation of the assessor thereof, and it was held that by reason thereof he could not receive any compensation for any official services except such as were given him by the charter, the matter of the compensation of the officers of such city and county being, under section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution, a matter concerning which it was competent to provide in the municipal charter.

TUOHY v. LINDER et al. (Sac. 1,064.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—CROPPERS' CONTRACTS —POSSESSION—RIGHTS OF LANDLORD— REPLEVIN—CHATTEL MORTGAGES.

1. Where plaintiff, the owner of certain land, contracted with T. to raise a crop of wheat thereon, by which T. agreed to harvest the crop and deliver to plaintiff at his warehouse one-fourth thereof, and that T. should receive on the ground, when threshed, the remaining three-fourths of the crop as full pay for his services, less such an amount as shall be necessary to reimburse plaintiff for any amount owing by T. to plaintiff at the time the wheat is delivered, and T., after mortgaging the crop, refused to have anything further to do therewith, whereupon plaintiff had the wheat headed and stacked, when it was removed by the mortgagee, plaintiff was entitled to recover the wheat so removed in replevin, he being entitled to possession of the entire crop, including T.'s interest against such mortgagee, until he had been reimbursed for the amount owing to him from T.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by John Tuohy against R. Linder and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. W. Zaitman and C. L. Russell, for appellants. Bradley & Farnsworth, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to recover 1,110 sacks of wheat, or the value thereof in case a delivery could not be had. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff upon the findings, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The court found that on the 26th day of July, 1900, the plaintiff was the owner in the possession and entitled to the possession of the wheat unthreshed in stacks on plaintiff's land; that while plaintiff was so the owner and in possession and entitled to the possession, the defendant Linder wrongfully, in the nighttime, went upon the plaintiff's said lands, threshed the said wheat, put it in sacks, and removed it. These findings are supported by the evidence, and entitle plaintiff to judgment. The facts are, in substance, as follows: In September, 1899, the plaintiff, being the owner of section 13 and the south half of the northwest quarter of section 14, township 20 S., R. 27 E., M. D. B. & M., entered into a contract with one Turner, under the terms of which Turner agreed to plow, seed, and harrow the said land, and to seed it with wheat for the cropping season of 1900, and when matured to cut, thresh, and clean the same, putting it in sacks in good merchantable condition. The contract provided that when Turner had so harvested the crop he would deliver to plaintiff at his warehouse one-fourth thereof, and that Turner would take "on the ground, when threshed, the remaining three-fourths of the crop as full pay for all services herein required of him. Thomas Turner also agrees to do all his work in a good farmer-like manner. In consideration of the foregoing services, John Tuohy agrees that when Thomas Turner has fully performed all of the services herein mentioned to be performed by him, and, as full pay and compensation thereof, he will deliver to Thomas Turner the three-fourths of the crop remaining on the ground when threshed." The contract contained the added provision: "Should I be owing John Tuohy any amount at the time the three-fourths of the crop is to be delivered to me, I hereby authorize him to retain sufficient wheat from the said three-fourths to pay himself in full, which I bind myself to deliver to him in the warehouse at Lindsay before the remainder of the three-fourths is moved from the ground where threshed. The value of the wheat so taken to be the best offer John Tuohy has for it at the time of delivery. Thomas Turner." Before the crop had been harvested, on June 20, 1900, Turner had been sued by defendant Linder, and he then notified plaintiff he would have nothing further to do with the crop, and for plaintiff to look out for the crop himself. Plaintiff then took charge of the crop, and at his own expense had the same headed and stacked in the stacks where it was when removed by Linder. It is evident that under the contract the plaintiff was entitled, as owner, to the undivided one-fourth of the crop, and he was also entitled to the possession of the remaining three-fourths until he was paid all the amounts due and owing to him by Turner. The amount properly expended by plaintiff in heading, caring for, and stacking the grain is due him by Turner, and he is entitled to said amount, and to retain possession of the wheat until he is paid. The three-fourths, less the amount so due to plaintiff, is the property of Turner, or those who have succeeded to his rights, but cannot be taken from the possession of plaintiff until he is paid the amounts due him by Turner. In Howell v. Foster, 65 Cal. 169, 3 Pac. 647, it is said: "There is no doubt that where one man farms land of another under an agreement by which he is to give the owner a part of the crop raised for its use, he and the owner, in the absence of a stipulation providing otherwise, become tenants in common of the crops raised. But it is just as clear that the agreement between the parties may be so framed as to secure to the owner of the land the ownership of the product until the performance of a certain stated condition." In Farnham v. Hefner, 79 Cal. 582, 21 Pac. 955, 12 Am. St. Rep. 174, the court said: "It is undoubtedly true, as contended, that the landlord and tenant may by agreement provide that all of the crops raised upon the land may be delivered to and remain the property of the landlord, and be disposed of by him, and such agreement will protect the title of the landlord in the property as against an attaching creditor of the tenant." The contract in this case clearly provides that Tuohy is to have possession of the wheat. Turner agreed that Tuohy should have such possession until Turner should deliver to the warehouse at Lindsay enough wheat to pay Tuohy in full the amount owing to him by Turner. The defendant Linder sets up by way of defense a crop mortgage executed by Turner in October, 1899, upon the crop to be grown upon the lands during the season of 1899–1900. This mortgage authorized Linder to enter upon the premises, and take all necessary measures to protect the said crop, and it provided that upon the harvesting of the crop Linder should be entitled to the immediate possession thereof. The crop mortgage was subject to all the rights of plaintiff under the contract. It could only operate upon the right, title, and interest of Turner after Tuohy had been paid all sums secured to him by the contract. It could not and did not deprive the plaintiff of his right to the possession according to the contract.

Defendant does not seek in this action to foreclose his mortgage. It is not alleged nor found that defendant Linder ever tendered to Tuohy the amount due him by Turner. In case Linder shall tender or pay to plaintiff all sums due him by Turner for seed grain, heading, and expenses incurred under the contract, then in a proper proceeding the rights of Linder under his mortgage can be adjudicated. Here the sole question is as to the right to the possession of the wheat at the time of the commencement of the action.

The finding of the court that the plaintiff is the owner of the wheat is not correct, except as to the undivided one-fourth. Such finding, however, is not necessary to support the judgment, and will not be regarded as finally deciding the title as between plaintiff and Linder. The fact that plaintiff was in possession and entitled to the possession at the time the wheat was taken and at the time of the trial entitled him to judgment. He is entitled to be placed in the position he was before the defendant entered in the nighttime and removed the wheat. The judgment is for the recovery of the wheat, or the value thereof in case a delivery cannot be had. This decision is not to prejudice the rights of Linder in any future proceedings as to the right, title, and interest of Turner after plaintiff has been paid all sums properly due him. Turner will not be allowed to defeat the rights of Linder under his mortgage by the surrender of the crop to Tuohy, nor will Tuohy be allowed to retain any more than one-fourth of the crop due him under the contract and sufficient of the remainder to pay him the amounts due him by Turner and for expenses in harvesting and caring for the property. This is fair to all parties. It does justice to Tuohy, it gives Linder the right to the balance equitably due Turner after satisfying Tuohy. Of course, we do not mean in this action to adjudicate the questions as to the foreclosure of the mortgage held by Linder, but suggest the rights of the parties for their future guidance.

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. SING YOW. (Cr. 1,111.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—PERMITTING COUNTER AFFIDAVITS — MURDER — EVIDENCE — STATEMENT OF ACCOMPLICE—RECORD ON APPEAL.

1. A motion for a new trial in a criminal case on the ground of newly discovered evidence is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court.

2. In considering a motion for a new trial in a criminal case there is always a question whether, under all the circumstances, the newly discovered evidence is produced in such a way and is of such a nature that its introduction upon another trial would render a different result reasonably probable, and whether, in the absence of such evidence, defendant has had a fair trial on the merits.

3. On a motion for a new trial in a criminal case on the ground of newly discovered evidence shown by affidavits of the proposed witnesses, it is not error for the court to permit the state to file counter affidavits.

4. A statement made by one of six men, who were standing together before a house, and who almost immediately afterward shot and killed another man, who came out of the house, to the effect that, if such person came out, "we will shoot at him," is admissible against one charged with the murder, and who was one of the six in whose hearing the statement was made.

5. Where the instructions in a criminal case are certified as provided by law, they constitute a part of the judgment roll, and should not be reproduced in the bill of exceptions, but affidavits presented on a motion for new trial and the minutes of the proceedings had on such motion constitute no part of the judgment roll, and cannot be made a part thereof by the clerk, and should appear only in the bill of exceptions.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; E. C. Hart, Judge.

Prosecution of Sing Yow for murder. From a judgment of conviction and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hiram W. Johnson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant and four others were jointly informed against in the superior court of Sacramento county for the murder of one Jeong Him, and upon a separate trial he was convicted of murder in the first degree, and adjudged to suffer death. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The principal point made upon this appeal is as to the action of the trial court in refusing to grant defendant's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The evidence on the part of the prosecution on the trial of the case was to the effect that the defendant and five other Chinese were waiting for the deceased outside of a house in Walnut Grove, Sacramento county; that when he came out to the street three of these men each fired a shot at him, and, the deceased taking to flight, the three others, of whom defendant was one, pursued him for some distance to a stable, and that each of the three fired pistol shots at him. The deceased was found at this place, dead, with some seven gunshot wounds in his body. There was ample testimony on the part of white witnesses to warrant the conclusion that the deceased was pursued by three armed Chinese to the stable, where several shots were fired. Several Chinese testified as to the identity of the six Chinese charged to have been concerned in the perpetration of the crime. On the part of the defendant it was claimed that he was not in Walnut Grove at the time of the shooting, but was several miles therefrom, and that two other Chinese, whose names were not given, did the pursuing and shooting, and testimony to this effect was given. Upon the motion for new trial, to support the claim for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, there were filed the affidavits of two Chinese, each of whom stated that he witnessed the homicide, that defendant had nothing to do with it, and that it was committed by two men named Young Lung and Yee Jim. The other affidavits filed by defendant, except those directed to showing due diligence, were directed entirely to the impeachment of certain witnesses who had testified on the trial. The object of the affidavits of three police officers of Fresno and one Chinese was to show that Lee Bin, who had testified that he witnessed the pursuit and killing of the deceased by the defendant and two others, was at the time thereof in the city of Fresno; and that of the other affidavits, all of which were made by Chinese, was to show that three of the defendants jointly charged with this defendant, and identified as having been present and having participated in the crime by witnesses for the prosecution, were not in fact present thereat, but at the time thereof were elsewhere. Six of these affidavits were filed, two as to each of said defendants.

Assuming the showing as to diligence to have been sufficient, it is very clear to us that, even if no counter affidavits had been filed, the ruling of the trial court in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence could not be disturbed. It has been repeatedly said by this court that a motion for a new trial on this ground is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and that the action of that court will not be disturbed, except in an instance manifesting a clear abuse of such discretion. A defendant is not entitled to a new trial, as a matter of right, simply because he has discovered new evidence which might have been admitted on the trial if discovered earlier. The question always exists, in this connection, as to whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the newly discovered evidence is produced in such a way, and is of such a nature, that its introduction upon another trial would render a different result reasonably probable, and as to whether, in the absence of such evidence, the defendant has had a fair trial on the merits. The law does not contemplate the granting of a new trial on this ground simply to enable the defendant to go through the form of another trial, where there is no reasonable probability that the newly discovered evidence will change the result, and where it does not appear that by reason of such evidence the result ought to be different. The question as to the effect upon the case of the newly discovered evidence is, from its nature, peculiarly one that is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and, of course, should be determined by that court with a full realization of the responsibility involved; and the motion should undoubtedly be granted where the showing is such as to make it apparent to the trial court that the defendant has, without fault on his part, not had a fair trial on the merits, and that by reason of the newly discovered evidence the result would probably be or should be different on a retrial. But, unless the appellate court can plainly see that this discretion has been abused, that the showing made was of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a new trial in view of the newly discovered evidence, the order of the trial court refusing a new trial will not be disturbed. Oberlander v. Fixen & Co., 129 Cal. 690, 692, 62 Pac. 254. See, also, People v. Demasters, 109 Cal. 607, 42 Pac. 236; People v. Buckley (Cal.) 77 Pac. 169.

The showing made by the affidavits presented on behalf of defendant was not such as to warrant us in holding that the trial court abused the discretion confided to it in this matter. In view of the evidence given on the trial, the trial court was amply warranted in concluding that the showing made by the affidavits of the two Chinese who deposed that they witnessed the homicide, and that defendant was not a party, and the affidavits of the six Chinese who deposed, in couplets, as to the presence at places away from the scene of the homicide of three of this defendant's codefendants, was not such as to indicate that a new trial ought to be granted that their evidence might be obtained, or that the introduction of such evidence would make a different result reasonably probable. The same may be said as to the affidavits relating to the witness Lee Bin. The affidavits of the three white witnesses are not inconsistent with the testimony given on the trial as to the presence of Lee Bin in Walnut Grove at the time of the homicide, and showed, at most, some conflict as to precisely how long before the homicide he had left Fresno.

It is urged, however, that the rule as to the discretion of the trial court cannot be invoked in this case, for the reason that the trial court, over the objection of defendant, erroneously allowed the prosecution to present counter affidavits on the motion for new trial as to certain of the facts proposed to be shown by the newly discovered witnesses. The counter affidavits of certain white and Chinese witnesses to the effect that Lee Bin did leave Fresno early in November, and others contradicting the allegations of defendant's affidavits as to the whereabouts of two of the codefendants, were received over the objection of defendant, and, presumably, considered by the court in deciding the motion. We are of the opinion that the court did not err in receiving these affidavits, or in taking them into consideration in determining the question as to whether a new trial should be granted. To hold otherwise would be to make it necessary for the trial court in many cases to grant a new trial upon the ex parte affidavits of perjured witnesses, where it is easily within the power of the other side to demonstrate that the new witnesses are utterly unworthy of credit, and that the allegations of their affidavits are entirely without foundation, and can be overwhelmingly overcome by the evidence of reputable persons. In such a case it would be manifest that the interests of justice did not demand a new trial, that no substantial right of the defendant had been impaired by his failure to produce the evidence on the trial, and that there was no reasonable probability of a different result by reason of such newly discovered evidence.

As has already been shown, it is well settled in this state that it is for the trial court to determine whether or not the newly discovered evidence is of such a character as to make it reasonably probable that it would produce a different result on another trial, and in the determination of that question we can conceive of no good reason why the trial court should be limited to a consideration of the affidavits offered by defendant and the record of the trial. Such, certainly, has not been the practice in this state. In People v. Fice, 97 Cal. 459, 32 Pac. 531, the record shows that the counter affidavits were entirely devoted to a contradiction of the alleged facts proposed to be proved by the newly discovered witnesses, and this court said: "Upon the ground of newly discovered evidence it is sufficient to say that the affidavits offered in support thereof were fully contradicted by counter affidavits on the part of the prosecution, and for that reason the court below exercised a proper discretion in refusing to grant the motion." See, also, Thompson v. Thompson, 88 Cal. 110, 25 Pac. 962; People v. Mesa, 93 Cal. 580, 29 Pac. 116; Merk v. Gelzhaeuser, 50 Cal. 631; Doyle v. Sturla, 38 Cal. 456. It has been held in many cases in other states that it is entirely competent to show by counter affidavits on motion for new trial that a newly discovered witness is unworthy of credit. Williams v. Baldwin, 18 Johns. 489; Parker v. Hardy, 24 Pick. 246; Pomroy v. Columbia Ins. Co., 2 Caines, 260; Erskine v. Duffy, 76 Ga. 603; Greenleaf v. Grounder, 84 Me. 50, 24 Atl. 461; Moore v. State, 96 Tenn. 209, 33 S. W. 1046; Graham and Waterman on New Trials, vol. 1, p. *485. In other cases counter affidavits as to the alleged facts to be testified to by new witnesses were allowed. Coast Line R. R. Co. v. Boston, 83 Ga. 387, 9 S. E. 1108; Harmon v. Charleston & S. Ry. Co., 88 Ga. 261, 14 S. E. 574; Harris v. Rupel, 14 Ind. 209; Searcy v. Martin-Woods Co., 93 Iowa, 420, 61 N. W. 934; Ames v. Howard, 1 Sumn. (U. S.) 482, Fed. Cas. No. 326; Lorig v. Davenport, 99 Iowa, 479, 68 N. W. 717; Finch v. Green, 16 Minn. 355 (Gil. 315); State v. Burd, 115 Mo. 405, 22 S. W. 377; Burlingame v. Cowee, 16 R. I. 40, 12 Atl. 234; Dignowitty v. State, 17 Tex. 521, 67 Am. Dec. 670; Nicholas v. Com., 91 Va. 741, 21 S. E. 364; Holland v. Huston, 20 Mont. 84, 49 Pac. 390; The Hammond, W., etc., Ry. Co. v. Spyzchalski, 17 Ind. App. 7, 16, 46 N. E. 47. In a note, in 14 Ency. of Pleading and Practice, p. 913, it is said that it is uniformly held that on the hearing of such a motion the court may examine counter affidavits to determine whether a new trial would promote justice or result in a different judgment. It is true that a different rule has been laid down in Illinois, and that rulings excluding counter affidavits have been made in one or two other jurisdictions, but the great weight of authority is to the effect that the court may consider counter affidavits for the purpose of determining whether the interests of justice demand a new trial, and as to whether there is a reasonable probability that a new trial will, by reason of such newly discovered evidence, result differently. The argument of those claiming otherwise is that the unsuccessful party should have the opportunity of presenting the newly discovered evidence to another jury, whose exclusive province it would be to determine as to the credibility of the witnesses and the facts established by the testimony. But this argument loses sight of the object of the law relative to the granting of a new trial on account of newly discovered evidence, which is to allow a new trial where it is made to appear that the newly discovered evidence is of such a character that it cannot be said that the unsuccessful party has, in the absence thereof, had a fair trial on the real merits. This question is addressed to the trial court alone. In Finch v. Green, supra, the Supreme Court of Minnesota said: "The application, which is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, is based upon the ground that there has not been a fair trial upon the real merits, and for this reason it is proposed to compel a party who has once litigated the matter in controversy to litigate it a second time. Why should not such a party be permitted to produce counter affidavits for the purpose of showing that the alleged ground for a new trial has no existence? We think no good reason can be given why he should be concluded by the ex parte affidavits of the moving party. * * * We see no warrant for saying that the court below, upon comparing the affidavits and counter affidavits with reference to the question whether a new trial would be likely to produce any different result from the first, erred in refusing the application." Such counter affidavits are received and considered, as has been said by some courts, simply for the purpose of enabling the trial court to intelligently exercise the discretionary power confided to it of determining whether or not the interests of justice demand that a new trial should be had. There is no decision of this court forbidding the practice of presenting counter affidavits. On the contrary, such practice has been fully recognized by the court as proper, for orders denying new trials have been affirmed on the ground that the showing made by the counter affidavits justified such orders. Defendant relies entirely upon some expressions contained in a concurring opinion in Shafer v. Willis, 124 Cal. 41, 56 Pac. 635. While that opinion is entitled to the greatest respect, it is not a decision of the court, and we are of the opinion that, in so far as it may be in conflict with what has here been said, it is contrary to our recognized practice and to the great weight of authority.

2. An affidavit was presented, made by defendant's attorney, setting forth certain proceedings upon the trial of another defendant, which occurred subsequent to defendant's trial, as to a change in interpreters, the result of which was that the Chinese interpreter who had officiated on the defendant's trial, and for a portion of the other trial, was relieved by the court, and another interpreter substituted, the claim of the defendant being that it was then made to appear that the interpreter who had officiated on his trial was not competent to interpret properly. We have carefully examined this affidavit, and assuming, for the purposes of this case only, that the question as to such competency is reviewable here, find nothing therein to warrant us in holding that the interpreter was not in fact competent.

3. It is urged that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct on the trial. A consideration of the points made in support of this contention discloses no misconduct prejudicially affecting defendant's cause. It must be a very exceptional case in which a reversal will be ordered by reason of the character of the opening statement of the prosecuting officer, and in this case the statement of the district attorney to the effect that he would show that the six Chinese met in front of the house in which the deceased was in accordance with a preconceived purpose to kill him was amply warranted by the evidence subsequently introduced as to the circumstances of the homicide. In the cross-examination of witnesses Brown and Fitzgerald we find nothing of such gravity or importance as to warrant a new trial. There is nothing in the cross-examination of the witness Wise to call for notice, and the jury were very fully and carefully instructed by the court that they must disregard the statement made by the district attorney, in response to a query of the court as to the object of a question asked by him of the witness Lin Tai in cross-examination.

4. It is contended that the court erred in certain rulings as to the admissibility of testimony. The evidence as to the statement made by defendant Ow Sing Dock, immediately prior to the homicide, while the six Chinese were standing in front of the house apparently waiting for the deceased to come out, was admissible. As testified by Ah Hing, that statement was, "If Jeong Him comes out of the house, we will shoot at him." It was made in the presence and hearing of the five other armed Chinese, who, as the testimony for the prosecution indicated, had assembled there with him for the purpose of killing, and who, with him, actually killed the deceased upon his coming out a few moments later, and was practically a part of the transaction itself. There is nothing in any of the other points made that requires notice.

5. Complaint is made that the court erroneously refused certain instructions requested by the defendant, and erroneously modified one such instruction. The modified instruction was one relating to the question of identity, and the court struck out therefrom a statement to the effect that the jury were not bound to believe that the witnesses were able to identify the defendant with certainty because they swore positively to his identity. The jury were instructed that to justify a conviction of the defendant his identity as the guilty person must be proved beyond all reasonable doubt, and that, if there was a reasonable doubt as to whether the witnesses were able to identify the defendant as the guilty person, they should acquit him. They were further instructed that it was their exclusive province to judge of the credibility of the witnesses, and the degree of weight and credit to be given to the testimony of each witness. Defendant could not have been prejudiced by the modification, in the respect stated, of his requested instruction. The requested instructions refused were fully and fairly covered by other instructions given by the court.

We can find nothing in the record that would warrant a reversal.

In view of the fact that the instructions given and refused and the affidavits on motion for a new trial appear twice in the transcript—once in what purports to be the judgment roll and once in the bill of exceptions—thereby enlarging the transcript by nearly 120 pages, it is proper to suggest that no possible good can be accomplished by such a repetition, except in so far as the increase of the cost of printing may be considered an advantage. Where the instructions given and refused are certified in the manner provided by law, they constitute a part of the judgment roll, and should not be reproduced in the bill of exceptions. On the other hand, affidavits presented on a motion for a new trial and the minutes of the proceedings had on such a motion constitute no part of the judgment roll (section 1207, Pen. Code), and the clerk cannot make them a part thereof, and they should appear only in the bill of exceptions.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

McFARLAND v. MARTIN et al. (Sac. 1,114.)

VENUE—ACTION CONCERNING REAL PROPERTY.

1. An action by which plaintiff seeks to have it adjudged that he is the owner of an undivided third of mining property, and to have defendants directed to execute to him a conveyance thereof, is within Code Civ. Proc. § 392, providing that actions for recovery of real property or of an interest therein, or for the determination of such interest, must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action is situated.

2. The nature of an action, as concerns its venue, is to be determined from the character of the complaint and of the judgment which may be rendered on a default, which Code Civ. Proc. § 580, provides can grant no relief in excess of what is demanded by the complaint.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by J. P. McFarland against J. P. Martin and others. From an order, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. H. Welsh and Raleigh E. Rhodes, for appellant. Geo. H. Perry and Francis A. Fee, for respondents.

HARRISON, C. Appeal from an order changing the place of trial. The action was commenced in the superior court of Madera county, and the defendants moved that court to transfer the cause for trial to the city and county of San Francisco, upon the ground that that was their place of residence at the time of the commencement of the action. The plaintiff resisted the motion upon the ground that the action is of a local nature, involving the title to certain real property in the county of Madera and the determination of the plaintiff's interest therein. The superior court granted the motion, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The complaint alleges that on the 26th of April, 1900, the plaintiff, by virtue of an agreement of sale, for a valuable consideration paid by him to John Faubel, acquired the mining property described in the complaint, and shortly after conveyed certain interests therein to the defendants; that he thereupon entered into a mining partnership with the defendants for the purpose of working said mining property, and in pursuance thereof they entered into the occupation of the same, erected valuable improvements thereon, "and have ever since been and are now actually engaged in working said mines and extracting mineral therefrom"; that he has laid out and expended large sums of money for the benefit of said partnership and the developing of said mining claims; and that large quantities of bullion have been taken from said mining claims, and have been taken possession of by the defendants, and portions thereof have been invested in improvements upon a portion of the said mining property; that on or about May 12, 1902, the defendants wrongfully and fraudulently conspired to deprive him of his share and interest in said partnership and said mining claims, and for that purpose, and in violation of their obligations as his partners, and in breach of their duty as such, acquired by purchase from said John Faubel all his interest in said mining claims, and obtained from him as grantor a deed of said mining claims to themselves individually, bearing date May 12, 1902; that the consideration for the purchase by them of said mining ground was largely contributed by the plaintiff as a mining partner of said defendants; that prior thereto the plaintiff had been the manager and superintendent of said mining claims, and had had the control and management thereof, but on said 12th day of May, 1902, the defendants ousted him therefrom, and ignored all his rights and interests thereunto, and instructed the foreman to take no orders or directions from him. The plaintiff further alleges that he claims an undivided interest in and title to said mining claims equal to that of each of the defendants, and prays judgment that they and each of them may be declared to be trustees for his benefit under said deed to them from Faubel for an undivided one-third interest in the title acquired by reason of said conveyance, and that they be required to convey the same to him by good and sufficient deed of conveyance, and also for general relief.

Succinctly stated, the plaintiff seeks by this action to have it adjudged that he is the owner of an undivided third of the mining property described in his complaint, and that the defendants be directed to execute to him a conveyance thereof. His allegations of the partnership between him and the defendants, the working of the mine under said agreement, the acquisition by them of the legal title to the property, the means by which they acquired such title, the relation of trust between them and him at the time they acquired it, and their repudiation of his right therein, are merely averments of probative facts showing his claim of title to the undivided third of the property, and that the defendants hold the same in trust for him, and that he is entitled to a conveyance thereof from them. The allegations in the complaint are not characterized with great precision, and some of them appear to lack connection with the purpose of the suit. The averment that the plaintiff laid out and expended money for the improvement of the mining property would be relevant in an action for establishing a lien therefor, under section 2514, Civ. Code, but is irrelevant in an action to determine the plaintiff's title to the mining property, except in so far as it tends to show the continued existence of the mining partnership.

Const. art. 6, § 5, provides that "all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof affected by such action or actions, is situated." Section 392, Code Civ. Proc., provides that actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial as provided in said Code: "(1) For the recovery of real property or of an estate or interest therein, or for the determination, in any form, of such right or interest, and for injuries to real property." Section 397, Code Civ. Proc., provides that the court may change the place of trial "(1) when the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county." Under the foregoing provision of the Constitution, the action was properly commenced in the county of Madera, and section 392, Code Civ. Proc., declares that it must be tried in that county, subject to the power of the court, under section 397, to change the place of trial upon one or more of the grounds authorized by statute. The only ground presented in support of the motion was that the defendants resided in the city and county of San Francisco at the time of the commencement of the action. This fact is, however, insufficient to authorize the transfer of a local action from the county in which it was properly commenced. The right of a defendant to have an action against him tried in the county of his residence is, by the terms of section 395, Code Civ. Proc., limited to "all other cases" than those enumerated in the previous sections, and is subordinate to the direction in section 392 that a local action like the present must be tried in the county where the property is situated. The authority given the court by section 397 to change the place of trial, when the county designated in the complaint is not the proper county, is a limitation upon its power, and necessarily implies that if the county designated in the complaint is the proper county, the place of trial cannot be changed, except for some other reason authorized by the Code.

The contention of the respondents that if, at the trial, the plaintiff should fail to establish his right to a conveyance, he might, under his prayer for general relief, show himself entitled to an accounting of the affairs of the partnership, and that they therefore are entitled to a change of the place of trial upon the ground that the complaint will thus authorize a judgment in a personal action, is unavailing upon this appeal. The nature of the action is to be determined from the character of the complaint and from the character of the judgment which might be rendered upon a default thereto. Under section 580, Code Civ. Proc., if there be no answer, the relief granted to plaintiff "cannot exceed that which he shall have demanded in his complaint." He can have no greater or different relief from that which he has demanded in his complaint. Mudge v. Steinhart, 78 Cal. 34, 20 Pac. 147, 12 Am. St. Rep. 17. The complaint herein does not ask for an accounting, and there is nothing in its allegations from which it may be inferred that the court could enter into an accounting of the partnership. The allegation that the plaintiff and the defendants "are now actually engaged in working said mines and extracting the mineral therefrom" clearly indicates that the partnership is a going concern, and is inconsistent with the desire for an accounting. The only grievance for which the plaintiff seeks relief is the acquisition by the defendants of the entire title to the mining property, of which he claims that he is the owner of one-third.

The decision in Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 572, 26 Pac. 356, cited by the respondents, was made upon the ground that the plaintiff had expressly asked in his complaint for an accounting. In Le Breton v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 27, 4 Pac. 777, in addition thereto, it was held that the action sought to be prohibited was not based on a lien, nor was it a suit to enforce a lien upon real estate. The present case is substantially the same in its facts as was the case of Booker v. Aitken, 140 Cal. 471, 74 Pac. 11. In that case the defendant held the title to certain real property which the plaintiff alleged had been acquired under such circumstances (setting forth the same in his complaint), that he held it in trust for the estate of the plaintiff's testator, and prayed that it be so adjudged, and that the defendant execute a conveyance of the same. The action was brought in the county in which the property was situated, and it was held that the fact that the defendant was a resident of another county did not give him the right to have the place of trial changed to such county.

We advise that the order be reversed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

JOHNSON v. MINER et al. (S. F. 3,091.)

QUIETING TITLE — NONRESIDENTS — ACTIONS — SUMMONS — PUBLICATION—AFFIDAVIT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—ATTACHMENT—LEVY—TIME —SUFFICIENCY.

1. The jurisdiction of the court in an action against a nonresident to make an order for the publication of the summons after the filing of the complaint rests entirely on the affidavit for publication, showing the facts specified by Code Civ. Proc. § 412, and not on the prior levy of an attachment on defendant's real estate, situated within the state, such attachment being only necessary to support a judgment in favor of plaintiff.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 1, provides that an attachment may be levied on real property standing in the name of a defendant by filing with the recorder of the county a copy of the writ, with a description of the property attached, and a notice that it is attached, and by leaving a similar copy of the writ, description, and notice with the occupant of the property, if there be one; otherwise by posting the same in a conspicuous place thereon. Subdivision 2 provides that real property belonging to a defendant, and standing in the name of another person, must be attached by filing with the recorder a copy of the writ, etc., and by leaving with the occupant, if any, or such other person or his agent, if known, a copy of the writ, and, if there is no occupant, by posting on the property. Held, that where vacant property sought to be attached had been conveyed by defendant, who was a nonresident, by a trust deed, which was void on its face, an attachment was properly levied thereon under subdivision 1, and it was not necessary either to leave with, or mail a copy of the writ to, the grantee in the deed.

3. An affidavit for the publication of a summons, reciting that at the time of the commencement of the action, and ever since, defendant was and has been absent from the state, and residing out of the state, and now resides, as affiant is informed and believes, at S., in the state of New York, was not subject to collateral attack on the ground that the statements contained therein were on information and belief only.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. A. Belcher, Judge.

Action by Roger Johnson against O. F. Miner and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant McDonald Spencer and others appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. P. Eells, for appellants. Roger Johnson, in pro. per.

GRAY, C. Action to quiet title, with prayer for possession. Both parties deraign title to the disputed land from R. H. McDonald. The plaintiff claims title under an execution sale made to plaintiff's grantor in the suit of McGowan v. R. H. McDonald. The defendants and appellants claim title by virtue of a deed executed by R. H. McDonald to the defendant Miner, in trust to hold and lease the land during the life of one Frank V. McDonald, and at his death to convey to the children of said Frank V. McDonald, and, the children of the latter failing, to the children of Mrs. Mattie Spencer. Frank V. McDonald died childless, and the trustees thereafter conveyed to the four children of Mrs. Spencer, pursuant to the trust. These four children are made defendants, and they bring this appeal from the judgment in plaintiff's favor and from an order denying them a new trial.

It seems to be conceded by appellants that the trust deed through which they deraign title, being a trust to convey, is void under the decision in the "Fair Will Case," 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70. Their attack upon the judgment herein is directed towards the judgment in the case in which execution sale was made to plaintiff's grantor. It is contended that the judgment in that case is void for the reason that the court failed to obtain jurisdiction of the person of the defendant therein. It appears that the judgment in McGowan v. McDonald is based upon a service of summons by publication, the defendant therein residing at the time out of this state. It is claimed that, the defendant residing out of the state, the court had no power or jurisdiction to order publication of summons until an attachment had been first duly levied on some real estate belonging to defendant and situated in this state. The affidavit for publication of summons in McGowan v. McDonald was filed May 28, 1895, and the order of publication was made the same day. The writ of attachment in the case was placed in the hands of the sheriff on May 25, 1895, and on the same day he filed a copy of it in the recorder's office. On May 29, 1895, he posted a copy upon the land, and on the 31st of the same month he mailed a copy to Miner, in whose name he certified the title stood. We do not think the power of the court to order publication of summons depended upon a previous levy of the writ of attachment. By the filing of the complaint the court acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and was thereby placed in a position where it could proceed to acquire jurisdiction of the person of defendant. The defendant being a nonresident of the state, the law required the issuance of a summons, the issuance of a writ of attachment and valid levy of the same upon defendant's real estate situated in this state; also an order for publication of summons based upon the necessary affidavit, and a due service of summons by publication. All these steps must be taken to give the court jurisdiction to enter final judgment against the defendant, to the end that the said property of defendant might be applied in a lawful way to the satisfaction of the plaintiff's cause of action. But so far as the jurisdiction of the court is concerned, the order of these several steps is immaterial. The jurisdiction of the court to make the order of publication rests altogether upon the affidavit for publication showing the facts required by the provision of section 412, Code Civ. Proc. It is not required in this section or elsewhere in the law that it shall be made to appear by affidavit or otherwise that a writ of attachment has been levied as a preliminary step to the order of publication, and it is not for the court to require anything in addition to the requirements of the Code. The proceeding for the publication of summons is distinct and separate from the proceeding in attachment. The judgment against a nonresident is dependent upon both these proceedings, but neither of the proceedings is dependent upon the other. The defendant in the action will be presumed to know that he has property in the state, and service of summons by publication as directed by the Code will serve as notice to him that, if he does not appear and defend against the action, the plaintiff will not only take judgment against him, but he is liable to also take all such steps preliminary thereto as will make that judgment effective as against said property. He is bound to take knowledge of the Code, and know that the plaintiff can fully avail himself, of the attachment law of the state without giving him any actual notice thereof. The case discloses a substituted service of summons as required by law, and a levy of attachment as required by law prior to such service, and that is all that was necessary. In Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal., at page 69, 13 Pac. 75, 1 Am. St. Rep. 34, it is said: "Nor was it necessary to show by the affidavit that a writ of attachment had issued, or that the defendants had property in this state. Our statute gives the right to service of summons upon defendants in all cases where they are nonresidents of the state, without reference to the fact of their having or not having property here. The effect of a judgment thus obtained is quite another thing." It may be well also to observe in this connection that our Code does not limit either the issuance or levy of a writ of attachment to any particular time during the pendency of the action, but permits it to be issued "at the time of issuing the summons or at any time afterwards." Code Civ. Proc. § 537. This section is general, and applies to cases where substituted service is had as well as to others.

Appellants next contend that there was no valid levy of the attachment in McGowan v. McDonald, for the reason that the sheriff mailed a copy of the writ to Miner, in whose name the property is claimed to have stood of record, instead of leaving it with him, as provided in subdivision 2 of section 542, Code Civ. Proc. It is conceded by all parties, and correctly so, that a valid levy of the attachment was necessary to give validity to the judgment against the nonresident defendant. We think the levy of the attachment was valid. The deed from McDonald to Miner is conceded to have been void on its face for the reason that it was intended to establish a trust to convey. It could be seen, therefore, from the record, that the deed was void, and that the property was not in the grantee named in the deed, but that in fact the property stood of record in the name of McDonald. This being so, the proper method of levying the attachment is to be found not in subdivision 2, but in subdivision 1 of section 542, Code Civ. Proc., and it was entirely unnecessary to either leave with or mail to Miner a copy of the writ. It was sufficient to post the copy on the unoccupied premises after filing with the recorder as is shown by the sheriff's return. In the absence of a showing to that effect, we will not presume that the title stood in the name of any person other than McDonald. Nor will we be bound by the certificate of the sheriff that the title stood of record in Miner's name, when this certificate is contradicted by an inspection of the instrument placed in evidence by the appellants themselves, and upon which rests all the claim they have to the land in dispute. It would be highly improbable to suppose that any valid or other deed than the one placed in evidence passed from McDonald to Miner. If any such other deed could have been found of record, appellants would have brought it forward as a link in the chain of title they were trying to establish.

Appellants further contend that the affidavit for publication of summons in McGowan v. McDonald is insufficient in that the statements contained in the affidavit are upon information and belief. They quote from the affidavit as follows: "That at the time of the commencement of the action, and ever since, said defendant was and has been absent from the state of California, and residing out of said state; and now resides, as affiant is informed and believes, at Schenectady, in the state of New York." It will be noticed that the statement in the above is positive as to the fact of the defendant "residing out of said state." The "information and belief" relates only to the then present place of his residence. As against the attack, which is here collateral, we deem the affidavit entirely sufficient to sustain the jurisdiction of the court to make the order of publication. The statute authorizing publication of summons requires only that it appear that the defendant reside out of the state. It is not a part of the ground for publication of summons that it shall appear where, outside of the state, the defendant resides. Nor was the statement of the nonresidence of defendant contained in the affidavit given in the form of an opinion, but, on the contrary, it is a positive statement of the fact of residence out of the state.

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

In re BURLEIGH. (Cr. 1,160.)

PUBLIC OFFICERS—ACCUSATION—INDICTMENT—OFFENSE—PLURALITY OF OFFENSES.

1. Pen. Code, § 888, provides that all public offenses triable in the superior court shall be prosecuted by indictment or information, except as provided in the next section, which declares that, when proceedings are had for the removal of county, municipal, or township officers, they may be commenced by an accusation or information in writing, as provided in sections 758, 772. Const. art. 4, § 18, provides, after making a provision for the impeachment of the Governor and other named state officers before the Senate, that "all other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanors in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide." Pen. Code, § 917, declares that an indictment is an accusation, in writing, presented by a grand jury "to a competent court," charging a person with a public offense; and section 758 declares that an accusation must be delivered by the foreman of the grand jury to the district attorney. Held, that an accusation of a public officer for offenses in office, brought merely for the purpose of removing him from office, was not an indictment, and hence was not objectionable on the ground that it contained more than one offense.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County.

H. G. Burleigh was accused of certain misconduct in his office of supervisor, and, from an order sustaining a demurrer to the accusation, the state appeals. Dismissed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Geo. W. Jones, Dist. Atty., for appellant. Frank H. Short, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. A written accusation under sections 758 et seq. of the Penal Code was made by a grand jury, charging the respondent, Burleigh, with misconduct in his office of supervisor. He filed what, we suppose, may be called a demurrer; that is, a written document containing objections "to the legal sufficiency of the accusation" as provided in sections 762 and 763. The demurrer was based on several grounds, and, among others, that the accusation did not substantially conform to the provisions of the Penal Code, or section 950, 951, or 952 thereof, and that more than one offense was charged. The court below sustained the demurrer, stating in its order that it was sustained for the reason that more than one offense was charged therein. The people appeal from the judgment.

The appellants concede that, if the accusation is to be treated as an indictment, then the demurrer was properly sustained. They contend, however, that an accusation under section 758 is not an indictment. They also concede that, if that be so, then the people have no appeal, and this appeal would have to be dismissed. Notwithstanding this peculiar position occupied by appellants, still, in order to reach the proper judgment to be rendered on this appeal—that is, whether we should consider the judgment of the court below, and either affirm or reverse it, or whether we should dismiss the appeal—it seems necessary to determine whether or not the accusation under section 758 is, in law, an indictment, and the trial under it subject to the rules which apply to the trial of an indictment; and, in our opinion, such accusation is not an indictment, and is not to be treated as such.

The main argument of respondent is that an accusation comes strictly within the definition of an indictment, which is defined in section 917 as follows: "An indictment is an accusation in writing presented by the grand jury to a competent court, charging a person with a public offense." But an accusation under section 758 is not an accusation "presented by a grand jury to a competent court"; it "must be delivered by the foreman of the grand jury to the district attorney." When an indictment is found by a grand jury it "must be presented by their foreman in their presence to the court" (section 944), and must have certain indorsements; and the defendant may, on motion, have the indictment set aside "where it is not found, endorsed, and presented as prescribed in this Code." Section 995. The proceedings on an indictment, and the consequences following a judgment thereon, are entirely different from those accompanying the trial on an accusation under section 758. A warrant of arrest follows an indictment, under which the defendant is immediately imprisoned unless he gives bail. Nothing of the kind occurs on an accusation; the party accused is merely served by the district attorney with a copy of the accusation, and notified to appear within a certain time and answer it, and may appear or not as he chooses, as in a civil action. In an indictment, only one public offense can be charged; its main purpose is to punish the defendant for the commission of a crime, and an acquittal or conviction is a bar to a future prosecution for the offense charged. The main purpose of the accusation under section 758 is to remove a person from public office for misconduct in such office; the misconduct charged need not necessarily include an act which would itself constitute a crime, and, if it does include such crime, the judgment on the accusation would not be a bar to a subsequent prosecution for such crime. The judgment can go only to the extent of a removal from office. The provisions of the Penal Code clearly make a distinction between an indictment or information, and the procedure by accusation here under review. Section 682 provides that "every public offense must be prosecuted by indictment or information except—1. Where proceedings are had for the removal of civil officers of the state." Again, it is provided in section 888 that "all public offenses triable in the superior court must be prosecuted by indictment or information, except as provided in the next section;" and the next section (889) provides that "when the proceedings are had for the removal of district, county, municipal, or township officers, they may be commenced by an accusation or information in writing, as provided in sections 758 and 772." In section 18 of article 4 of the Constitution, after a provision for the impeachment, before the Senate, of the Governor and other named state officers, it is provided that "all other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanors in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide." The Legislature, perhaps, might have provided that the proceeding for the removal of an officer should be by indictment, and, if that had been the intent, a few words would have expressed it. That, however, was clearly not the intent, for the Legislature, by 758 and succeeding sections, has elaborately provided an entirely different procedure. These sections immediately succeed the sections relating to impeachment before the Senate, and they are evidently intended to be similar in character to articles of impeachment. This intent is emphasized in section 762, which provides that the accused may object to the sufficiency of the accusation "or of any article therein." There are no decisions of this court in point. In the case of People v. Ward, 85 Cal. 585, 24 Pac. 785, cited by respondent, the point was not raised, and the one or two allusions in the opinion to the proceeding as an indictment were evidently merely for convenience of statement, and are not to be taken as a decision of a question not before the court. It was held there that the charge against the appellant was insufficient because there was "no averment of any illegal act by appellant," and that ground of reversal would have been good whether the proceeding was considered as an indictment, or as an accusation within the meaning above stated. But as the appellants concede that, if the accusation is not an indictment, the people have no appeal, therefore the appeal herein must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

RICHARDS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Cr. 1,202.)

COURT REPORTERS—DUTY TO FURNISH TRANSCRIPTS—DUTY OF JUDGE TO FIX TIME FOR FILING.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 269, provides that the official reporter must, if directed by the court or requested by either party, within such reasonable time after the trial of a case as the court may designate, transcribe, in longhand or by typewriter, the testimony taken on the trial, or such portions thereof as may be requested, and when directed by the court file the same with the clerk, duly certified. Section 274 provides that when such transcript is ordered by the court the fees of the reporter shall be a charge against the county. Held, that section 269 does not require a reporter, in either a civil or criminal case, to make a transcript at the request of a party, unless his proper fees therefor are paid or tendered.

2. Such section imposes no duty on the court to designate a reasonable time within which a transcript shall be filed, unless such action is taken as to make it the duty of the reporter to furnish the transcript, either by payment of his fees or by obtaining an order of the court therefor.

In Bank. Application by Edward Richards for a writ of mandate against the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, William P. Lawlor, judge of said court, and Platt B. Elderkin, official reporter. Writ denied.

Milton Shepardson, for petitioner.

HENSHAW, J. This is an original petition for a writ of mandate against the respondents, the Hon. W. P. Lawlor, judge of the superior court, and Platt B. Elderkin, his official phonographic reporter. The application for a writ is based upon the provisions of section 269, Code Civ. Proc., as follows: "Such reporter, or any one of them, where there are two or more, must, at the request of either party, or of the court in a civil action or proceeding, and on the order of the court, the district attorney, or the attorney for defendant in a criminal action or proceeding, take down in shorthand all the testimony; * * * and if directed by the court, or requested by either party, must, within such reasonable time after the trial of such case as the court may designate, write out the same, or such specific portions thereof as may be requested, in plain and legible longhand, or by typewriter, or other printing machine, and certify to the same as being correctly reported and transcribed, and when directed by the court, file the same with the clerk of the court." As to the phonographic reporter, a demand or request for a transcription is alleged, with the reporter's refusal to comply therewith. As to the judge, it is averred that after request he has refused to designate a reasonable time within which the transcription by the phonographic reporter shall be made.

We are of the opinion that as to neither of the respondents should the writ issue. We are further of the opinion that for the correction of possible abuses, and for the elucidation of the proper procedure in such cases, a brief exposition of the matter will be both pertinent and valuable.

First, as to the judge: Section 269 contemplates that, in the exercise of his sound discretion, the judge may order a transcript of the proceedings, or of any part of them, to be made by the phonographic reporter. When so ordered by the judge, or "by the court," the fees of the phonographic reporter become a proper charge against the county treasury. Code Civ. Proc. § 274. Section 269 further contemplates that in a proper case the trial court, when called upon, will designate the "reasonable time" within which the phonographic reporter shall file the transcription of his notes. A proper case is one where it has become the duty of the phonographic reporter to make the transcription, and where, for the orderly and expeditious procedure of the case, the court is appealed to to designate the time within which the phonographic reporter shall perform his duty. But, manifestly, if the case be one where the shorthand reporter is not called upon to make a transcript, it is not one which calls for a declaration of time upon the part of the court.

The application for a writ against the respondent judge for having refused to designate such a time is denied, because, for reasons next hereinafter to be considered, the case was not one calling for a declaration from the court.

We thus come to, second, the rights of the parties and the duties of the phonographic reporter. Section 269 in this regard provides that the reporter must, if requested by either party, transcribe such specific portions of his notes as may be designated. We have already seen that when this request is made by the court the law expressly provides that the phonographic reporter's fees shall be a charge against the county treasury. But where the request is made by either party, it becomes the duty of the reporter to make the transcription only upon tender or payment to him of his legal fees and charges. A defendant in a criminal case, like a defendant in a civil case, is chargeable with fees as to all matters, saving those from the payment of which he is especially exempted by law. He is so especially exempted as to certain matters. He is exempted from bearing all or any part of the costs of his trial. Upon his appeal the state, in its liberality, requires the county clerk to prepare and print, as a county charge, his transcript. By express enactment of law, no fee is exacted for the filing of his papers upon appeal in this court. But each and all of these exemptions are matters of express statutory enactment. Where the Codes are silent, the costs are still thrown upon a defendant in a criminal case, as well as upon a defendant in a civil case. Thus the defendant must himself pay for the printing of the brief which he presents to this court. The same holds true when a demand is made directly upon the phonographic reporter for a transcript of all or any part of the proceedings upon his trial. If he orders it himself he must pay for it himself, and until he pays the phonographic reporter is not compelled to do the work. If he is unable to pay, an appeal may always be made to the judge, who will thus have an opportunity to review the request, and to designate the transcription of such portions of the record as may be fit and necessary for the purpose intended, and in such cases the rights of the county are preserved, in that the expenses of an excessive transcript are not cast upon it, and, upon the other hand, the defendant's rights are fully protected, since, without cost to him, he has obtained all that he is entitled to present upon his appeal.

The construction contended for by petitioner would lead to unbearable abuses and untold extravagance. It would result that in every criminal case in which a conviction was had, by the mere request of the defendant, he could cause every word of the proceedings to be transcribed, and the cost of the transcription made a burden upon the county. Under such a system it would, at least, be a question whether or not the state could not better permit the depredations of felons to go unpunished, as causing the community less loss than would their successful prosecution to convictions.

Therefore, to sum up, we hold that it is the duty of the phonographic reporter to comply with the request made by either of the parties litigant, only upon payment to him of his fees; that it is his duty, when ordered by the court, to furnish transcripts, his fees being then a charge upon the county treasury.

For the foregoing reasons the petition for mandate is denied.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

CONTINENTAL BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. BOGGESS et al. (Sac. 1,282.)

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—DEFENSES—SHAM PLEADING—MOTION TO STRIKE OUT.

1. Where the mortgage given by a borrowing stockholder of a building association provided that on foreclosure the surrender value of the borrower's stock might be applied on the mortgage debt, and the stock should then become the property of the association, an answer in foreclosure which does not deny that the credit given thereon on account of the stock was its actual surrender value, computed in accordance with the by-laws, does not state any ground of defense by an allegation that, because of mismanagement of the association, such credit is less than it should have been.

2. It is error to strike out as sham a verified answer, or a portion thereof which alleges matter constituting a defense, although it contains other irrelevant or evidential matter. In such case the motion should go only to the objectionable matter.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by the Continental Building & Loan Association against Emma A. Boggess and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Frank M. Stone, for appellants. Gavin McNab, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Foreclosure of mortgage executed to plaintiff by defendants Emma A. and Riley A. Boggess on certain property situated in the city of Marysville, Yuba county, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $3,000. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendants appeal on bill of exceptions.

It was recited in the mortgage that the mortgagors, having subscribed for 30 shares of the capital stock of plaintiff corporation at the par value of $100 each, evidenced by certificate No. 15,935, the mortgagors promised to pay to mortgagee said amount in monthly installments of 30 cents per month for each said share, on the 15th of each month, until fully paid by said payments and by the dividends and accumulations on said shares, and further to pay the monthly premium of $18 on said loan on the 15th day of each month until said shares are fully paid; and as further security for the payment of said promissory note and interest and the par value of said shares mortgagors pledged the said shares, and in case of foreclosure of said mortgage, or the nonpayment of said promissory note or interest, or the said installments as above set forth, or the premium, mortgagee "may apply, at its option, without notice to said mortgagors, the cash surrender value of said shares, as provided in the by-laws of said corporation, * * * to the payment of said promissory note, and the said shares shall thereupon become the property of and vest in said mortgagee." Other provisions to cover advances, payment of taxes, and similar provisions usual to mortgages, are set forth in the mortgage. It is alleged in the complaint, also, that plaintiff did by resolution declare the whole of said note and mortgage due and payable, and elected to foreclose the mortgage; that the advances, installments, and premiums on said loan from March 15, 1901, amount to $851.40; that the cash surrender value of said certificate No. 15,935 of plaintiff's said stock, pledged to plaintiff, was, on March 23, 1903, the day of passing said resolution declaring said note to be due, the sum of $18.41. Demand of payment and refusal is alleged, with usual prayer for sale of premises, etc.

Defendants, answering, admitted the execution of the note and mortgage set forth in the complaint; on information and belief denied that plaintiff passed the resolution above referred to; and on information and belief denied that plaintiff made any further advances, and denied that interest, installments, and premium on said loan amount to $851.40, or any other sum. Further answering the complaint, and particularly that portion which alleges the cash surrender value of said certificate No. 15,935, the answer, after alleging the existence of plaintiff corporation (which is but an admission of the allegation in the complaint), proceeds, in folios 65 to 75, to set forth sundry matters which are apparently intended to show that the cash surrender value of said certificate should have been "largely in excess of the value of $18.41," if the affairs of the corporation had been properly and honestly managed. A motion was made by plaintiff and granted by the court to strike out this portion of the answer, designated "a" in the motion, on the ground that it is "sham and irrelevant and surplusage," and not "proper matter of averment," and does not "show any defense to an action to foreclose a mortgage." This motion was granted. The answer then sets forth what is called "an equitable and for a further and distinct defense." This portion of the answer (omitting the unnecessary allegation of the existence of plaintiff corporation) is contained in folios 77 to 99. Designating this matter as "b," plaintiff made a motion to strike it out on the same grounds as already stated, which motion was granted.

The portion ("a") of the answer, above referred to, briefly stated, is to the effect that one Corbin was, at the time the mortgage was executed and up to the time of the passage of said resolution fixing the value of said certificate, the secretary and manager of plaintiff corporation; that its affairs "have been corruptly, dishonestly, and improperly managed by said William Corbin"; that he misapplied and misused large sums of plaintiff's money "as manager of said corporation and in his individual capacity"; that plaintiff attempted to recoup its losses through the acts of said Corbin, and that the property received from him by plaintiff with that view is being carried on plaintiff's books at a valuation "far in excess of the real value of said property so taken"; that plaintiff's affairs have been so conducted by its officers and managers as to greatly decrease the surrender value of said certificate No. 15,935, and that, if the said affairs had been "properly and honestly managed, the cash surrender value of said certificate of stock would be greatly in excess of the sum of $18.41"; that equity requires that the cash surrender value of said certificate should be credited "in the same manner and to the same amount as if the business affairs of said corporation plaintiff had been honestly conducted"; that a large amount of money has been paid by plaintiff "in an improper manner as dividends upon what is termed nonborrowing stock," thus diminishing the surrender value of said certificate; that said Corbin improperly withdrew large sums belonging to plaintiff, and charged the same improperly to traveling expenses, thus depreciating the value of said stock. The facts, set forth with much greater particularity than we have given them, are stated by the pleader, we presume, to show that the certificate should have had a greater surrender value than $18.41. The issuable fact in this case, in this respect, was the surrender value of the certificate. It was entirely immaterial what such surrender value might have been if the affairs of the plaintiff corporation had been differently managed. The agreement of the parties, as shown by the mortgage, was that the actual surrender value should be allowed. The complaint alleged that such actual surrender value was $18.41. This allegation was not denied by the matter stricken out, designated heretofore as "a," and, so far as we can see, such portion in no way constituted any answer or defense to plaintiff's cause of action, and was properly eliminated by the order.

The portion of the answer designated in the motion as "b" is composed to considerable extent of evidentiary matter purely defensive, and contains some allegations of fact entirely irrelevant and immaterial. Still there are facts properly alleged which show an agreement on the part of plaintiff by which plaintiff agreed that, when plaintiff had realized sufficient money out of the mining property mortgaged to it, plaintiff would pay defendant Emma Boggess an amount equaling her indebtedness to plaintiff. It was alleged that plaintiff did realize the money, and it thus became equitably bound to apply it in payment of her debt to it. Civ. Code, § 1479. The answer was verified, and it is urged that to strike it out as sham was error; citing Greenbaum v. Turrill, 57 Cal. 285. We do not think it can be said that the answer was sham, which means an answer good in form but false in fact, and not pleaded in good faith (Id); and to warrant applying the severe rule of striking the answer from the record the matter must be shown to be unquestionably false and not pleaded in good faith. And. Dict. tit. "Sham," and cases cited. This cannot be said of the answer in the present case. All the matter set up as equitable defense, and designated in the motion as "b," was stricken out. The grounds of the motion, other than that it was "sham," were that it does not tend to show any defense to the action, and is irrelevant and surplusage. This is true to some extent, as already intimated, but it is not true as to the entire answer. A motion to strike out the irrelevant averments would, therefore, have been proper. The object of such a motion is to rid the pleading of its objectionable averments only. The cases cited by respondent as to the rule where redundant or irrelevant matter is alleged are cases, so far as we have found, where the objectionable averments only were attacked. To illustrate: Suppose, in an action involving title to real estate, the pleader should allege ownership by sufficient averments, and should then proceed to set forth his chain of title. On motion these latter averments would be stricken out as surplusage and evidentiary matter, but not the entire pleading. See the subject discussed in Pomeroy's Code Remedies (4th Ed.) §§ 422, 423, 445. We think it was error to strike out the whole of this portion of the answer.

It is advised that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

DWINNELL v. DYER et al. (Sac. 1,024.)

MINING LOCATIONS—FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH STATE STATUTE—REPEAL OF STATUTE—ACTION TO QUIET TITLE—FINDING—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Locators of a mining claim took all the steps necessary to constitute a valid location under the laws of the United States, but failed to comply with Act March 27, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159), prescribing the manner of making mining locations, etc. This latter statute was repealed by Act March 20, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 148, c. 113), and Act February 8, 1900 (St. 1900, p. 9, c. 6). The locators went into possession after the original location, and were in possession when the repealing acts were passed, and remained in possession thereafter. Held, that the repealing acts left the location unaffected by the statute repealed, so that it was a valid location under the statutes of the United States.

2. In an action to quiet title to a mining claim, in which plaintiff claimed under a location made in 1900, where it appeared that defendant had long prior to that time made a location which was confessedly invalid at the time it was made, a finding to this effect is not sufficient to dispose of the material issue as to whether defendant had made a valid location before plaintiff's location was made.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; J. S. Beard, Judge.

Action by G. W. Dwinnell against W. F. Dyer and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The following is the opinion in department, referred to in the dissenting opinion:

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff alleges ownership of a quartz mine called Cuban Beauty No. 2, situated in Siskiyou county; that defendants unlawfully entered upon plaintiff's said land with force and arms, and drove off plaintiff's men there employed, and are excavating gold-bearing rock contained therein. It is prayed that defendants be enjoined from interfering with said mining property, and that plaintiff be adjudged to be the owner thereof. Defendants Oscar Dyer and Charles Truesdale disclaimed all interest in the land in controversy. Defendant W. F. Dyer answered, claiming ownership in certain three mining claims, known as Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 1 and No. 2 and No. 3. It is alleged that a portion of plaintiff's said claim overlaps a portion of Squaw Creek Gold Mines Nos. 2 and 3; ownership is claimed at the commencement of the action and some time prior thereto, and that defendant and his predecessor in interest have been in possession continuously since September 12, 1898, and since said date have been entitled to possession; denies plaintiff's ownership of any part of said overlapping ground; denies interference with plaintiff or claim of his said alleged claim except as to said triangular piece. The court found the facts for the plaintiff, and, as conclusions of law, found that plaintiff is the owner, and entitled to have defendants restrained from interfering therewith. Judgment was accordingly entered, from which, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

Certain errors of law occurring at the trial are specified by defendant, but, as they are not noticed in his brief, they will be deemed waived. Appellants' contention is that the evidence does not sustain the findings in certain particulars, namely: (1) That at the time plaintiff made his location, November 26, 1900, the ground was unoccupied and subject to location; the contention of defendant being that he had long prior to that date made a valid location of ground including that in dispute. (2) Under like contention, the finding is claimed as unsupported that plaintiff complied with law. (3) Also as unsupported that one Grant Davis had attempted to locate the same land as that covered by plaintiff's location, and thereafter sold and conveyed the same to plaintiff; and this because the Davis location was in conflict with a prior location by defendant; that the Davis location did not include any ledge in place; that Davis had made no discovery of mineral in place within the lines of his location. (4) Also as unsupported, so far as concerns defendant, that the attempted early locations of Davis and of defendant Dyer and Phillips were not made in compliance with the law then in force, to wit, the act of March 27, 1897, of this state; defendant's contention being that his location was valid.

There is evidence that Davis made his location October 30, 1898, on which day he posted notice at the center of the north line of the claim bordering on the so-called Cuban Beauty. The lines were run out, and corners marked. The notice was not recorded until September 8, 1899. The Cuban Beauty and the Dewey, both of which corner with the Cuban Beauty No. 2 at the northeast corner of the latter, were located at the same time by the Davis party, and formed one group of mines. Davis subsequently also located the Black Bear No. 2, which lies south of and adjoining the Cuban Beauty, and west of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and joins it, but extends south less than half the length of the latter. He conveyed to plaintiff on November 27, 1899, by deed placed in escrow, which was delivered on compliance with the contract of sale in September, 1900. There is evidence, though not without conflict, that when these locations were made there was no other location, or signs of any other location, of the ground involved. On November 26, 1900, plaintiff relocated the Cuban Beauty No. 2 through one Cousins, who did the work. This location was intended to be and was substantially identical with the original Davis location. Cousins testified that Davis had previously shown him the lines and corners, and in January, 1900, defendant Oscar Dyer, in company with Davis, showed him some of the lines and corners. Speaking of the relocation in November, 1900, he testified: "At the time I located this claim, I went all over it. As for mining work, there was a small hole dug on it. In some small places it was picked a little. There wasn't a square yard of dirt or rock moved in any one place. I don't think it would amount to a cubic yard." When Oscar Dyer was with Cousins in January, 1900, he told Cousins that his brother (defendant) claimed the ground west of the southeast corner of the Davis claim, and that more than the assessment work had been done. Cousins testified: "I then said that I had seen they had. But it wasn't on what we claimed. They hadn't hit a lick of work on what we claimed. North of our south line he had done a lot of work upon the hill and on the ground we didn't claim."

It appears from plaintiff's testimony that he relocated the Cuban Beauty No. 2 because of some doubt of the legality of the Davis location under the state mining law of 1897, and his attempt to do the assessment work was in order to hold the claim if the Davis location was legal. As to the relocation in 1900, the assessment work becomes immaterial, as it might be done at any time during the year 1901, and the action was tried in August of that year. It also appeared from plaintiff's testimony that he acquired all the Davis group of claims, and the contract of sale calls for the payment of $125,000 for all the mines. There were some others besides the three mentioned by plaintiff in his testimony following: "There were three claims—the Cuban Beauty, the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and the Admiral Dewey—and that work [the assessment work for 1899] on the Admiral Dewey was supposed to develop the three claims, and was done for that purpose, and then I did the assessment work for those three claims on the Admiral Dewey. I spent about three thousand dollars on the Admiral Dewey for the time in doing it. I ran about 500 feet of tunnels, and then I built some buildings, and then I fixed the trail and general development of the mining claims." Allen Davis testified that he was working on the Dewey mine about May 1, 1899, and met defendant William Dyer there at that time; and, in a conversation, Dyer, in reply to a question as to the line between sections 6 and 7, and as to whether his location extended into section 6, pointed out about where the section line was, and stated: "I haven't got anything in 6. All of mine is in section 7." The south line of the Cuban Beauty No. 2 is admittedly a considerable distance north of this section line—"three or four hundred feet," as testified by witness Cousins. Dyer's claims did in fact extend onto section 6, and he probably meant no more in his statement to Cousins and those present than that he claimed nothing within the lines of the Davis location of the Cuban Beauty No. 2. Dyer knew where the section line was, and so testified. The court found that the Squaw Creek No. 2 included some of the ground embraced in the Cuban Beauty No. 2.

It is not necessary to discuss the validity of the original location by Davis, for the court found that it was not made in conformity with the state law (St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159), and the finding cannot be questioned by plaintiff. Cowing v. Rogers, 34 Cal. 648. Nor do we think it necessary to examine the evidence particularly as to the validity of the Dyer locations made about the same time, for they also failed to comply with the statute, and the court so found. Dyer subsequently posted a new notice, January 14, 1899, recorded March 13, 1899. The statute above referred to was in force until February 28, 1899, when it was repealed. St. 1899, p. 148, c. 113. Dyer claims under this location, as well as his location in 1898. But we think the evidence fails to establish the validity of either location, while there is evidence showing the validity of plaintiff's location of November 26, 1900. As we understand the purpose of the evidence as to these early locations, it was not so much to show valid locations in fact as it was to show the intention of the locators as to the particular ground in question. Appellant's contention is that he took all the ground south and west of a line drawn from the southeast corner of the Brown Bear claim to what is now claimed by plaintiff to be the southeast corner of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and, as the Brown Bear claim lay west of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and extended only about 600 feet along the latter, the said line would cut off more than a third of the southwest portion of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, including the ledges and rock in place found on the latter by Davis, its original locator. This contention of appellant is based largely on evidence that Davis himself conceded this to be the dividing line in February, 1890, when he and appellant and some other persons were on the ground for the purpose of ascertaining its location. It appeared, however, that, when Davis took the party to what in fact was the southeast corner of his claim, he by mistake told them it was the southwest corner, and that his southeast corner lay over east, near the Chadwick claim. The evidence here is in sharp conflict, and there is evidence that the Cuban Beauty No. 2 was laid out originally as claimed by plaintiff, and that, when Davis pointed east for his southeast corner, he by mistake called it the southwest corner, which would thus cut off the triangular piece in the southwest part of the claim. This was all cleared up to the satisfaction of the trial court, and, as there was evidence to support its conclusion, it cannot now be disturbed. Besides, the trial court held that, as these declarations of Davis were made after he had sold the property to plaintiff, they were inadmissible, as affecting plaintiff's title; and this ruling, though objected to at the time, is not now questioned. The bearing of this evidence was confined to its effect upon statements of plaintiff's witnesses as to where the lines of plaintiff's claim were in fact located. Appellant used at the trial a plat by way of illustration. Much of the evidence brought out in connection with this map is so reported as to be unintelligible here, though doubtless was understood by the trial judge. The diagram was not proven to be correct. It furnishes us but little aid, because not drawn to show the exact situation of the several claims referred to in the evidence, and is but an approximation of their relation to each other. It is confusing by reason of this fact, and also because the top of the map is south instead of north, which latter is the usual and better method of preparing illustrative maps. From the best consideration we can give of the evidence with this map in hand, we think the findings are supported.

The principal point urged by appellant is that he was in possession of the contested ground when plaintiff made his last location, and therefore it was not unoccupied mineral land and subject to location by plaintiff. Defendant claims from the evidence that the man sent to relocate the claim for plaintiff was driven off by defendant before he did any work; that defendant had a dwelling house on the claim, was living in it and working on the claim, and had done about $2,000 worth of work on it, and had the claim marked off so that the boundaries could be readily traced. And it is claimed that plaintiff had to commit a trespass upon the ground in order to locate. The decisions are not entirely harmonious as to whether an occupation such as is described above, under an invalid location, would be sufficient to prevent a valid location being made by another qualified person, provided he could do so without the use of force. The question is not necessarily involved in this case. There is evidence, which the trial court accepted, showing that the facts are not as above claimed. Defendant had done much work on a claim at considerable distance from plaintiff's claim, and he had a dwelling house on one of his claims, but it was a mile from plaintiff's claim. There was evidence that these improvements were not on any claim that encroached upon plaintiff's claim. Defendant's map shows a cabin which was erected by defendant more recently, but it is not on plaintiff's claim. The only work done by defendant on any part of plaintiff's claim is described as of but small extent. The evidence is not that Cousins, who made plaintiff's location, was driven off by defendant at the time the location was made. This circumstance happened some time before, when he went there to do assessment work under the Davis location. So far as the evidence shows, Cousins made the relocation peaceably, and without interruption or objection by any person. He was familiar with the lines by previous examination of them, and he testified that when he relocated the claim he went all over it, and found only such evidences of work on it as have been already stated. He found no person on any part of the claim, and no one in actual possession of any part of it. The utmost that can be said of the evidence in support of defendant's contention is that he had an invalid location on which he had done much work outside the boundaries of the claim in dispute, that he claimed that his location overlapped and included some of plaintiff's ground, and that in 1899 he had done some prospecting work on the disputed ground, but was not working this ground when plaintiff's relocation was made.

In view of this state of facts, the case of Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735, would seem to settle the question against defendants' contention. In that case Belk attempted to make a location in December, 1876, and did everything necessary to a valid location, if the ground was then subject to location. There was, however, a prior locator, whose rights precluded a valid location by Belk. This prior locator's rights expired on January 1, 1877, and were in fact then lost. Belk claimed that, upon the failure of the prior locator to keep his location alive, his (Belk's) location, made in December, at once attached. The court held that it did not so operate. Between December 19th and February 21st following, Belk did a small amount of work on the claim, which did not occupy more than two days of his time, and he had no other possession of the property than such as arose from his location of the claim and his occasional labor upon it. On February 21, 1877, defendants Meagher and others entered on the property peaceably and made another relocation, doing all that was required to perfect their rights, if the premises were then open to them. After showing that the rights of Belk were not affected by the Montana statute, and that his right of location depended entirely on the act of Congress, the court said: "All he got or could get by his entry was possession, and that, to be of any avail, must be actual. Under the provisions of the Revised Statutes relied on, Belk could not get a patent for the claim he attempted to locate unless he secured what is here made the equivalent of a valid location, by actually holding and working for the requisite time. If he actually held possession and worked the claim long enough and kept others out, his right to a patent would be complete. He had no grant of any right of possession. His ultimate right to a patent depended entirely on his keeping himself in and all others out, and, if he was not actually in, he was, in law, out. A peaceable adverse entry, coupled with the right to hold possession which was thereby acquired, operated as an ouster, which broke the continuity of his holding, and deprived him of the title he might have got if he had kept it for the requisite length of time. He made no such location as prevented the lands from being, in law, vacant. Others had the right to enter for the purpose of taking them up, if it could be done peaceably and without force." The court then said: "There is nothing in Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513 [24 L. Ed. 732], to the contrary of this." Applying the principles of Belk v. Meagher, we must hold that defendant acquired no right to the disputed land which constituted it other than unoccupied public land, or precluded plaintiff from making a valid location thereon. See the question discussed and cases cited pro and con in Lindley on Mines (2d Ed.) vol. 1, §§ 216–219. Belk v. Meagher also disposes of appellant's further contention that the repeal of the act of 1897 did not impair his rights vested by virtue of his invalid location. He could only claim such land as he actually possessed and was working in good faith.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

Gillis & Tapscott, for appellants. Warren & Taylor, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. Action to quiet title to a mining claim. In his complaint, filed November 30, 1900, the plaintiff alleged, among other things, that he was, and for a long time had been, the owner, entitled to the possession, and in the exclusive possession of a quartz lode mining claim, known as the "Cuban Beauty No. 2"; that on the 15th of November, 1900, the defendants had entered upon the claim with force and arms, and had driven off the men employed by him to do the necessary assessment work for that year; that they had taken possession of the ground, claimed to own it, and were excavating and removing the gold-bearing quartz, etc. Wherefore he prayed for a temporary injunction, and for a final decree adjudging him to be the owner, etc. By their answer the defendants alleged that W. F. Dyer was the owner of a mining claim located in 1898 as the "Squaw Creek No. 2," a small portion of which was included within the alleged boundaries of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, and they denied that they had excluded plaintiff from any portion of his claim, except that which overlapped the superior claim of W. F. Dyer. As to that portion they admitted, in effect, that they were holding it, and mining and removing the ores contained therein. From this brief statement it will sufficiently appear that the only material issues presented by the pleadings were those relating to the validity and priority of the overlapping claims. Upon these issues the findings and decision of the superior court were in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying them a new trial.

From the evidence contained in the record it appears that both parties relied, to some extent, at least, upon locations made or attempted in 1898, all of which were held invalid for failure of the locators to comply with some of the requirements of an act of the Legislature of California, passed March 27, 1897, prescribing the manner of making mining locations, etc. St. 1897, p. 214, c. 159. These locations being held void, the decision of the superior court in favor of the plaintiff was based wholly upon a relocation of the Cuban Beauty No. 2, made November 26, 1900, by the plaintiff, just four days before he commenced this action. In view of the grounds of the motion for a new trial—i. e., failure of the evidence to sustain the findings, and that the decision is against law—it will facilitate the discussion to quote some of the more specific findings in full. They are as follows:

"(1) That upon the 26th day of November, 1900, plaintiff, a citizen of the United States over the age of 21 years, located as a mining claim a certain parcel of land situated in Gazelle mining district, county of Siskiyou, state of California, and described as commencing at a point where location notice was posted; thence westerly, along the line of the Cuban Beauty quartz mine, a distance of 300 feet, to stake in mound of rock; then southerly, a distance of 1,500 feet, to stake in mound of rock; thence easterly, 600 feet, to a stake in mound of rock; thence in a northerly direction, 1,500 feet, to the southeast corner of the Cuban Beauty quartz mine, to stake in mound of rock; thence along the line of said Cuban Beauty quartz mine to place of beginning—and commonly known as the 'Cuban Beauty No. 2.' That at the time plaintiff made mining location, said land was unoccupied public mineral land of the United States, and subject to location as such.

"(2) That, in making said location, plaintiff complied with the laws of the United States by placing markings at the exterior boundaries of said location, so that the same could be readily traced, and also complied with all local customs and usages in recording notice of said location.

"(3) That, prior to said location by plaintiff, one Grant Davis had attempted to locate the same land covered by the said location of plaintiff herein, and thereafter sold and conveyed said land to this plaintiff by deed.

"(4) That, prior to said location by plaintiff, defendant W. F. Dyer and Frank Phillips had attempted to make locations of certain quartz mining ground in Gazelle mining district, and known as 'Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 1,' 'Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 2,' and 'Squaw Creek Gold Mine No. 3.' That said Squaw Creek gold mine No. 2 covers a portion of the same ground covered by the location of the plaintiff herein.

"(5) That the said attempted locations made by said Grant Davis, and by said defendant W. F. Dyer and said Frank Phillips, were not made in compliance with the law then in force when the same was made.

"(6) That upon or about the 15th day of November, 1900, plaintiff sent workmen upon said claim for the purpose of doing assessment work thereon, and upon said day defendants wrongfully and with force and arms entered upon said land of plaintiff and drove off said workmen, and threatened to drive them off if they ever returned, and at the time of the commencement of this action still hold possession thereof, and threaten to continue to hold possession."

These findings, when read in connection with the evidence in the case, fully disclose the erroneous view of the law which guided the decision of the superior court. The attempted location of the Squaw Creek claims by Dyer and Phillips was in September, 1898, and the evidence shows without substantial conflict that they then did everything necessary to constitute a valid location of the ground under the laws of the United States; that is to say, they discovered a lode of gold-bearing quartz, they posted on the ground a notice claiming 1,500 feet along the supposed course of the vein and 300 feet on either side, they plainly marked the exterior lines of their claim, including the point of discovery, and shortly afterwards commenced the work of development, which they prosecuted with more than sufficient diligence. In addition to this, Dyer, who had acquired the interest of his colocator, Phillips, built a house on the claim and was residing there within his marked boundaries at the time when plaintiff's employés came on the ground, November 15, 1900, for the purpose of doing assessment work for the Grant Davis location of Cuban Beauty No. 2, and also when plaintiff made the location on November 26, 1900, which the court finds to have been a valid location of unoccupied mining ground, and upon which alone his right of recovery is made to depend. The attempted location of the Cuban Beauty No. 2 by Grant Davis was made in October, 1898, a month later than the discovery and attempted location of the lode by Dyer, and the act done by Davis—giving the utmost credit to his testimony—fell far short of the efforts of Dyer to comply with the law. His evidence leaves it very doubtful if he ever discovered any gold-bearing rock in place, or did anything except to mark the boundaries of his claim.

The court finds that his claim as marked was the same as the location made by plaintiff November 26, 1900, and there is evidence that this claim at its extreme southern end includes some croppings of a lode, which appears to be the same as that upon which Dyer has done a large amount of work. But this finding that plaintiff's location embraces the identical ground covered by the Grant Davis claim is sustained by no testimony aside from that of Davis, and his testimony on the stand is in direct conflict with statements he admits having made when on the ground with Dyer and others for the purpose of adjusting their lines so as to avoid a conflict of locations. At that time he stated that his southwest corner was where he now claims his southeast corner was placed, and the change he thus makes involves a swinging of the southern end of his claim 600 feet to the west, making it by that means alone cover a triangular portion of Dyer's claim, including the only rock in place which could have been the basis of a valid location. He, however, says that his statement on the ground was a mistake, and the trial judge accepted his explanation, as he had a right to do, and as we should, perhaps, be bound to do, if the fact were material, which, as will appear, we do not deem it to be, so far as the present appeal is concerned. In view, however, of the necessity for a new trial, and the possible materiality of this fact in some different aspect of the case, it may properly be suggested that an accurate instrumental survey of this original claim in connection with the lines of the older claims—the Cuban Beauty and Dewey, with reference to which the Cuban Beauty No. 2 was located, and the subsequently located claims of Chadwick and the Black Bear No. 2, located with reference to the Cuban Beauty, the Dewey, and Cuban Beauty No. 2—would probably show whether the testimony of Grant Davis, in addition to being inconsistent with his former statements, does not also involve a geometric absurdity; that is to say, whether it does not require us to believe that by going south on the west side of a claim bounded by parallel lines we will reach the southeast, instead of the southwest, corner. But, assuming for the present purpose that the plaintiff's location of November 26, 1900, covered the identical ground included by the boundaries marked by Grant Davis in October, 1898, there is no evidence that either Davis or the plaintiff ever did or attempted to do any development work within those boundaries prior to the 15th of November, 1900, when plaintiff's men found Dyer in possession and were driven off the ground by him and his employés; Dyer having in the meantime, as above stated, built a cabin on the ground, taken up his residence there, and continued work upon the vein.

But the whole question as to what, if any, effect the Grant Davis location may have had upon the rights of the parties is eliminated from the case as presented on this appeal by the finding of the court—amply sustained by the evidence, even if the respondent could question it—that his attempted location was invalid for want of conformity to the requirements of the law then in force. The law to which this finding (No. 5) refers was the above-cited act of March 27, 1897, prescribing certain particulars that location notices must contain, and requiring the record of such notices within certain limited periods. This state law was no doubt valid as one of the local regulations authorized and sanctioned by the act of Congress, and so long as it remained unrepealed was obligatory upon those who desired to secure mining claims in this state by the constructive possession resulting from a technical compliance with the law. The superior court, therefore, was right in concluding that neither the Davis location nor the Dyer location was valid at the time it was made. But the act of 1897 was repealed long before the plaintiff made his location in November, 1900. In the first place, an act properly entitled was passed March 20, 1899 (St. 1899, p. 148, c. 113), for the purpose of repealing it; but, owing to a faulty wording of the body of the act, there seems to have been a question whether it effected the desired repeal. In consequence of this uncertainty the same act, properly worded, was introduced at the extra session of the Legislature in 1900, and finally passed February 8th of that year, taking immediate effect. St. 1900, p. 9, c. 6. The result of this repeal was to make the validity of mining locations in this state solely dependent from that time forward upon a compliance with the laws of the United States and such valid local regulations as the miners themselves may have adopted in their respective districts. There is no evidence of an organized district including these claims, and no suggestion of a failure to comply with any miners' rules or customs. So that the point to be considered is the effect upon the Davis and Dyer locations of the entire elimination from our state or local laws of all regulations additional or supplemental to the laws of the United States governing the location of mining claims.

The repeal of the state law took effect at least as early as February 8, 1900, if not on the 20th of March, 1899, and the condition in which it found the Davis and Dyer claims was this: Davis had never attempted anything except a technical location, and in that he had failed. Dyer had also failed in his earlier attempt at a technical location, but he was on the ground working the vein within his marked boundaries, and had done everything necessary to constitute a valid location under the only law then and thereafter in force. This being so, his claim was thenceforward good so long as he continued to do the necessary assessment work. This work, and far more than necessary to satisfy the requirements of the act of Congress, was clearly proved without any substantial conflict in the evidence, and therefore the concluding portion of the first finding, to the effect that on November 26, 1900, plaintiff's mining location was made upon unoccupied mineral land of the United States, is unsustained by the evidence. This finding is apparently based upon the view that the Dyer location, having been originally defective by reason solely of noncompliance with the state law, although fully complying with the laws of the United States, acquired no validity by the repeal of the state law. But this is not a correct view. The repeal of the state law, of course, had no affirmative effect in giving validity to the location; but it did away forever with the necessity of conforming to its provisions, and left unimpaired and unaffected every right which is conferred by a compliance with the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States. Dyer, having complied with those provisions, was certainly in no worse a situation with respect to this ground than the plaintiff. He had discovered the ledge once. He could not discover it again. He had marked the boundaries of his claim. There was nothing to be gained by marking again boundaries that were already marked. The laws of the United States require no posting or recording of notices, but merely provide that a notice, when required by local regulations, must contain certain things in order to be of any effect. There was no longer any law providing for notice or record, or giving any effect to a recorded notice, and all that Dyer could do was to perform the amount of development work required by the law of Congress, and that he was doing when this action was commenced and injunction issued, more than a month prior to the expiration of the year allowed to him for that purpose.

Upon these facts we cannot understand how it could be held that at the time of plaintiff's attempted location the ground was unoccupied. Dyer had in fact a pedis possessio to the extent of his visible boundaries, and the fact that those boundaries had been marked in connection with an attempted location, invalid only because of failure to comply in other particulars with the state statute of 1897, then no longer in force, made them none the less efficacious for his protection. Conway v. Hart, 129 Cal. 483, 484, 62 Pac. 44. The working of a quartz lode inside of defined boundaries is not only a pedis possessio of all the ground within such boundaries, but is in itself the substance of everything required by law to constitute a valid location, and ever since the decision of this court in English v. Johnson, 17 Cal. 107, 76 Am. Dec. 574, it has been held to give a good title to a mining claim (not excessive in extent), regardless of local rules providing for the posting and recording of notices. It is actual possession, while a formal location is only constructive possession. In addition to the cases of English v. Johnson and Conway v. Hart, above cited from the decisions of this court, we refer for a fuller statement and elucidation of the views here expressed as to the location or mining claims since the act of Congress of May 10, 1872, to the following cases: Golden Fleece Co. v. Cable Consolidated Co., 12 Nev. 312; Gleeson v. Martin White Co., 13 Nev. 442; North Noonday Co. v. Orient Co. (C. C.) 1 Fed. 522; Jupiter Co. v. Bodie Mining Co. (C. C.) 11 Fed. 666. The Nevada cases were among the first that arose under the act of Congress of May, 1872, and the views therein expressed were substantially embodied in the charge to the jury given by Judge Sawyer in the two cases cited from the Federal Reporter. The decisions of Judge Sawyer have been cited and followed in numerous subsequent cases in the federal and state courts, and we are not aware that they have ever been seriously questioned.

It is proper here to notice the case of Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735, which in the department opinion affirming the judgment and order of the superior court was cited as a controlling authority. It will not be difficult, we think, to point out a distinction between that case and this which makes it totally inapplicable to the point to be decided here. In that case Belk, in December, 1876, posted a notice of location upon mining ground then covered by a valid claim of third parties, who by their acts done in compliance with the law of the United States had become invested, according to its express terms, with the "exclusive right of possession" of the ground so located until the 1st of January, 1877. If by that date they did not resume work on the claim their right of possession would lapse, but in the meantime it was unquestionable, and when Belk attempted his location he not only posted his notice upon ground not open to location, but he was guilty of an unlawful act—a trespass upon the lawful possession of others. A careful reading of Chief Justice Waite's opinion will show that for this reason alone his acts done in December were held utterly void. In this case the acts of Dyer, done while the act of 1897 was in force, were every one of them lawful, and every one of them constituted a step taken in compliance with the law of Congress. His discovery was upon unoccupied land of the United States. His entry, his marking of boundaries, his work on the lode—everything he did—was free from any imputation of illegality, and when he had fully complied with the act of Congress there was nothing left for him to do except to post and record the notices as prescribed by the state law, in order to make his location perfect; and this he could have done at any time before the ground became subject to an intervening right.

Under the law of Congress, under the law of this state, and under every code of district laws adopted by miners that has come to my notice, the prescribed order of the acts necessary to a valid location is, first, the discovery of mineral-bearing rock in place; second, the posting of notice at or near the point where the ledge is exposed; next, the recording of notice; next, the marking of boundaries; and, finally, the work of development. But, although this is the proper and natural order of procedure, it is not obligatory, in the absence of intervening rights. It is, indeed, universally held that, when every act necessary to complete a location has been done before an adverse claim has accrued, the order in which such acts have been performed is immaterial. If, for instance, a locator, before the discovery of any lode, begins by first marking out a surface claim, his location is perfected if he develops a lode within his boundaries before a good location is made by an adverse claimant. So here Dyer, having done everything required by the act of Congress, could have perfected his claim under the state law, if it had remained in force, by a subsequent posting and recording of the prescribed notices. To state the matter in another form: Several distinct acts are essential to constitute a valid location. The order in which they are performed is immaterial. Dyer performed all the acts required by the federal statute in a perfectly legal manner, and they were all valid. The acts to be performed under the state law had been omitted, but were still performable at his option without any infringement of intervening claims when the state released him, in common with all others, from compliance with its local law. His claim was then perfect. Belk, on the contrary, commenced his attempted location by an unlawful trespass upon the rights of others, which for that reason was totally invalid as the foundation of any right, and, excluding this unlawful act from consideration, it was held that his subsequent acts, prior to Meagher's location, were insufficient to secure the ground. Dyer's acts, on the contrary—none of which could be excluded from consideration on the ground of illegality—did long prior to the 26th of November, 1900, constitute a perfect location as the law stood from and after the 6th of February of that year.

We have not overlooked the contention of respondent that it is found as a fact by the superior court (concluding portion of the first finding) that, when plaintiff made his location on November 26, 1900, the ground was vacant and unoccupied, and his further contention that there is sufficient conflict and uncertainty in the evidence regarding the Dyer locations to sustain this finding in its broadest sense. We think, however, that such a finding would not only have been in conflict with all the substantial evidence in the case, but it would have been inconsistent with other and more specific findings, and with the allegations of the complaint. The allegation of the complaint is that the ouster by defendants occurred on the 15th of November, 1900, and the evidence conforms strictly to this allegation. It shows that on that day two men employed by plaintiff to do assessment work on his supposed claim were driven from the ground by Dyer and his men. At that date, then, when, according to the specific findings of the court, plaintiff had acquired no rights to any of the ground in controversy, the defendants were on the ground, and remained in possession, claiming it under the location which the court finds they had long before attempted to make. It was eleven days later that the plaintiff's supposed right was initiated by his formal location of November 26th, and when four days later, on November 30th, he filed his complaint in this action, he alleged the ouster on the 15th, the taking possession and claim of ownership by defendants, and that they were excavating and threatening to continue excavating the gold-bearing rock. In short, the allegations of the complaint itself on any fair construction of their terms are inconsistent with the assumption that Dyer was not in possession of his claim at the date of plaintiff's location.

Finally, we think that a new trial should have been granted upon the ground that the decision is against law for want of a finding upon the most material issue presented by the pleadings. It is found that plaintiff made a location of the ground in November, 1900, and it is found that Dyer's previous location was invalid for lack of conformity to a law in force at the time it was made. This finding, however, is entirely consistent, as we have endeavored to show, with the supposition that after the repeal of the act of 1897 his location may have been or become perfect, and the material question—the issue upon which the whole case depends—is not whether Dyer had a good claim in 1898 or 1899, but whether he had a good claim prior to November 26, 1900. Upon this point there is no direct finding, and, if it be contended that it is indirectly or inferentially found against the defendant, we can only repeat that such finding is not only in conflict with the evidence, but inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. (dissenting). I dissent, and adhere to the opinion heretofore rendered in department. I think that the judgment and ordered appealed from should be affirmed.

CONTINENTAL BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. WILSON et ux. (Sac. 1,176.)*

EJECTMENT—HUSBAND AND WIFE—ESTOPPEL—MORTGAGES—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY—STATUTES.

1. A finding that all the allegations of the complaint are true except as to damages, that all the allegations of the answer are untrue, that all the allegations of the cross-complaint are untrue, and that all the allegations of the answer to the cross-complaint are true, is not against the pleadings and evidence, merely because plaintiff admitted some of the allegations of the defendant's answer on uncontroverted matters.

2. Where a married woman signs deeds of trust, authorizing payment by the grantee of incumbrances on her land, and thereafter receives the benefits of such payment, she is estopped to say that she did not, in writing, authorize the payment of the incumbrances.

3. Civ. Code, § 2922, providing that a mortgage can be created, renewed, or extended only by writing executed with the formalities required in the case of the grant of real property, and section 2429, providing that every transfer of an interest in property other than in trust as security for another act is a mortgage, do not prevent the application of an estoppel against a married woman to deny that she did in writing authorize the payment of incumbrances on her real estate by the grantee in a deed signed by her conveying the property in trust, expressly authorizing the payment by the grantee of such incumbrances.

4. The grantee in deeds of trust by which a married woman and her husband authorized the grantee to pay all incumbrances on the land is not, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1971, requiring agents for the transfer of property to be authorized by writing, deprived of the benefit of the provisions of the deeds, in ejectment by the grantee against the husband and wife, merely because plaintiff claimed, in its answer to defendants' cross-complaint, under a verbal contract with the husband, acting for himself and wife, in relation to her land, that certain advances were to be distributed in a given amount pro rata under each deed; it appearing that the deeds of trust each authorized even a larger amount to be distributed thereto.

5. In ejectment by the grantee in certain deeds of trust against a husband and wife, one of the principal issues was that plaintiff agreed to make a building loan of $31,500, and that on the completion of the four buildings in question there remained in plaintiff's hands $23,685; that plaintiff agreed to proceed with four other buildings on the completion of these four, and so on to the completion of all; that plaintiff refused to furnish any further money, by reason of which defendants were prevented from performance on their part. There were no other material issues. The averments of the answer and cross-complaint were traversed by plaintiff in its pleadings. The court found all the allegations of the defendants' answer and cross-complaint were untrue, and that all the allegations of plaintiff's pleadings were true. Held, that a contention that the court failed to find on material issues presented by the pleadings is untenable.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the Continental Building & Loan Association against Charles L. Wilson and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Webb & Creed, Parcells & Brown, and F. P. Tuttle, for appellants. L. L. Chamberlain and Charles Tuttle, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Ejectment. The verified complaint alleges ownership and right of possession of certain lots (describing them) in the city of Lincoln, Placer county; that defendants have excluded and do now exclude plaintiff from possession, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $1,000. Defendants answered, denying plaintiff's ownership and right of possession; also answered by way of "a second and further defense"; and also "by way of cross-complaint." Plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and at the trial the court found that all the allegations of the complaint are true except as to damages, that all the allegations of the answer are untrue, that all the allegations of the cross-complaint are untrue, and that all the allegations of the answer to the cross-complaint are true. As conclusion of law the court found the plaintiff entitled to the relief asked for in the complaint, "and for damages, which are fixed at $780." Judgment was accordingly entered, from which, and from their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

There are certain admitted facts found by the court which may be first stated: On July 16, 1900, defendants executed 16 different deeds of trust to secure the payment of certain 16 promissory notes, also executed and delivered by them to plaintiff, each for $1,950. Each deed of trust conveyed certain four lots in the city of Lincoln. The money borrowed on each note was to be used in constructing a dwelling on the group of lots conveyed by the deed of trust given to secure said notes. The notes were in the form usual with building and loan associations, and showed that defendants pledged certain shares of the capital stock of plaintiff company, for which they had subscribed, as further security, and agreed to pay for said shares the principal and certain interest and premiums on the shares and interest on the loan monthly, in default of which plaintiff had the right to treat the notes as immediately due and payable. The deed of trust by its terms was to secure "all amounts of principal hereafter borrowed by said grantors, * * * not exceeding at any one time $450." Grantors agreed to pay any incumbrances (and some other charges named) there might be then upon the premises or that might be thereafter imposed thereon as taxes, etc., in default of which plaintiff was authorized to pay the same, and the deed of trust was to be security therefor. Four dwellings were erected with money furnished by plaintiff, and defendants having defaulted, as was claimed by plaintiff, in making certain payments stipulated for in these four promissory notes and deeds of trust, the property was sold by the trustees, and deeds therefor made to plaintiff, and these deeds are the source of title relied on by plaintiff. The controversy arises out of some disputed points in what constituted the agreement made by the parties contemporaneously with the execution of the notes and deeds of trust, and subsequently thereto touching the construction of the building and the furnishing of money therefor by plaintiff. The pleadings on this phase of the case are very lengthy, embracing about 70 pages of the transcript. The agreement as set forth in defendants' answer and cross-complaint differs materially from that contained in that portion of plaintiff's answer "by way of affirmative defense to the matters and things alleged in the cross-complaint of defendants" and as found by the court. The evidence is sharply conflicting on controverted points, but there is evidence sufficient to support the finding that the allegations of plaintiff's answer to defendants' cross-complaint are true.

Stated as concisely as may be, there was evidence that the transaction was as follows: Defendants are husband and wife, and, being desirous of erecting dwelling houses on certain lots in Lincoln, defendant Charles Wilson (who seems to have conducted all the negotiations for himself and wife, either personally or through their broker, one Krigbaum) applied to plaintiff for a loan of $31,200; that being the estimated cost of 16 dwellings at $1,950 each. After much negotiation plaintiff agreed to make the loan, with the understanding that sufficient money would be furnished to pay for four houses when completed, but that no more money would be furnished until these houses had been either sold and this money repaid or the property sold to parties upon part payment, balance secured by mortgages satisfactory to plaintiff; defendants meanwhile to pay the monthly interest and other charges in accordance with the form of note prescribed by plaintiff, and defendants also representing title clear, and, if not clear, they were to make it so. Sixteen separate notes and deeds of trust were executed and at once recorded, although no money was to be then paid over; the purpose of recording all the deeds being to make subordinate any subsequent liens upon the lots. An abstract of title was subsequently furnished by defendants which disclosed several liens on the property, which defendant Charles Wilson represented could and would be removed for $4,000. Further proceedings were thereupon suspended, and plaintiff refused to go forward with the business, unless defendants would cause these prior liens to be discharged. Later along defendant Charles Wilson represented that defendants had made all possible effort to raise the money without success, and appealed to plaintiff to advance it, which plaintiff finally consented to do, and thereupon paid off these lien holders, furnishing $4,000 therefor to defendants under an agreement with Wilson, acting for himself and wife, that this sum should be secured by the deeds of trust by apportioning $250 to each group of four lots covered by a deed of trust, and this advance was to be treated as part of the fund to be furnished in building the houses, and any shortage of money required for that purpose was to be furnished by defendants. This arrangement was conditional to furnishing any money for the construction of any of the buildings, and the $4,000 was paid to the Union Trust Company of San Francisco on August 15, 1900, about one month after the deeds of trust had been executed and recorded; the various documents effecting releases having been placed there in escrow by the arrangement of Wilson and wife. These documents show that they represented judgments, mortgages, or pending actions incumbering the property, and in which Mrs. Wilson and her husband were debtor parties. Witness Corbin testified that no interest was to be charged, or was charged, except on money actually advanced; that Wilson represented that each building and its lots would sell for $3,000, which would pay the loan and leave defendants $500 or $600 or more profit; that Wilson represented himself to be worth $25,000 to $50,000; that the whole amount due plaintiff July 15, 1901, on these four houses, excluding the $4,000 advanced to remove incumbrances, was $8,525.36. This sum is made up of various items, some or all of which are enumerated by witness Corbin, and he testified that he "furnished Wilson a segregated statement of each building, showing the amount due on each building." He further testified: "We did not go on and build four more buildings, because Wilson did not comply with his portion of the agreement to put money into the buildings himself. He did not pay any attorney's fees, and paid nothing on the insurance policies, paid nothing for recording fees, paid no installment of interest and premium, and did not sell the houses. He did not pay us a five cent piece from the time we entered into the original contract with him up to the closing of that contract." Corbin's testimony as to the agreement is corroborated by that of witness Krigbaum, defendants' agent, witness Harding, a director of plaintiff's corporation, witness J. L. Wilson, a contractor, and witness Armitage.

1. It is urged that, because the pleadings of plaintiff admitted some of the allegations of defendants' answer, the omnibus finding that all the allegations of defendants' answer are untrue is against the pleadings and evidence, and brings the finding within the rule of Krug v. Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125; in other words, that the finding in effect is "that all the allegations of the answer so far as they are inconsistent with the allegations of the complaint, and all the allegations of the cross-complaint so far as they are inconsistent with the answer thereto, are not true"—a form of finding condemned in the case cited. We do not think that the admissions in plaintiff's pleadings pointed out in defendants' brief lead to the result suggested. The first is where the agreement to loan defendants $31,200 is admitted. But the answer "denies that the same was to be paid either in the manner or at the times in the said cross-complaint mentioned," and the answer proceeds to set forth what the agreement was. There is no controversy as to the amount which plaintiff agreed to loan, but rather upon the terms upon which it was to be furnished from time to time. The other admission admits the matters contained in paragraph 5 of the cross-complaint, which sets forth the execution of the notes and deeds of trust, about which there is no controversy. The admission is followed by the averment that "they were delivered to plaintiff by defendant, and plaintiff accepted the same, on the terms and conditions hereinafter mentioned; but plaintiff denies that it accepted the said promissory notes or deeds of trust except upon the terms hereinafter stated." The findings present no such difficulty as they did in Krug v. Brewing Co., supra.

2. It is contended that the sale under the deeds of trust was premature and void, for the reason that defendants were not in default at the time of said sale. It is claimed that the four loans aggregated $7,800 ($1,950 each), and that but $7,515 was paid for the four houses; that plaintiff, therefore, had sufficient money on hand under the loan to pay all dues, premiums, and interest, and it was plaintiff's duty to apply it to these charges—citing section 1479, Civ. Code; Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 568, 14 Pac. 514; Bank v. Thein (Sup.) 28 N. Y. Supp. 232. Conceding that defendants were entitled to have any money applied standing to their credit on the loans, the difference between $7,800 and $7,515 would be but $285, while the evidence shows that the dues, premium, and interest due August 28, 1900, on advances made to that time, amounted to $327.60, and on December 5, 1900, like charges amounted to $218.14, not to speak of advances in addition to the contract price on the buildings.

3. It is contended that the lien attempted to be created by the advancement of the $4,000, distributed among the 16 loans, was invalid because contrary to the statute of frauds. With this may be considered the further point, namely, that in no event could this advancement operate as a lien upon Mrs. Wilson's property without her consent thereto expressed in writing, and her husband had no authority in writing to charge her as agent and as required by section 1971, Code Civ. Proc. The agreement was that the money loaned was to be used in the construction of certain houses. Each of the deeds of trust provided for advances, beyond the principal amount to be loaned, for which the property was made security. After the deeds were executed it was found, as above shown, that certain incumbrances rested on the property, placed there by defendants, which they agreed should be removed before any money was paid on the loan. Defendants found themselves unable to do this, and plaintiff advanced the money necessary for the purpose. Mrs. Wilson must be charged with notice of the negotiations, for she signed papers that were placed in escrow, to effect the release of the property, and the discharge of these liens inured to her benefit as well as that of her husband. Besides the deeds of trust expressly provided that defendants should pay "all incumbrances now subsisting or which may hereafter subsist," etc., on the granted premises, in default of which the trustees "may at such time as they deem best, * * * pay and discharge all * * * liens and incumbrances, * * * and these trusts shall continue as security * * * for all money laid out and expended by virtue hereof." In addition to these general provisions in each deed of trust, there was also one covering "all amounts hereafter borrowed by said grantors from said association during the continuance of these trusts, not exceeding at any one time four hundred and fifty dollars."

Mrs. Wilson, having signed the deeds of trust, and having taken part personally in placing the matter of the incumbrances in the hands of the trust company to be paid, and having received the benefit of that payment, cannot be heard now to say that she did not authorize it in writing. The clearing off of these incumbrances was made a condition precedent to furnishing any money for the buildings. Mrs. Wilson will not now be permitted to say that these advances were not secured by the deeds of trust. This view is in no sense inconsistent with the doctrine of the cases cited by defendants (Porter v. Muller, 53 Cal. 677; s. c., 112 Cal. 355, 44 Pac. 729), or the provisions of the Code as to creating or renewing a mortgage (Civ. Code, §§ 2922, 2924). Nor is plaintiff deprived of the benefit of the provisions of the deeds of trust because plaintiff claimed in its answer under a verbal contract with Wilson, acting for himself and wife, that the $4,000 advances were to be distributed among all the deeds of trust, $250 to each. There was no waiver by plaintiff of its lien under the deeds of trust, and the agreement was in harmony with their provisions. Each of the four deeds of trust authorized an advance of $450 at one time, and the agreement to apportion $250 to each deed of trust was more favorable to defendants than the deeds themselves.

4. Finally it is claimed that the court failed to find upon material issues presented by the pleadings. There are no material issues, except such as arise out of the agreement already referred to. One of the principal issues presented by defendants' answer and cross-complaint was that plaintiff agreed to loan the entire sum of $31,500, and that upon the completion of the four buildings there remained in plaintiff's hands, which belonged to defendants, the difference between that amount and $7,515, advanced for these four buildings, or $23,685; that plaintiff by its agreement was to proceed with four other buildings on the completion of these four, and so to the completion of all; that plaintiff refused to furnish any further money, by reason of which defendants were prevented from performance o. their part. These and other averments of defendants' answer and cross-complaint were traversed by plaintiff in its answer. The court found that all the allegations of the defendants' answer and cross-complaint were untrue, and all the allegations of plaintiff's answer thereto were true. It seems to us that every material issue arising under the pleadings was thus disposed of. Defendants' allegations having no foundation in fact to rest upon as affecting the deeds of trust other than the four under which plaintiff was claiming, the court was not called upon to make any disposition of these other notes and deeds of trust. Plaintiff claimed nothing under them, and answered as to them, to meet the claim of defendants, that plaintiff failed to advance the money it had agreed to advance, and to show that the sale under the trust deeds was not premature. The issue presented by plaintiff was its title and right of possession to the 16 lots in question and no others. Defendants having failed to maintain the defense arising out of their alleged agreement as to the entire transaction, there remained no right of the respective parties as to these outstanding notes and deeds of trust to be determined, further than was done by the court in its judgment "that defendants are not entitled to recover anything from plaintiff by their cross-complaint on file herein, and that defendants take nothing by the same."

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

CAYFORD v. METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. (S. F. 3,699.)

LIFE INSURANCE—FAILURE TO PAY PREMIUM.

1. Under the provisions of a life policy that, if any installment of premium be not paid when due, the policy shall be void; that all premiums are payable yearly in advance, but when paid in semiannual installments any part remaining unpaid at maturity of the policy shall be deducted, but that this provision shall not affect the provision respecting forfeiture for nonpayment of installment of premium; and that a grace of one month will be allowed in the payment of the "second annual or any subsequent premium"—the policy is void where only the first semiannual premium is paid, and insured dies 15 days after the second semiannual installment has become due.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Hannah Cayford against the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

SMITH, C. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff on demurrer to the complaint. The suit was brought on a policy of insurance executed by the defendant to plaintiff's husband, of date March 20, 1902. The policy was made payable to the plaintiff, if living at the time of his death; otherwise, to the legal representative of the insured. The payment of the first "semiannual premium" is acknowledged in the policy. The second semiannual installment, which by the terms of the contract became due September 20th of the same year, was not paid; and the insured died 15 days thereafter.

The terms of the policy, so far as material, are as follows:

The "Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, * * * in consideration of the semiannual premium of thirty dollars and ten cents, on or before the delivery of this policy, and of a like amount on or before the twentieth day of March and September in each and every year during the continuance of this policy, not to exceed twenty years, doth hereby agree, in the event of the death of the said insured within twenty years from the date hereof, subject to the conditions set forth on the reverse side hereof, each and all of which are hereby made a part of this contract, and are contracted by the insured and assured to be part thereof as fully as if herein recited, to pay at its home office, in the city of New York, the sum of one thousand dollars to Hannah Cayford, wife of the insured," etc.

"Conditions referred to on the face of this policy as part of this contract: * * *

"Third. If * * * any premium or installment of premium be not paid when due, this policy shall be void and all premiums paid shall be forfeited to the company, except as provided below. * * *

"Fifth. * * * All premiums are considered payable yearly in advance, but when paid in semiannual or quarterly installments, that part, if any, which remains unpaid at the maturity of the policy shall be deducted; but this provision does not affect the provisions of the third paragraph respecting forfeiture for nonpayment of installment of premium.

"Concessions: * * * Fourth. A grace of one month will be allowed in the payment of the second annual or any subsequent premium due on this policy, subject to an interest charge at the rate of five per cent. per annum for the number of days during which the premium remains due and unpaid. The policy will remain in force during the month of grace, and the unpaid premium, with interest as above, will be deducted from the amount payable hereunder in the event of the death of the insured during the grace period."

In view of the express provisions of the contract, the judgment, we think, was unwarranted. By the express terms of the third condition, the policy became void, and the premium paid was forfeited, upon the failure of the insured to pay the second semiannual premium when it became due. Joyce on Insurance, § 1108; Methvin v. Fidelity Mut. Life Ins. Co., 129 Cal. 251, 61 Pac. 1112. Nor is the case in any way affected by the provision of the policy conceding "a grace of one month * * * in the payment of the second annual or any subsequent premium due on the policy." This provision is explained by the provision in the fifth condition of the policy that "all premiums are considered payable yearly in advance," which clearly defines the terms, "the second annual" and "any subsequent premium." Obviously, the provision applies only to the second annual payment (one at the beginning of the second year), and to premiums subsequent thereto.

We advise that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

HOWE v. SOUTHREY et al. (Sac. 1,133.)

SCHOOL DISTRICTS — JUDGMENTS—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PERFORMANCE—MANDAMUS —INTEREST.

1. A nonappealable judgment awarding costs against a school district is not subject to collateral attack, on the ground that the district was not liable for costs, in mandamus to compel the trustees of the district to perform the judgment.

2. Where a judgment against a school district did not provide for interest, interest could not be awarded on a written mandate issued to compel the trustees of the district to perform the judgment.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Geo. F. Buck, Judge.

Mandamus on petition of C. E. Howe against J. N. Southrey and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

A. H. Carpenter, for appellant. C. W. Norton, for respondents.

GRAY, C. In a suit originally commenced in the justices' court for $299, and afterwards appealed to the superior court, the appellant obtained judgment in the latter court against the Fair Oaks school district, in San Joaquin county, for $55 and costs, taxed at $134.50. The trustees of said school district offered to pay the $55, but refused to pay the costs. This action is brought to obtain a writ of mandate compelling the trustees of said district to issue to appellant the proper order or requisition upon the county superintendent of schools of said county for the entire amount of said judgment and legal interest thereon. After a hearing the court denied appellant's petition, and the latter appeals from the judgment.

We think the petition should have been granted. Respondents seem to concede that the judgment for the $55 was valid. They contend, however, that the court had no jurisdiction or power to award costs against a school district. We do not think, however, that the case presents a question of jurisdiction. Whether or not the superior court should have taxed the costs against the school district was a question of law necessarily involved in the original case, and there can be no doubt that it was within the jurisdiction of the superior court to decide that question. The case having been appealed from the justices' court, the decision of the superior court was final. It cannot be reviewed on appeal, for there is no further appeal allowed. Nor will a review be permitted upon this application for a writ of mandate. The writ of mandate is "issued by any court, except a justice's or police court, to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board or person, to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust or station." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. There is nothing in this provision to indicate that the defendants can avail themselves of the position which they now occupy to review the decision of the court in the original action upon the questions of law which do not involve the jurisdiction or power of the court to act in the matter. If the court had determined in the original action that the costs could not be assessed against the district, the respondents would not now be contending that the court had no jurisdiction to so decide. If it did have jurisdiction to decide the matter either way, it had equal jurisdiction to decide it the other way. Jurisdiction, in cases of this character, implies the power of the court to decide a question wrong as well as right. It is, therefore, not necessary for us here to determine whether the costs should have been assessed against the district or not. This is a collateral attack upon the judgment in the original case, and we can go no farther here than to determine whether the judgment is void or not. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, its judgment is not void for a mere erroneous decision of a question of law, however important that question may be. The judgment having been rendered by a court of competent and final jurisdiction, it fixes the liability of the district, and from this arises the duty in the board of trustees to issue to appellant the necessary requisition to satisfy the original judgment.

As to the matter of interest, it does not appear from the petition herein that any interest was provided for in the judgment entered in the original suit. Mandamus does not lie to enforce the obligation of contracts, but only to enforce the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins. In this case it can go no farther than to compel the board to issue its requisition for the exact amount of the judgment. It cannot determine whether the obligation rests upon the district to pay interest upon the judgment, for such is not the office of the writ of mandate. Barber v. Mulford, 117 Cal. 356, 49 Pac. 206.

We advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the court below to issue the writ in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; COOPER, C.

McCARTY v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. (CITY OF SACRAMENTO, Intervener; Sac. 1,200-1,202.)*

NEW TRIAL—REVIEW—FINDING.

1. Where, in an action against certain railway companies and a city to quiet title to a levee and to enjoin its use, the city claimed title thereto by estoppel, adverse possession, etc., and the railway companies claimed under the city and by grant of the state legislature, etc., and, notwithstanding the evidence showing a long continued use of the levee by the defendants was conflicting as to whether the use was under assertion of right and therefore adverse, and that defendant railway companies had expended large sums of money on the levee with the knowledge and acquiescence of plaintiff and his predecessors, etc., the court made a single finding that defendants had no right, title, or interest in or to any part of the land, or any easement over the same, an order granting a new trial was not erroneous.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Bill by Daniel McCarty against the Southern Pacific Company and others and the city of Sacramento, intervener. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants and intervener appeal, and from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. McKune, for appellants. S. Luke Howe and A. A. De Ligne, for intervener. Devlin & Devlin, for respondents S. P. R. R. Co. and C. P. R. R. Co. Burns & Ford and A. L. Shinn, for defendants.

HENSHAW, J. The action was commenced by plaintiff to quiet his title to a tract of land situated in the county of Sacramento commonly known as the "Norristown Tract." So far as the defendants and the intervener, the city of Sacramento, are concerned, the dispute is over a strip of this land, 165 feet wide, running through the tract in a northerly and southerly direction. This strip of land constitutes a part of the levee of the city of Sacramento, and on the levee are, and for many years have been, steam railroad tracks, now controlled and operated by the Southern Pacific Company. By his action plaintiff sought a judgment that the defendants the Southern Pacific Company and Central Pacific Railroad Company have no right of way, easement, or franchise on the levee of the city of Sacramento located on the land, and an injunction enjoining them from operating trains thereon. Many years prior to this, the city of Sacramento had granted franchises to the predecessors of defendants to lay tracks and operate trains on the levee, and accordingly the city intervened, contending that it was the owner in fee of the levee and of the strip of land upon which it was built. No controversy arises between the intervener and the defendants. They make common cause against the claims of plaintiff. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding that the defendants had no right of way on the levee, and enjoined them from going on it. It further adjudged that the city did not own the fee of the levee and the land on which it was constructed, but had an easement over the land for levee purposes only, which had been acquired by prescription. From this judgment the defendants and intervener appealed. The defendants also moved for a new trial, and their motion was granted. From this order the plaintiff appeals. The situation thus presented is an appeal by defendants from an adverse judgment, which has been vacated by the trial court's order for a new trial, and an appeal by the plaintiff, in whose favor the judgment ran, in resistance of the court's order for a new trial. If the order granting a new trial is to be sustained, it is wholly inutile to consider the appeal from the judgment, as upon new trial entirely different findings and conclusions may be reached.

A brief exposition of the claims of the defendants and intervener will serve to throw light upon the material matters in dispute. At a very early day, and to protect the city of Sacramento from flood waters, a levee was built upon this land. It was then owned by the predecessors in title of plaintiff. The city of Sacramento contends that it acquired absolute title in fee to the land over which this levee was constructed by condemnation proceedings, by adverse title and prescription, by exercise of its police power, and by estoppel raised against plaintiff to dispute its title. Further, that if it be not the owner in fee, it still is the owner of a perpetual easement for levee purposes, and for all uses and purposes incidental and beneficial thereto, which easement has the same sources and origin as those just recited touching the title in fee. The defendant railroad companies based their right to the use of the track upon the levee upon a franchise from the board of supervisors of the city and county of Sacramento, upon a contract and agreement with the board of city levee commissioners, upon a grant from the Legislature of the state of California, upon a prescriptive right, and by the acquiescence and laches of plaintiff. It further, and among other claims and contentions not here necessary to specify, insists that if the city of Sacramento be the owner in fee of the strip, or of a perpetual easement for levee purposes over it, that defendants' right to operate a track upon the levee cannot be questioned in an action such as this, where the plaintiff seeks possession; that defendants are using the easement only, and that, as plaintiff is not entitled to the possession of the levee against the city, he is not entitled to it as against one claiming under the city; that all objections to the validity of the franchise or franchises granted to the predecessors in interest of the defendants must be made in direct proceedings instituted by the Attorney General in the name of the state; that the track in question is a part of the railroad system of defendants, and has been such since its construction in 1869; that it joins the main line of the Central Pacific Company running to Ogden and the main line of the Western Pacific Railroad Company running from Brighton to San José and San Francisco; that the track has been used for such general railroad purposes as were necessary or requisite; that large sums of money have been expended in broadening and preserving the levee, and in improving the track, and that plaintiff and his predecessors having permitted this construction and these improvements and the maintenance thereof for 30 years, plaintiff is precluded from interfering with the possession of the defendants, and, if injured at all, must seek relief in an action for damages. This sufficiently outlines the main points of controversy between the parties. Upon some of them the probative facts are not in dispute, since they rest wholly upon uncontradicted records, but the ultimate facts—that is to say, the proper conclusion to be drawn from these undisputed probative facts—are the subject of keen controversy. The court upon all of these matters of defense, and upon all of these separate claims of title and interest, made the single brief but comprehensive finding that the defendant companies "have not, nor has either of them, at any time had any right, title, estate, or interest of, in, or to any part of the land described in said amended complaint, nor have they, or either of them, at any time had any easement of a right of way for a railroad over any part of said land, and the several adverse claims of the said corporation defendants, set out in their several answers filed in this case, are, and each of them is, invalid." It seems highly probable that upon argument of the motion for a new trial the court's views, as expressed in this finding, were materially modified. Certain it is that the evidence showed a long continued use by the defendants, and that it was at least conflicting as to whether that use was under assertion of right, and therefore adverse and prescriptive in its nature, or was in subordination to the asserted right of plaintiff and his predecessors. The evidence also showed the expenditure of large sums of money by the company with the knowledge and acquiescence of plaintiff and his predecessors, and yet the court failed to find upon the plea of estoppel. There is further conflict in the evidence as to the construction of the railroad track; plaintiff claiming that it was constructed for the beet sugar factory of the prior owners of the land, defendants insisting that it was a part of its main line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. There thus appears to have been sufficient to have justified the order of the court granting a new trial, and this without a consideration of the propositions advanced upon the appeal from the judgment, since they will only properly come before this court when the trial court has finally expressed its views, as they may be modified by the result of the new trial which it has ordered.

FAUBEL v. McFARLAND et al. (Sac. 1,153.)

TITLE TO REAL ESTATE — ESTOPPEL — ADVERSE POSSESSION—TENANTS IN COMMON—MINING CLAIM—ASSESSMENT WORK.

1. S., the owner of an undivided half interest in a mine, as shown by the records, though witnessing an agreement of V., the owner of the other half, to sell the property, and though present at the mine when it was visited by plaintiff after receiving a deed of the entire property from V., and then wishing plaintiff success, is not estopped to assert his title; he not having known that the deed purported to convey the entire property, and not having made any representations to plaintiff respecting the character of his title.

2. A cotenant cannot by exclusive possession of property acquire title by adverse possession, without notice indicating that the possession is hostile or adverse.

3. One of the tenants in common of a mining claim does not lose to his co-tenant his interest in the mine by not contributing to the assessment work of the latter.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

¶ 2. See Tenancy in Common, vol. 45, Cent. Dig. § 49.

Action by J. Faubel against S. J. McFarland and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. H. Perry, for appellant. J. Quadt, J. P. Martin, A. O. Colton, and A. H. Ricketts, for certain respondents.

HARRISON, C. Action to quiet title. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed. The correctness of the judgment is challenged only in so far as it was in favor of Samuel J. McFarland. In this respect the court found that the plaintiff and McFarland were each the owner of an undivided half of the premises in controversy between them—the Alpha mine, situate in Madera county—and rendered judgment that the plaintiff take nothing against him by reason of this action.

The title of each to the premises is derived through a decree of foreclosure and a sale thereunder, wherein the property was sold November 26, 1894, by a commissioner appointed therefor, to Victoria B. McFarland and the said Samuel J. McFarland; and there having been no redemption therefrom, the commissioner executed a conveyance to them June 6, 1895, which was recorded in the office of the county recorder June 10, 1895. The title thus conveyed to Victoria became vested in the plaintiff by virtue of certain mesne conveyances, while that conveyed to Samuel has never been conveyed by him. As they were, therefore, tenants in common, the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief sought by him. He contends, however, that it appears from other evidence in the record that he has acquired the title to the whole of the property by adverse possession, and that the respondent Samuel is estopped from disputing his title thereto. After the sale by the commissioner, but before the time for redemption had expired, Samuel had some correspondence with an attorney named Clement, looking to an assignment of the certificate of sale held by himself and Victoria (his mother). No assignment of the certificate was made, however, but thereafter Victoria executed an agreement to sell the property to one Cabaniss, in which reference was made to the letter of Samuel. In this agreement it is recited that Cabaniss was acting therein through his attorney, Clement, and the execution of the agreement is witnessed by both Clement and Samuel. Thereafter Victoria conveyed the property to Cabaniss July 22, 1895. At the trial herein the plaintiff testified that Clement was his attorney in conducting the negotiation for this purchase of the property, and that he (the plaintiff) paid the money and received the deed executed to Cabaniss. He does not claim, however, to have taken possession of the property until after the deed from Cabaniss in February, 1896. On the other hand, the husband of Victoria testified that Clement acted as attorney for Mr. Cabaniss, and there was no evidence that Samuel saw the deed to Cabaniss or knew of its contents. Cabaniss conveyed the property to the plaintiff and one Benton February 29, 1896, but the deed was not recorded until April, 1900. Benton conveyed his interest to the plaintiff in October, 1897.

The plaintiff testified that after the deed from Cabaniss to himself and Benton he went to the property and let a contract to run tunnels therein to J. P. McFarland, the father of Samuel; that at the time he took charge of the mine he saw Samuel there and had a conversation with him, in which Samuel wished him success; that he again saw him on the property in 1900; that he visited the property once or twice every year; that J. P. McFarland was in charge up to 1897; and that after that nobody was in charge, no work being done other than assessment work. It cannot be held that the evidence thus presented created an estoppel against Samuel from asserting his title to the undivided half of the property. He made no representation to the plaintiff respecting the character of his title, nor does the plaintiff claim to have relied upon any statement by him, or to have been in any respect influenced thereby in his conduct. At the time that he took the conveyance from Cabaniss he had notice from the public records that Samuel was the owner of an undivided half of the property and that he had never conveyed the same. The presence of Samuel at the mine when the plaintiff went there after receiving the deed from Cabaniss was consistent with this record, as was also his wishing the plaintiff success. It does not appear that Samuel knew that the deed from his mother to Cabaniss, or from Cabaniss to the plaintiff, purported to convey the entire property, and the deed from Cabaniss to the plaintiff was not placed upon record until more than four years after its date.

Neither does the evidence show that the plaintiff had acquired any title by adverse possession of the property. Being tenant in common with the respondent, the plaintiff could not by mere exclusive possession, even if such had existed, acquire the title of his co-tenant. His possession was that of the respondent, and would inure to the benefit of the respondent, until he should by some notice, actual or constructive, indicate to him that such possession was hostile or adverse. The rule on this subject has been so often stated that it is sufficient merely to refer to the cases. Miller v. Myers, 46 Cal. 539; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 592, 49 Am. Rep. 100; De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 662, 30 Pac. 1, 28 Am. St. Rep. 151; Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 27 Pac. 658. The evidence herein falls far short of meeting the requirements of the rule thus indicated.

The fact that Samuel did not contribute to the assessment work done did not deprive him of his interest in the mine, or transfer his interest to the plaintiff. Rev. St. U. S. § 2434 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1498], provide the mode in which the plaintiff could have protected himself; but he did not avail himself of that mode.

There is a suggestion in the appellant's brief, although it is not directly stated, that in the negotiation for the purchase by Cabaniss in 1895 it was the intention of the parties thereto that Samuel should join in the execution of the deed. There is no evidence tending to show this fact, however, and in consideration that his title was clearly shown by the records, and that Mr. Clement acted as attorney for Cabaniss, and must have carefully examined the deed, it is not to be presumed. But, even if such were the intention, it is not available to the plaintiff in this action under the pleadings herein.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

BANK OF WILLOWS v. SMALL et al. (Sac. 1,053.)

APPEAL—REVIEW OF FINDINGS—PAROL GIFT OF LAND—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN CREDITORS' SUIT—EVIDENCE.

1. Every presumption is in favor of the ultimate findings of a trial judge, and it is only in cases where there is an absence of substantial evidence that such findings will be set aside by an appellate court.

2. To sustain a parol gift of land by a mother to her son, the facts must be such that it would be a fraud on the donee if the contract were not enforced, and a mere expression of intention on the part of the mother to give the land to the son, and permitting him for some years to take the rents and profits, where, although she conveyed land by way of gift to other children, she retained the title to that in dispute until after she had incurred a large indebtedness as surety, for which she had been sued, when she conveyed the land to the son without his knowledge, does not make a case which warrants a court of equity in sustaining the conveyance as against her creditor.

3. In a creditors' suit to set aside a conveyance of land by a surety for the plaintiff's debt, evidence is admissible to prove the insolvency of the principal, and also of the surety aside from the land conveyed.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Frank Moody, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Willows against William Henry Small and Nancy Small. From a judgment for plaintiff, William Henry Small appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman and Charles L. Donohoe, for appellant. F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Appellant presents this appeal from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The facts, concerning which there is no controversy, are substantially as follows: Henry Small died in Colusa county about the year 1874, leaving a widow, defendant Nancy Small, to whom he devised all his property, consisting of several ranches, among which was a ranch containing 1,800 acres, known as the "Musick Place," and being the property in controversy here. The land stood on the records in the name of defendant Nancy Small at all times after the decree of distribution in the estate of Henry Small until June, 1896. In March, 1896, one Julian, a son-in-law of defendant Nancy Small, and a brother-in-law of appellant, William Henry Small, borrowed from plaintiff $5,000, giving his promissory note therefor, signed by defendant Nancy Small, the note being a joint and several note. In May, 1896, Julian died, being insolvent, and his estate has ever since been insolvent. After the death of Julian in June, 1896, defendant Nancy Small, without consideration, made and recorded a deed of gift to her son and codefendant, William Henry Small, who knew nothing about it, and was then in the state of Oregon, where he had resided since the death of his father. This land was the only property possessed by defendant Nancy Small, and by her conveyance to her son she became, and has since been, insolvent. After the death of Julian plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of Colusa county against defendant Nancy Small upon the said promissory note, and recovered a judgment for the amount thereof, with interest, the total being $5,417.58. Upon this judgment a writ of execution was issued, and, after the application of $1,207.99, being the proceeds of sales of certain personal property, was returned unsatisfied for the balance, $4,332, which is still due and unpaid. This action was commenced in October, 1896, for the purpose of setting aside as fraudulent and void, as to the plaintiff, the deed made by defendant Nancy Small to her son and codefendant, and resulted in judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff. It was not disputed that at the time of the conveyance by defendant Nancy Small to her codefendant she was insolvent, and that she has remained so; that plaintiff was a creditor of Nancy Small at the time of the said conveyance, and is still such creditor; that the deed so executed by her was without consideration, and was a deed of gift. Defendant Nancy Small made default, and is therefore out of the case. There being no appeal from the judgment, it will be regarded as the correct conclusion from the facts found.

The appellant contends that he had title to the land by reason of a parol executed gift of the same, and by reason of adverse possession for more than five years immediately prior to the commencement of the suit. The court found against him on both propositions, and the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings in this regard is the important question here. Every presumption is in favor of the ultimate findings of the trial judge. It is only in cases where there is an absence of substantial evidence that this court will interfere. It is said in appellant's brief: "There can be no question, under the evidence in this action, that if the defendant relied entirely and solely for his title upon the deed made to him by Nancy Small in June, 1896, that his case must fail, and plaintiff would be entitled to judgment, because, if that were his only claim to the land, there is no doubt but, under the provisions of section 3442 of the Civil Code, that the deed would be void. But the defendant William Henry Small does not claim a title to this land by virtue of that deed." Appellant then proceeds to argue that he obtained title by a parol gift from his mother in the year 1878. Experience has proven that parol evidence is too uncertain, and perjury is too often committed, to allow a title to real estate to rest in parol. It has therefore been the rule in England, and in this country, and in all civilized countries, for many years, that a conveyance of real estate is void unless in writing. Courts of equity, in order to prevent great wrongs, have recognized and established certain well-defined exceptions to the rule. Where the conduct and acts of the owner have been such as in equity and good conscience to estop him from claiming the land—as where he has received the consideration, and allowed the party purchasing to go into possession and erect valuable improvements; or where he has made a parol gift, and the donee has gone into possession, made valuable improvements and changed his condition; and in other cases where the equities are similar—courts will grant relief. But in all such cases the facts must be such that it would be a fraud upon the innocent party in possession not to enforce the parol contract. These exceptions have grown up under the doctrines of courts of equity, and while, in many cases, preventing great injustice, have been a source of much litigation, and have perplexed the courts in drawing distinctions as to whether or not any given case is an exception. The tendency of courts of late years has been to strictly construe the rule as to exceptions, and not to extend the doctrine. When a party claims the assistance of a court of equity to enforce an exception to the rule, the case must fall within the doctrine of courts of equity as to such exceptions, and the evidence must be clear and convincing. Particularly is this so as to family arrangements where a parol gift of land is claimed by one child to the exclusion of others, or by a wife to the exclusion of the children. It is often sought in such cases to construe acts of kindness attributable to love and affection into gifts such as to pass valuable estates. A man who has been kind to a son or brother dies, and when he can no longer speak the party who has been the object of his bounty, and who should show his gratitude, sets up a claim of title which he never asserted while the owner was living. The rule, as stated in Waterman on Specific Performance of Contracts, § 187, is as follows: "A gift of real estate will be enforced with great caution, and not, in general, unless the donee has taken possession and made improvements on the faith of the gift. When he does this, it constitutes a valuable consideration to ground a claim for specific performance. Where complainants alleged a gift of real estate from defendant's testator in consideration of natural love and affection, and that the donee, pursuant to said gift, went into possession of the premises, made large improvements thereon, and finally died in possession thereof, it was held that, to entitle the complainants to a decree, there must be a conclusive proof of the gift, and satisfactory evidence explaining why the gift was not consummated by a conveyance." It was said by this court in Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 142: "It is a rule well settled that a party who claims a right to a conveyance of land under a parol or verbal contract on the ground of part performance must make out by clear and satisfactory proof the existence of the contract as alleged by him; and it is not enough that the acts of part performance proved are evidence of some agreement, but they must be unequivocal and satisfactory evidence of the particular agreement charged in the complaint or answer, as the case may be; besides which the agreement must appear to be certain in its terms, and just and fair in all its parts." A valuable and leading case upon the subject of a parol gift between relatives is Poorman v. Kilgore, 26 Pa. 372, 67 Am. Dec. 524. It is there said: "The very nature of the relation, therefore, requires the contracts between parents and children to be proved by a kind of evidence that is very different from that which may be sufficient between strangers. It must be direct, positive, express, and unambiguous. The terms must be clearly defined, and all the acts necessary for its validity must have especial reference to it, and nothing else. [Christine v. Manderson] 2 Pa. 365 [not in point]; [Hack v. Stewart] 8 Pa. 213; [Bash v. Bash] 9 Pa. 262; [Lantz v. Frey] 14 Pa. 201; [Sanders v. Wagonseller] 19 Pa. 251–366; [McCue v. Johnston] 25 Pa. 308; [Huguss v. Walker] 12 Pa. 175. The importance of this rule is very apparent, for it requires but a glance over the cases of this class to discover how sad has been the experience of the court in family disputes growing out of the exceptions which have been allowed to this statute; and how many and how distressing must have been the ruptures of the closest ties of kindred that have been produced and perpetuated by the encouragement thus given to try the experiment of extracting legal obligations out of acts of parental kindness." It was said in Poullain v. Poullain, 76 Ga. 420, 4 S. E. 92: "Where a son claims land under a parol gift from his father, the evidence should be so clear, strong, and unambiguous as to leave no reasonable doubt." In Hardesty v. Richardson, Ex'r, 44 Md. 617, 22 Am. Rep. 57, the rule is thus stated: "The proof must be clear, definite, and conclusive as to the fact of the gift, and those facts done on the faith of it, which render inequitable any attempt on the part of the doner to avoid the gift." In Jones v. Tyler, 6 Mich. 364, the rule is thus stated: "There is no evidence in this case clearly establishing the fact that Job Tyler ever gave, or agreed to convey, the property in question to his son De Witt. That he sold it, there is no pretense. As against the widow and heirs of Job Tyler, a decree for a conveyance would be made only on the most conclusive proof of the gift and of some satisfactory reason why it was not consummated by a conveyance, even if upon the case made by the bill relief would, in any case, be granted. * * * The evidence of Bonham is the most direct and satisfactory of any, but even this shows no contract of agreement; nothing but an unexecuted intention."

It is not necessary to cite further authorities. Now, the court found: "The said defendant Nancy Small was the owner in fee and entitled to the possession of all of said real estate in the month of October, 1878, and had been and was such owner in fee and entitled to the possession at all times from that time unto the date of said deed of gift, to wit, June 10, 1896; that on the ——— day of October, 1878, or at any other time, the said defendant Nancy Small did not make a gift of all or any of the land described in the complaint to the defendant William Henry Small; and upon the ——— day of October, 1878, or at any other time, the defendant Nancy Small did not deliver to the defendant William Henry Small the possession of all or any of the lands above described in pursuance to any gift." This finding is supported by the evidence. Nancy Small was defendant's witness. When we remember that she is a hostile witness to plaintiff and friendly to her codefendant, her evidence is doubly significant. She testified that after the death of her husband in 1875 she gave and deeded to her daughter Mrs. Welch the "Welch Place," to her daughter Mrs. Julian the "Julian Place," to her son George the "Fruto Ranch," that defendant William Henry Small lived in Oregon on some land given him by his father in his lifetime; that she intended him to have the Musick Place, the land in contest; that it was the understanding that appellant should have the land in contest; that about four years after her husband's death appellant came down from Oregon on a visit; that he said to her, "Mother, you just as well give me a deed to this place" (referring to the land in contest); that she replied, "William, that is my last piece of land, and I have always had a home, and I could not be satisfied—could not rest satisfied—if I gave up the land. 'Well,' he says, 'Mother, hold it. * * * I will wait a while for a deed.'" The defendant William Henry Small continued to live in Oregon, and did not live on the place, although his mother had allowed him to use it, and take the rents and profits. He does not appear to have asked her again for a deed. After the death of her son-in-law, and without request from appellant, and without his knowledge, while the note was still unpaid, she voluntarily executed the deed to him. The appellant testified that all his father's real estate was left to his mother, to be disposed of as she saw fit; that the first time he saw his mother after his father's death was in October, 1878; that his mother told him she had willed him this land—that she had given it to him—and showed him the will; that he, through his agents, rented the place thereafter to tenants, and received the rents, and paid the expenses of keeping up the place and taxes. The appellant does not deny the conversation with his mother in which he said, "Mother, hold it; I will wait a while for a deed." The land was always assessed to defendant Nancy Small. While the evidence tends to show that defendant Nancy Small intended that appellant at some time should have the land, it does not show that she finally made up her mind to part with it until she made the deed after the death of her son-in-law Julian. Appellant was allowed to take the rents and profits, but this did not injure him, and shows no equitable ground for relief. It is not a case where the donee went into possession and expended money in valuable improvements on the faith of an oral gift. If the property had been levied upon by a creditor of appellant prior to the deed of June 10, 1896, could such creditor have held the land as against Nancy Small? It seems plain that it could have been shown to be the property of Nancy Small. The promise had not been fulfilled. There is no testimony to show a clear intention of Nancy Small at any time prior to the deed to part with the title and vest it in appellant. If so, she would have made a deed. She made deeds to her other children. When she parted with the title to them, she did it in the usual manner. She kept the title in her own name of the land she wanted for a home. She had it in her own name when she signed the note as security for Julian. When Julian died insolvent, she made the deed to appellant without his knowledge. It is at least singular that her intention to part with the home took place so suddenly, and under such circumstances. Under such circumstances the law will compel her to be just before she is generous. Appellant may take the land deeded to him as a gift, but he must take it subject to the burden of the debt incurred by the owner while she kept it in her name.

As to adverse possession, the court found that appellant's possession was "not adverse or hostile to the said Nancy Small, and his possession was permissive from her, and he held under and in pursuance and in recognition of her title, and not adversely to her during all of that time." The evidence heretofore discussed shows this finding to be true.

Appellant claims that the court made several errors in the admission or rejection of testimony. Several of the first errors assigned relate to the allowance of proof by oral testimony, and the records and papers in the estate of Julian, for the purpose of showing that the estate is insolvent, and the claim of plaintiff unpaid. The evidence was proper. It was necessary for plaintiff to show that it could not collect its claim from the estate of Julian, nor from other property of Nancy Small, before it could complain as to the deed. The deed would not have injured plaintiff if it could still collect the amount of its claim from other sources.

The other alleged errors are equally without merit. They are not of such character, even if technically erroneous, as to justify a reversal of the case.

The order should be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BARKER. (Cr. 1,149.)*

BURGLARY—WITNESS—ABSENCE FROM STATE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—SUFFICIENCY.

1. In a criminal prosecution a police officer testified to a conversation with an absent witness between the time of the commission of the alleged crime and the date of the trial, in which he was told by the witness that he was going to the state of Washington. The officer also testified that he had never seen the witness afterwards, though he had made inquiries at the places where the witness had formerly resided and failed to find him. A brother of the absent witness testified that he resided in the state of Washington, and that letters had been received from him from there by the witness testifying, the last about seven or eight days before the trial. Held sufficient to warrant a finding that the witness was absent from the state, authorizing the admission of the testimony of the absent witness at the preliminary hearing of the charge against defendant.

2. Testimony to the fact of having received letters from a person is not hearsay.

3. Where a witness is absent when a criminal case is called for trial, letters from him, written from a place outside of the state at different times to a person in the state, are admissible as tending to show where the absent witness was at those times, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, providing that it is presumed that private transactions have been fair and regular, and that things have happened according to the ordinary habits of life.

4. Where a witness is absent when a criminal case is called for trial, a paper purporting to be a subpœna, issued by the district attorney and addressed to the absent witness, and given to an officer, is admissible to show that it could not be served on account of the absence of the witness, though not properly signed.

5. In a prosecution for burglary, where it appeared that a certain witness was not married to defendant at the time of the burglary, but was married to him afterwards, permitting the prosecutor to ask the witness where she was married to defendant is not cause for reversal, though she answered that she was married to him in the county jail.

6. In a prosecution for burglary, where it appeared that the stolen property was found in the rooms occupied by defendant and a woman whom he married shortly after the commission of the alleged crime, the fact that an adjoining room, connected with defendant's room by a door, was occupied by two other persons, who had access to defendant's rooms, so that defendant was not in exclusive possession of the room in which the property was found, does not render the stolen property inadmissible.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. P. Lawlor, Judge.

Thomas Barker was convicted of burglary, and from the judgment of conviction, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendant was convicted of burglary and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. He asks for a reversal upon the grounds, first, that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, and, second, that the court committed errors during the trial in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence.

1. The first ground is not tenable. The evidence presented some room for a plausible argument to the jury that it was not sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty; but there was evidence tending to show defendant's guilt, sufficient to put that question fairly within the province of the jury.

2. We do not think that there should be a new trial for any asserted error in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence. The only point under this head which calls for any considerable discussion arises on the alleged error in admitting in evidence the testimony of August Amiot, which had been given at the preliminary examination. The witness Braig, a police officer, testified that Amiot bid him good-by in San Francisco, where he had been living, and told him that he was going to Seattle, in the state of Washington, to engage in business there. The exact date of this conversation is not given, but it was between the date of the burglary and the time of the trial. Braig also testified that he had never seen Amiot afterwards in San Francisco, where he had formerly resided, and that he had made inquiries for him at the places where he had formerly resided and frequented, and failed to find him. John B. Amiot, who is a brother of said August Amiot, testified, first generally, without objection, that August resided in Seattle, and afterwards that he had received letters from August from Seattle, and that the last letter so received was about seven or eight days before the trial, in which he stated that he was to go to Idaho, traveling for his firm, and would be back at Seattle in about eight days. This evidence warranted the court in finding that the witness was absent from the state, and in allowing his testimony given at the preliminary examination to be introduced. It was stronger than that held sufficient in People v. McIntyre, 127 Cal. 427, 59 Pac. 779, and People v. Goodrich, 142 Cal. 220, 221, 75 Pac. 796.

But appellant objected to the testimony of John B. Amiot that he had received letters from his brother from Seattle upon the ground that it was hearsay. This ground of objection is not tenable. The testimony of John B. was not itself hearsay. It was testimony to the fact that he received certain letters from his brother from a place outside the state; and the fact that August wrote letters from Seattle at certain times was admissible as a fact tending to show that he was there at those times. These letters were apparently written in the ordinary course of things, and there is nothing to raise a suspicion that they were not in fact written at Seattle, or that they were sent there from some other place to be mailed there, to meet some emergency, and to accomplish some fraudulent intent. It is presumed that "a person is innocent of crime or wrong," that "private transactions have been fair and regular," and that things have happened "according to the ordinary habits of life." Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. These letters sent by Amiot from Seattle were concurrent acts tending to show his presence there, not narrative of past events; and they were clearly admissible as evidence of his presence there within the rule stated in sections 108, 162c, 162d (16th Ed.) Greenl. Ev. In section 108 the author says that declarations of a person are admissible as evidence that he "is upon a journey, or leaves his home, or returns thither, or remains abroad." And see cases cited in notes to said section 108. In King v. McCarthy, 54 Minn. 90, 55 N. W. 960, a case quite similar to the one at bar, the question was whether there was sufficient evidence of the absence of one Bell to warrant the introduction of his testimony at a former trial. And the court in summing up the evidence, which was held sufficient, say that "his brother in St. Paul had since his departure received frequent letters from him, dated at Chicago, New York, Indiana, Kansas City, and St. Louis; the latest being from the last-named place about two weeks previously." And the court say: "Whether he intends to return is a fact only positively known to himself, and upon this question his declarations are admissible." And the court further says: "We do not understand that the competency of evidence upon a preliminary question of this kind, which is to a certain extent addressed to the sound discretion of the court, is governed by the same strict rules which apply to the admission of evidence upon the issues in the case. Anything which will reasonably satisfy the court that the absent witness is not likely to return within the jurisdiction of the state may be admitted."

A paper purporting to be a subpœna, issued by the district attorney and addressed to the absent witness, and given to an officer, was admitted in evidence, over the objection of appellant that it had not been properly signed; but this was an entirely immaterial matter. If the witness had been served, and he had refused to obey the subpœna, its sufficiency on contempt proceedings might have been important. It was evidently issued merely for the purpose of formally showing that it could not be served on account of the absence of the witness, which absence was well known to the prosecution.

Appellant's wife was asked by the prosecution, over objection, where she was married to appellant, and answered that she was married to him in the county jail. Whether or not this question was strictly proper, it certainly was not, under the circumstances, of sufficient importance to have been prejudicial to the appellant. It abundantly appeared from the testimony of both sides, and was uncontradicted, that the witness was not married to appellant at the time of the burglary, but was married to him afterwards, and after his arrest. The fact that the marriage took place in the county jail, where appellant was presumably confined, was a matter, considering the other facts above referred to, which could not have had any additional effect upon the jury.

Appellant objected to the introduction in evidence of the stolen property. This property was found in the rooms occupied by the appellant and the woman who afterwards became his wife, within an hour or two after the burglary; and the objection was on the ground that an adjoining room, connected with appellant's rooms by a door, was occupied by two other persons, who had access to appellant's rooms, and therefore appellant was not in exclusive possession of the room in which the property was found. This objection is not tenable. It goes only to the weight of the evidence, and not to its admissibility.

There are no other points necessary to be considered. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

IVANCOVICH et al. v. WEILENMAN et al.

(S. F. 3,815.)

PARTITION—JUDGMENT—ISSUES—CONCLUSIVENESS.

1. On an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone the only question reviewable is whether the findings support the judgment.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 758, provides that in partition, if defendants claim a lien on the property, they shall state the original amount and date of the same, and the sum remaining due thereon. Section 759 declares that the right of the several parties plaintiff as well as defendant may be determined in such action; and section 766 provides that a final judgment is binding on all parties to the action and their legal representatives, who at the time have any interest in the property divided, or any part thereof. Held, that where, in partition, defendants therein denied that plaintiff had any interest in the property, and the question whether the one-half of a sum voluntarily paid by defendants to redeem the property from mortgage foreclosure should be a lien on the share of the property claimed by plaintiff was litigated and decided adversely to defendants, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for one-half of the land, such judgment was conclusive of the issue of lien in a subsequent action to recover from such plaintiff one-half of the amount so paid.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Benito County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by John Ivancovich and another against Laura R. Weilenman and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. E. Cothran, for appellants. Briggs & Hudner, for respondents.

COOPER, C. Action to recover from defendant Laura R. Weilenman one-half the amount paid by plaintiffs to one Rosenberg to redeem the property described in the complaint from foreclosure sale, to have said amount adjudged to be a lien against the interest of said Laura R. Weilenman in and to the said lands, and for a decree that the lien of defendant Briggs upon the interest of defendant Laura R. Weilenman is subsequent to, and subject to, the lien claimed by plaintiffs. Findings were filed, upon which judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs against Laura R. Weilenman for one-half the amount paid to redeem the said lands, but it was adjudged that the same was not a lien upon any interest of defendant Laura R. Weilenman in any part of the lands.

Plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone. The only question, then, is as to whether or not the findings support the judgment. They show, in substance, that in November, 1899, the plaintiffs and defendant Laura R. Weilenman—who will hereafter be called the defendant—were the owners as tenants in common (the defendant owning an undivided one-half) of the lands described in the complaint, there being 480 acres, and executed their mortgage upon the same to one Rosenberg to secure their promissory notes amounting to $8,000. Rosenberg subsequently foreclosed his mortgage, and in December, 1900, purchased the said lands under foreclosure sale for $8,963.89. Rosenberg immediately thereupon executed a deed to plaintiffs of all his interest in said property, and assigned to them his certificate of sale in consideration of $1,000 cash and plaintiffs' notes amounting to $7,920, secured by a mortgage made by plaintiffs purporting to mortgage all the said real estate. Plaintiffs evidently thought they were getting the entire property, and that they had a right to mortgage it to Rosenberg. Defendants did not request the plaintiffs to redeem from Rosenberg, and did not join in the new notes and mortgage so made by plaintiffs to him. In May, 1901, defendant commenced an action in the superior court of the county where the lands are situated, in which she was plaintiff against plaintiffs and Rosenberg as defendants, for the partition of said lands, and alleged in her complaint that she was the owner, as her separate property, of an undivided one-half, and plaintiffs were the owners of the other undivided one-half of the said real estate as tenants in common. She further alleged in her complaint that Rosenberg had a mortgage of record executed by plaintiffs upon their undivided one-half interest in the property to secure the said $7,920, and that there were no other liens or incumbrances of record upon said lands. She prayed that partition of the property be made according to the rights of the respective parties, and that it be adjudged that the later mortgage of Rosenberg was a lien upon the portion of the property set apart to plaintiffs, and not upon the portion belonging to defendant. In such partition suit, after service of summons, the defendants therein (Rosenberg and the plaintiffs herein) filed their answers, in which they denied that this defendant, plaintiff therein, was a tenant in common or the owner of any portion of the said lands. They further averred that the said lands belonged to the defendants therein John and Luke Ivancovich as sole owners in fee, and that the mortgage of Rosenberg was upon the whole of said property. Their theory was that defendant was not the owner of any title or interest in the property. Upon the trial of said partition suit, the court found that this defendant was the owner as tenant in common of an undivided one-half of said real estate free from any lien thereon, and that these plaintiffs were the owners as tenants in common of an undivided one-half interest therein, and that the mortgage of Rosenberg was a lien only upon the interest of plaintiffs. An interlocutory decree was made and entered in said partition suit appointing a referee, directing partition of said property, and that when so partitioned the mortgage of Rosenberg should be a lien only upon plaintiffs' portion, they being defendants in said partition suit. Said interlocutory decree became final, and the referee proceeded to partition the property into two lots or parcels, which were described by metes and bounds, and designated as lots 1 and 2; lot 1 being awarded to these plaintiffs and lot 2 to this defendant. The court in said partition suit, after due notice and hearing, confirmed the report of said referee. The final decree in partition contained the following clause: "And it is hereby adjudged and decreed that the said partition hereby made and made in accordance with the partition made by said referee and as reported by him in and by his report shall be and is effectual forever, and said defendants and each of them are hereby decreed henceforth to have no interest, right, title, or claim, lien, or incumbrance in, to, or upon said lot 2 herein described, set apart, allotted, and decreed to said plaintiff Laura R. Weilenman." In this case the court finds, as to the former judgment and decree in the partition suit: "That said judgment and decree ever since said 21st day of April, 1902, has been and now is a final judgment and decree, and the same has never been appealed from, modified, reversed, or set aside, but the same is now, and has been since said date of entry, in full force and effect. That all of the facts as found by the court as aforesaid were in issue in said action, and were presented for determination, adjudication, and decision, and were all actually litigated, adjudicated, and determined in said action, and that said questions, matters, and things so litigated, adjudicated, and determined in said action are the same questions, matters, and things presented for determination in this action, and that said matters, questions, and things have been, as hereinbefore set out, already fully litigated, adjudicated, and determined." It is thus apparent that, if the former judgment in partition is a bar to this proceeding, the judgment of the court is correct. In the former case the plaintiffs were brought in to answer the claim of this defendant that she was the owner of an undivided one-half of the premises free from any lien, and particularly of the lien of Rosenberg's mortgage. They denied that this defendant owned any interest in the property. They alleged that the lien of Rosenberg's mortgage was upon the whole of the property. They did not claim any lien upon defendants' interest in the property by reason of their redemption from Rosenberg. Their theory was that they were the absolute owners of the property, and that this defendant had no interest of any kind therein. The court found against them on both propositions. It found that Rosenberg's mortgage was only upon the interest of these plaintiffs. If plaintiffs in the partition suit had desired to have the court declare that they were entitled to a lien upon the interest of defendant by reason of the redemption from Rosenberg, they should have brought the matter before the court. Defendant had asked in the partition suit to have it decreed that she was the owner of an undivided one-half of the said lands. Plaintiffs were parties to such partition suit, and the court did so decree. The adjudication became final.

It is stated in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 758, that in partition proceedings, if "defendants claim a lien on the property by mortgage, judgment or otherwise, they must state the original amount and date of the same, and the sum remaining due thereon." Section 759 provides: "The right of the several parties plaintiff as well as defendant, may be put in issue, tried and determined in said action." The final judgment is binding and conclusive "on all persons named as parties to the action, and their legal representatives who have at the time any interest in the property divided or any part thereof." Code Civ. Proc. § 766. The rule is well settled that a judgment between the same parties is conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter in controversy in the action upon which it is based, but also in all cases involving the same question, and upon all matters involved in the issues which might have been litigated and decided in the case; the presumption being that all such issues were met and decided. Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 177, 68 Pac. 597; Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 511, 62 Pac. 825. In Wheeler v. Eldred, 137 Cal. 38, 69 Pac. 619, the plaintiff's motion for an execution had been denied by the court below, and the judgment affirmed here. Plaintiff then applied again for an execution upon a different ground, but one which existed when the first motion was made. This court held the first motion res adjudicata, and in the opinion said: "It is also contended by appellant that because on the first motion appellant did not aver that the judgment remained unsatisfied in whole or in part, while he does so aver on the second motion, therefore the former judgment is not a bar; in other words, that the point involved was not adjudicated on the first motion because appellant did not then aver all that he should and could have averred. Under that view, after an adverse judgment, there would be no end to the number of suits which might be maintained on the cause of action already adjudicated." And the rule as to res adjudicata applies in all its force to actions in partition. In Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 593, 95 Am. Dec. 139, this court said: "The whole scope and tenor of the provisions of the act relating to partition show that the intention was to make the one judgment of partition final and conclusive on all persons interested in the property, or any part of it, of whom the court could acquire jurisdiction, and not to permit the matter to be taken up piecemeal; and accordingly provision is made for bringing in not only tenants in common and joint tenants in the whole or any part of the property, but those having future rights or estates, those entitled to remainder or reversion, those having estates for life or for years, those holding liens by mortgage, judgment, or otherwise; and power is given to the court to try and determine the rights of all the parties to the action, and to order compensation to be made by one tenant to another so as to equalize the shares allotted to each." In Morenhout v. Higuera, 32 Cal. 296, this court said: "The former judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties at common law is not only conclusive as to the matters which were actually tried and determined, but also as to other matters which they might have litigated and might have had determined. Much more so is it under the statute in relation to partition. The plaintiffs could have had their right to this land litigated and determined in the partition suit in the sense contended for by their counsel, and, not having done so, they are as much bound by the judgment as if they had." And the rule in partition cases has been applied under different circumstances in the following cases: Bradley v. Harkness, 26 Cal. 70; De Uprey v. De Uprey, 27 Cal. 330, 87 Am. Dec. 81; Bollo v. Navarro, 33 Cal. 459; Senter v. De Bernal, 38 Cal. 637; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 27 Pac. 1082; Towle Bros. v. Quinn, 141 Cal. 382, 74 Pac. 1046.

We think there is no escape from the conclusion, as matter of law, that the former judgment in partition is conclusive against the plaintiffs. They have their judgment against defendant. If they are unable to collect it, they are unfortunate, but we cannot assist them in this case.

The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

BICKERDIKE v. STATE. (Sac. 1,237.)

BOUNTIES—KILLING WILD ANIMALS—COYOTES—STATUTES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATES—DEBT LIMIT—CLAIMS—CERTIFICATES — EFFECT—PRIMA FACIE PROOF—LIMITATIONS.

1. St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, providing a bounty for the killing of coyotes, declared that the person killing the same should present the scalps, with an affidavit as to the killing, and deposit the same with the board of supervisors, which board should quarterly determine the number of scalps deposited, and should give to each person who may have deposited scalps a certificate, certified by its clerk, etc., which might be presented to the Controller of the state, who might draw his warrant on the State Treasurer for the sum named therein, and that, when the certificate was directed to be drawn, the board of supervisors should at the same time cause the scalps to be destroyed by fire. Held that, though the Controller was not authorized to draw his warrant for such claims until they had been approved by the state board of examiners, such board, though authorized to hear additional evidence, could allow the claims on the certificates alone.

2. The coyote bounty act (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198) provided for the issuance of certificates by boards of supervisors for coyotes killed, which certificates, when presented to the State Controller and allowed as claims by the state board of examiners, entitled the owner or holder to a warrant drawn on the general fund in the state treasury. A large number of such warrants not having been paid, for failure of the Legislature to make a specific appropriation therefor, as required by Const. art. 4, § 22, and Pol. Code, § 433, subd. 17, St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, was passed, authorizing suits against the state on such claims. Held that, in the absence of any showing by the state as to the validity of certain of such claims sued on, the certificates issued by the boards of supervisors were prima facie proof of the validity thereof.

3. A certificate by E., clerk of the board of supervisors of M. county, Cal., reciting that he made the same pursuant to the order of the board passed October 3, 1894, and that B. had deposited with him, as such clerk, during the quarter ending September 30, 1894, 50 coyote scalps, each containing the nose and ears, and that there was due B. from the state the sum of $250, was a substantial compliance with the coyote bounty act (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198), requiring the board of supervisors to give to the claimant "a certificate, certified by its clerk," and sufficiently showed a determination by the board as to the deposit of the scalps, accompanied by the proof required.

4. The repeal of the coyote bounty act (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198), providing for the issuance of certificates by boards of supervisors for coyotes killed, did not destroy the effect of such certificates as to claims already accrued.

5. Accrued and perfected claims against the state for coyote bounty, as authorized by St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, prior to the repeal of such act, constituted property capable of assignment, under St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, authorizing "the owners or holders of claims and demands for such bounty to bring suits thereon."

6. Under Civ. Code, § 1052, providing that a transfer may be made without writing in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute, claims for coyote bounty, as authorized by St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, were assignable by parol.

7. Where perfected claims against the state for coyote bounty were transferred without writing by a delivery of the claimant's certificate issued by the county board of supervisors, and by a power of attorney executed at the same time authorizing the transferee to obtain payment of the bounty from the state as the transferror's agent and attorney, evidence of such parol transfer was not objectionable as contradicting the power, since such power did not purport to express the agreement between the parties, but constituted mere authority, without which the purchasers could not have obtained the proceeds of the claim from the state.

8. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, limiting the rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict a written agreement to the parties to the agreement and their representatives and successors in interest, parol evidence of a transfer of coyote bounty claims to plaintiff could not be objected to by the state, in an action thereon, on the ground that it tended to contradict certain powers of attorney executed to the transferees as a part of the transfer.

9. Under St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, authorizing suits against the state on claims for coyote bounty, as provided by St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, provided such suits were brought "within 12 months after the passage of the act" of 1901, suits brought within such time were not barred by limitations under St. 1893, p. 57, c. 45, requiring suits against the state to be brought within two years, which limitation had run against such claims long prior to the passage of St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214.

10. Since a statute of limitations affects the remedy only, and does not go to the substance of the right, St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, authorizing suits against the state on claims for coyote bounty, already barred by the two-year limitation imposed by St. 1893, p. 57, c. 45, was not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 31, prohibiting the Legislature from making any gift of public money or anything of value.

11. St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, providing a coyote bounty, required the coyote scalps and certain proof to be deposited with the clerk of the board of supervisors, upon which the board was required to deliver to the claimant a certificate, on which the Controller of the state was authorized to draw his warrant. It being thereafter held that the Controller was not entitled to draw such warrant until the claim had been approved by the board of examiners, and that such warrants could not be paid in the absence of an appropriation from the general fund, large numbers of such claims remained unpaid, until by St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, suits were authorized against the state thereon. Held that, since the certificates made by such boards of supervisors were prima facie evidence of the claimant's right, it was not necessary, in an action brought under the act of 1901, that the complaint should allege a presentation of the claims to the state board of examiners.

12. Where, in an action on a complaint containing 892 counts, the court found that all the facts set forth in the complaint were true, except the allegations in certain specified counts, and that none of the facts set forth in the answer were true, and only one count was contained in the transcript on appeal, under a stipulation reciting that the aggregate amount of all the counts was $72,330, and the aggregate amount of all others than those specially mentioned in the decision was $59,680, for which latter amount judgment was ordered, it thereby appeared that judgment was given for plaintiff only on the counts not specially mentioned, and hence any conflict in the findings as to the specified counts was immaterial on defendant's appeal.

13. St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, authorizing suits against the state on claims for coyote bounty, authorized by St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, was not objectionable as special legislation.

14. Where, at the time St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, was enacted, providing for a coyote bounty, no appropriation was made from the current revenue of the state to pay claims thereunder, such claims did not constitute debts of the state, within Const. art. 16, § 1, prohibiting the Legislature from creating debts in excess of the sum of $300,000, except in case of war, etc.

15. Indebtedness of the state, evidenced by funded debt bonds issued as authorized by St. 1869–70, p. 646, c. 444, under authority of a vote of the people of the state at a general election, is not an indebtedness of the state, within Const. art. 16, § 1, prohibiting the Legislature from creating debts which shall singly or in the aggregate, with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of $300,000, etc.

16. Where, at the time St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, creating a coyote bounty of $5 for each coyote killed, was passed, the indebtedness of the state amounted to only $5,000, such act was not in violation of Const. art. 16, § 1, limiting the indebtedness that might be created by the Legislature to $300,000, since the amount which might become due to persons under the terms of the act would not necessarily exceed $295,000; the only effect of the constitutional provision being, in such an event, to render void any indebtedness incurred in excess of the constitutional limit.

17. Claims which had been previously paid by state officers without a prior appropriation should not be taken into consideration in determining the validity of claims subsequently accruing, on the ground that the debt limit prescribed by such constitutional provision was thereby exceeded.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Charles Bickerdike against the state of California. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the state appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Devlin & Devlin, of counsel), for the State. Geo. E. Bates, W. C. Van Fleet, and Edward F. Treadwell, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action brought under the provisions of an act entitled "An act authorizing suits against the state on claims or demands arising under an act of the Legislature entitled 'An act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps,' approved March 31, 1891, and regulating the procedure therein." St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214. The act of March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198), provided that a bounty of five dollars should be paid from the general fund of the state, to each person who should kill and destroy any coyote or coyotes in any county of the state, for each coyote so destroyed, and contained various provisions as to the proofs of killing required and the manner of collection of the bounty. This act was repealed by an act approved January 24, 1895. St. 1895, p. 1, c. 1. In the meantime many claims for bounties under this act had been made, some of which were paid by the State Controller upon the certificates of clerks of boards of supervisors of various counties, as provided in the act. It was then determined by this court in the case of Ingram v. Colgan, Controller, 106 Cal. 113, 38 Pac. 315, 39 Pac. 437, 28 L. R. A. 187, 46 Am. St. Rep. 221, that the bounty act was not in conflict with any constitutional provision, but that, notwithstanding the language of the act as to the drawing of a warrant by the Controller, there was nothing in the act exempting the claims from the provisions of section 672, Pol. Code, and that such warrants could not, therefore, be drawn until the claims had been approved by the state board of examiners. Upon rehearing it was further held that the bounty act did not make any specific appropriation out of the general fund for the payment of any of these claims, inasmuch as it failed to designate the amount thereof that could be so used. There being no specific appropriation, the claims could not be paid until an appropriation should be made. Section 22, art. 4, Const.; subdivision 17, § 433, Pol. Code.

It is stated in respondent's brief that under the bounty act certificates aggregating in amount $475,100 were issued, of which $187,485 was paid by the Controller and Treasurer prior to the decision in Ingram v.

Colgan, supra. It is further stated that succeeding Legislatures passed acts appropriating money to pay the remaining $287,615, but that said acts failed to obtain executive approval. On March 23, 1901, the act authorizing suits against the state on such claims was approved. By this act it was provided that "the owners or holders of claims or demands against this state" arising under the bounty act might, within 12 months from the passage of the act, bring suit thereon and prosecute the same to final judgment; that the rules of practice in civil cases should apply to such suits, except as otherwise provided in the act, with the right of appeal to either party; that the summons should be served on the Attorney General, who should defend on behalf of the state; that the place of trial, upon the demand of the Attorney General, should be changed to the county of Sacramento; that all costs in such action should be paid by the plaintiff, and any judgment should be for the amount actually due, without costs and without interest, and that such judgment should not bear interest; and that the Attorney General should report all final judgments recovered against the state to the Legislature.

This action was brought by the plaintiff, claiming to be the assignee of many such claims or demands; the complaint containing 892 counts on as many claims, the aggregate amount thereof being alleged to be $72,330. The first count substantially alleged that after March 31, 1891, and within three months prior to the presentation of the scalps and affidavit required by the bounty act to the clerk of the board of supervisors, James Ben killed and destroyed 50 coyotes in the county of Merced, state of California; that he thereafter went before a person authorized to administer oaths, and presented the scalps of said coyotes, containing the ears and noses thereof, to such officer, and made the affidavit prescribed by law, showing the time and place that such animals were killed, and thereafter deposited such scalps and affidavit with the clerk of the board of supervisors; that thereafter, on or about October 3, 1894, the board of supervisors did determine the number of scalps so deposited by said Ben with the clerk of said board as aforesaid during the preceding quarter to be 50 scalps, and did give to him a certificate, certified by its clerk, showing the said number of scalps so deposited by him and the sum due him therefor at the rate of $5 for each scalp, to wit, $250; that thereafter the said certificate and claim or demand were assigned to plaintiff, and no part thereof has been paid. The other counts were in all particulars the same as this, except as to the county, date of determination by the board of supervisors, number of scalps, amount due, and person to whom due. The trial court found in plaintiff's favor upon most of the counts, giving him judgment for $59,680, without interest or costs. The state appeals from this judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. One of the principal questions presented by these appeals is as to the effect of the certificates issued to claimants under the provisions of the bounty act of 1891. Upon the trial of the case the only evidence offered by plaintiff to support the allegations of the complaint as to the killing of the coyotes within the state, the presentation of the claims therefor within the proper time and in the proper manner, and the action of the boards of supervisors thereon consisted of such certificates. These certificates were objected to as inadmissible for any purpose. The certificates having been admitted in evidence over such objection, the plaintiff, having introduced evidence as to the assignment of the claims to him, rested. A motion for nonsuit was made and denied, and defendant offered no testimony to rebut that of plaintiff. It was substantially provided in the bounty act of 1891 that the person killing a coyote should present the scalp, containing the ears and nose of the animal, before some person authorized to administer oaths, and make and subscribe an affidavit before such person showing the time and place that the animal was killed, and within three months from the date of the killing deposit such scalp and affidavit with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county in which the animal was killed. It was further provided: "The board of supervisors * * * shall, quarterly, determine the number of scalps deposited with the clerk of such board during the preceding quarter, and by whom, and shall give to each person who may have deposited scalps a certificate certified by its clerk, showing the number of scalps deposited by such person and the sum due him at the rate of five dollars for each scalp. Such certificate may be presented to the Controller of the state, who may draw his warrant on the general fund in the state treasury for the sum named therein, in favor of the person entitled thereto." It was further provided that, when the certificate is directed to be drawn, the board of supervisors "shall, at the same time, cause the scalps to be destroyed by fire."

It will thus be seen that the certificate issued by the board was to at least take the place of the scalps deposited by the claimant. While, under the decision in Ingram v. Colgan, supra, the act must be construed as not authorizing the drawing of a warrant by the Controller until the claim had been approved by the state board of examiners, it appears to us to have been clearly the intent of the act that the officers auditing and allowing the claim and drawing the warrant therefor on the State Treasurer might act upon the certificate thus issued by the board. The board of examiners might hear additional evidence, but it could allow the claim upon the certificate alone. The deposit of the scalp of a coyote with the clerk of the board of supervisors, accompanied by an affidavit showing the killing of the animal within the county within three months prior to the presentation of the scalp, was evidently considered by the Legislature, which had full power to determine what should be sufficient proof, to be sufficient proof of the genuineness of the claim. The provision of the act to the effect that the supervisors should "determine the number of scalps deposited," etc., necessarily means that they must determine the number deposited in accordance with the provisions of the act, viz., those deposited, with a proper affidavit showing that the animals were killed within the county within three months prior to the presentation of the scalps. The certificate was to be issued only upon the determination of the supervisors as to such deposit of the scalps, accompanied by a proper affidavit, and could have been intended for no other purpose than to constitute evidence of such determination. Upon it, at any rate, we are satisfied the auditing officers were authorized to act. While it may be freely conceded that the system for proving the genuineness of the claims was not so perfect as to prevent the consummation of fraud, it must be acknowledged that it was for the Legislature to determine the procedure to be followed, and the method adopted was certainly as well designed to safeguard the public treasury as were those adopted in Iowa and Florida, and referred to in the cases of Murray v. Jones Co., 72 Iowa, 286, 33 N. W. 684, and Johns v. County Com'rs (Fla.) 10 South. 96.

The claimants having furnished the certificates showing their compliance with the provisions as to proof of their claims, and thus having made at least prima facie proof of their claims, the Legislature, six years thereafter, enacted the law under which this action was brought. In enacting this law, the Legislature was acting with full knowledge of the existing condition. It had been made known through the messages of at least two Governors that claims to the extent of $287,615, supported by the requisite prima facie proof, had been presented to the board of examiners. It had been suggested therein that frauds had been perpetrated in the presentation and manipulation of some of these claims, and it had been recommended by Gov. Budd that a clause should be inserted in any appropriation bill that might be passed for the payment of these claims to the effect that the board of examiners might take such evidence "as it deems necessary" as to the validity of such claims. Instead of following this suggestion, the Legislature of 1901 enacted the law authorizing actions on such claims. We entirely agree with counsel for the state that the manifest object of this act was to put the courts in the place of the auditing board of the state. With their greater facilities for procuring evidence, it was deemed that therein the state could, with the assistance of its Attorney General, produce such evidence as might be available to show that some of the claims were, as had been suggested, fraudulent. The Legislature must be deemed to have acted with reference to the peculiar circumstances of the case, and it would not be a reasonable construction of their action, taken in favor of the interests of these claimants, to hold that such action contemplated the relegation of "the owners or holders" of the claims from a class of creditors that had made a prima facie showing of the validity thereof to a position where they would be compelled to commence at the beginning and make again the showing that they had already made. It is to be observed, in this connection, that the practical effect of the construction contended for by appellant would be to render the act worthless to many owners of just claims. The individual claims were mostly for small amounts, the actions on demand of the state were to be tried in Sacramento county, and the costs were to be borne by the claimants. Aside from the fact that it would be impossible to procure the evidence as to many such claims, owing to the death of the original claimants, it would, where such testimony was available, in most cases cost more to take such evidence to Sacramento county than the claims amounted to. The Legislature was providing a method by which the holders of these certificates might collect the amounts shown thereby to be due, and it was intended that the certificates should have the same legal effect before the courts that they would have had before the board of examiners, and that, in the absence of any showing by the state as to the validity of the claim, they should constitute sufficient evidence to warrant a judgment.

It is suggested that the certificates introduced in evidence were not the certificates of the boards of supervisors, but simply those of the clerks of such boards, and that there is no proper evidence of the action of the boards of supervisors. The certificate set forth in the record was made by "J. G. Elliott, clerk of the board of supervisors of the county of Merced, state of California," and he certifies that he makes it "pursuant to the order of said board, passed on the 3d day of October, 1894." By order of said board he certifies that James Ben has deposited with him, as such clerk, during the quarter ending September 30, 1894, 50 coyote scalps, each containing the nose and ears, and that there is due Ben from the state the sum of $250. This certificate substantially complied with the act of 1891, which required the board of supervisors to give "a certificate, certified by its clerk," and sufficiently shows a determination by the board as to the deposit of the scalps, accompanied by a legal showing. The repeal of the act of 1891 did not destroy the effect of the certificate as to the claims which had already accrued. It simply prevented the creation of any further claims against the state for the killing of coyotes. Conceding the power of the Legislature to prescribe such further proofs as to the validity of such accrued claims as it deemed proper, we find no intent to so do either in the repeal of the act of 1891 or in the act of 1901 authorizing suits on these claims.

We have considered the other points made relative to these certificates, and are of the opinion that the trial court did not err in admitting them in evidence, or in holding them to be sufficient, in the absence of any counter showing, to warrant a finding as to the validity of the claims.

2. It is further contended that the plaintiff did not show that he was the owner of the claims. In the first place, it is urged that prior to the act of 1901, authorizing suits thereon, the claims were not assignable at all, for the reason that they could not be enforced by judicial proceeding. This contention assumes that action thereon could not have been maintained under the general act of 1893 (St. 1893, p. 57, c. 45) authorizing suits against the state. We regard it as entirely immaterial, in this connection, however, whether or not they were enforceable prior to the act of 1901. If not enforceable by judicial proceeding, it was solely because they were claims against the sovereign state, which could not be sued without its permission. They were claims for a bounty, the right to which had become vested by a compliance with the provisions of the statute offering the bounty. The bounty had been earned, and the state was in the same position that any other debtor would be, except that, by reason of its sovereignty, and the absence of any appropriation for the payment of the claims, the creditors were necessarily dependent upon the state making such arrangement as it would for the discharge of its obligations. We are satisfied that such claims against the state constituted property capable of assignment. The language of the act of 1901, authorizing "the owners or holders of claims or demands" to bring suit thereon, clearly indicates that it was in the contemplation of the Legislature that assignees of such claims might bring suit thereon.

It is also urged that the claims were never in fact assigned. It appeared that plaintiff was the assignee of the Kern Valley Bank, David Hirshfield, and C. Cohn, who had by a written instrument assigned to him all their right, title, and interest in said claims. The question is as to the assignment by the original claimants to the Kern Valley Bank and to said Cohn and Hirshfield. The undisputed evidence was that the Kern Valley Bank had, prior to the act of 1901, purchased directly from the original claimants a large number of these claims in suit, and Cohn and Hirshfield had purchased the remaining claims in suit; the purchase price in each instance being paid in cash by the purchaser. The transactions between the original claimants and the purchasers were not evidenced by any writing, except the powers of attorney or authorizations for deposit with the State Controller and State Treasurer, ordinarily used in the collection of amounts due from the state by both agents and assignees. These designated the purchasers as the attorneys of the claimants to receive the warrants from the Controller and the money from the Treasurer, and were signed by the claimants. The transaction between the claimant and the purchaser in each case consisted of the delivery by the claimant to the purchaser of the certificate, and the signing and delivering of the power of attorney, and the payment in cash, at the time of the purchase, by the purchaser, to the claimant, of the purchase price agreed on. It is suggested that these claims could not be transferred by parol, but we are not referred to any provision of our statutes that makes a writing essential to the validity of a sale made under the circumstances here shown. "A transfer may be made without writing, in every case in which a writing is not expressly required by statute." Section 1052, Civ. Code.

It is urged that, since powers of attorney were given at the time of the transaction, the agreements between the claimants and the alleged assignees were evidenced by writing, which alone can be looked to for the terms of the agreement, and that the parol testimony as to a purchase was not admissible, for to admit it would be to allow parol testimony to vary the terms of written agreements. The rule contended for has no place except between the parties to the agreement and their representatives and successors in interest. It cannot be invoked by strangers to the agreement. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; Dunn v. Price, 112 Cal. 46, 51, 44 Pac. 354. There is, however, nothing in the parol evidence that is inconsistent with the instruments designated as "powers of attorney." They did not purport to express the agreement between the parties, had nothing to do with the sales thereunder, and were mere directions to the State Controller and State Treasurer, without which the purchasers could not obtain from the officers of the state the proceeds of the property which they had purchased. They were entirely consistent with the fact of purchase shown by the parol testimony.

The evidence in relation to the assignments was sufficient to warrant the findings thereon made by the trial court.

3. It is contended that the action is barred by section 2 of the general act authorizing suits against the state. St. 1893, p. 57, c. 45. This defense was not specially presented either by demurrer or answer, and there is no finding thereon; but it is urged that in the case of the state the benefit of the statute of limitations cannot be waived by the officers representing the state. We do not, however, deem it necessary to discuss the question as to the effect of the failure to plead the statute. The two-year limitation fixed by the act of 1893 applies only to actions brought under the provisions of the act of 1893. This action was brought under the act of 1901, which prescribed its own statute of limitations, viz., "twelve months from the passage of this act." The intent of the Legislature of the state to waive the benefit of any defense of limitation it may have had, under section 2 of the act of 1893, against these claims, is manifest. Otherwise, the act of 1901 authorizing the institution of these suits and the prosecution of the same to final judgment would be of no avail, for at the time of its enactment, the period of limitation prescribed by the act of 1893 had long since expired as to the great mass of the claimants, viz., as to all except minors, insane persons, persons imprisoned on a criminal charge or judgment pronounced thereon, married women, and incompetent persons. Unless it clearly appear to the contrary, it cannot be held that the Legislature intended its act to be a mere form, without beneficial purpose. When it said that any owner or holder of any of these claims might, "within 12 months from the passage of the act," bring his suit, it said that any suit so brought would be within time and free from any defense of limitations.

This construction, it is urged, would render the law obnoxious to the provisions of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, prohibiting the Legislature from making any gift of public money or thing of value; the contention being that a waiver of the defense of limitations is a gift, within the meaning of such provision. The statute of limitations does not, however, go to the substance of the right, but only to the remedy. When the statute has made the defense available to the debtor, his debt has not been extinguished. It still exists, and may be enforced against him, unless he chooses to avail himself of the defense afforded by the statute, and specially plead it. The payment of such a debt by the debtor is not a "gift," in any proper sense of the word, and there is nothing in the constitutional provision invoked that can be held to prohibit the Legislature from paying these claims.

4. We are of the opinion that it was not essential to a statement of a cause of action in a suit brought under the act of 1901 that the complaint should allege a presentation of the claims to the state board of examiners.

5. It is contended that the findings are contradictory, in that the court found that all the facts set forth in the complaint are true, except the allegation as to certain specified counts, and at the same time found that none of the facts set forth in the answer are true. The answer was a specific denial of the allegations as to each of the 892 counts. If it be conceded that these findings are at all in conflict, it is apparent from the transcript on appeal that, so far as the specified counts were concerned, no judgment was given in favor of plaintiff, and that as to them defendant prevailed. As already stated, but one count is set forth in the copy of the complaint contained in the transcript; the others having been omitted by stipulation of the parties. In place of such counts there has been inserted a statement that the aggregate amount of all the counts was $72,330, and that the aggregate amount of all others than those specially mentioned in the decision was $59,680, for which latter amount judgment was ordered by the court and entered. In view of the stipulation of the parties, we are entitled to look at this statement, and it is demonstrated thereby that judgment was given for plaintiff only upon the counts not specially mentioned in the decision. Any conflict in the findings as to the specified counts is therefore immaterial on defendant's appeals.

What has been said disposes of all the points made by the state, except those relative to the constitutionality of the original bounty act of 1891 and the act of 1901 authorizing suits on the claims arising thereunder. There is nothing in the contention that the act of 1901 is invalid under the provisions of our Constitution relative to special legislation. Conceding, for the moment, the constitutionality of the original act of 1891, the Legislature had the right to provide whatever method it deemed proper for the proof of the claims arising thereunder and the payment of the same. It could, without further investigation, have appropriated the money to pay those who had made the showing required by such act, or it could provide for such investigation as was by it deemed essential to a proper determination of the question as to the justness of the individual claims against the state. What has already been said in regard to the claims under this act amply shows that these bounty claimants constituted a class characterized by such substantial qualities and attributes as to render appropriate legislation peculiar to itself in the matter of the determination of the validity and payment of the claims. We have already disposed of the objection that the act of 1901 is obnoxious to section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, prohibiting the Legislature from making any gift.

There remains only the objection that the bounty act of 1891 was invalid under the provisions of section 1 of article 16 of the Constitution, which provides as follows, viz.: "The Legislature shall not, in any manner, create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall, singly or in the aggregate with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of three hundred thousand dollars, except in case of war to repel invasion, or suppress insurrection, unless the same shall be authorized by law for some single object or work to be distinctly specified therein, which law shall provide ways and means, exclusive of loans, for the payment of the interest of such debt or liability as it falls due, and also to pay and discharge the principal of such debt or liability within twenty years of the time of the contracting thereof and shall be irrepealable until the principal thereon shall be paid and discharged; but no such law shall take effect until, at a general election, it shall have been submitted to the people and shall have received a majority of all votes cast for and against it at such election." This point was made by the Attorney General in his briefs in the case of Ingram v. Colgan, Controller, supra; but, although the act under consideration was there held to be free from constitutional objection, no reference was made in the opinion to this contention.

It appears from the report of the State Treasurer for the year ending June 30, 1890, that the total bonded indebtedness of the state at that date was $2,642,000. What is also styled in the report a debt of the state consisted of Controller's warrants, aggregating $173,295.10, which it must be assumed had been drawn upon unexhausted specific appropriations provided by law to meet the same. An examination of the same report shows that there were in the various funds so drawn upon amounts in excess of the sums necessary to pay the warrants. It does not appear that any of the liabilities for which these warrants were drawn had been created by the Legislature without provision made at the same time by appropriation from the current revenue for the payment of the same, and they were, therefore, not debts, within the meaning of the prohibitory clause of the Constitution. This matter is fully and ably discussed in the opinion in People v. Pacheco, 27 Cal. 175, and the cases there cited. Of the bonded debt, which, so far as appears, constituted the only indebtedness of the state at that time, all but $5,000, to wit, $2,637,000, was evidenced by the funded debt bonds, issued under the act of April 2, 1870 (St. 1869-70, p. 646, c. 444), and the issuance of these bonds had been authorized by a vote of the people of the state at a general election. This left, at most, an indebtedness of only $5,000, created solely by the Legislature.

It seems very clear to us that such debts and liabilities as had been authorized by the people of the state at a general election in the manner provided by the constitutional provision invoked by appellant cannot be taken into consideration in determining the question as to the power of the Legislature to itself create an indebtedness. The section was not designed to limit the amount of indebtedness that might be created by the state, for under its express provisions an indebtedness may be created for any amount, and there is no other provision in the Constitution prescribing a limit of aggregate indebtedness. The section goes entirely to the manner of the creation of indebtedness. It was recognized that without some such provision the legislative department might at will create indebtedness to any amount, and it was thought that some limit should be placed upon this power. The language used indicates the intention and object of this provision very clearly, which was simply to put a limit upon the amount of indebtedness that might at any time be created by the Legislature itself. That body was to have power to create debts to the extent of $300,000 only. The indebtedness created by the Legislature itself must at no time exceed $300,000. It was deemed proper that the Legislature should have the power at all times to go to this extent, because of possible needs of the state government. If any further indebtedness became necessary, the people must authorize it by their votes at a general election; but an indebtedness so authorized became, in effect, one created by the people, and one excluded from the category of debts created by the Legislature, within the meaning of this constitutional provision. So far as is material here, the section in effect simply provides that the Legislature shall not in any manner create any debt or liability which shall, singly or in the aggregate with any previous existing debts or liabilities created by the Legislature, exceed the sum of $300,000.

The decisions in the cases of People v. Johnson et al., 6 Cal. 499, and Nougues v. Douglass, 7 Cal. 65, relied on by the appellant, are not in conflict with the views here expressed. It appeared in the case of People v. Johnson, supra, that the previous indebtedness exceeding $1,000,000 had never been submitted to and ratified by a vote of the people, as required by the Constitution, and was purely a debt attempted to be created by the Legislature. The same condition undoubtedly existed in Nougues v. Douglass, supra.

At the date of the passage of the bounty act of 1891, the indebtedness created by the Legislature did not, so far as appears, exceed $5,000. The Legislature still had the power to create a further indebtedness of $295,000. The act of 1891, which provided for a bounty of $5 for each coyote destroyed, to be paid to the person destroying it, did not of itself create any debt or liability. It was simply an offer upon condition, and only upon the performance of the condition by any person could a debt or liability arise on the part of the state. Upon such performance, however, by any person, the amount specified in the act, viz., $5 for each coyote killed by him in accordance with the provisions of the act, would become due such person from the state, and, no appropriation having been provided to meet the claim, such amount would be a debt created by the Legislature within the meaning of the constitutional provision. But the amounts which might become due to persons under the terms of said act would not necessarily exceed $295,000. The act could not, therefore, be held upon its face to violate the constitutional provision.

The Legislature had the power to create indebtedness to the extent of $300,000. The mere fact that the total amount that would ultimately be paid under the act was not named, and that under its terms, in the course of years, claims might possibly accrue and remain unpaid that, with other debts, would exceed the constitutional limit, would not affect the question as to the constitutionality of the act. The only possible effect of the constitutional provision in such a case would be to render void, as beyond the power of the Legislature, any indebtedness incurred in excess of the constitutional limit.

Whether or not the indebtedness adjudged to be due to plaintiff, viz., $59,680, was, in whole or in part, incurred in excess of this limit, is a question not presented by the record in this case. There is no issue relative thereto made by the pleadings, and no finding made by the court, and it is impossible for us to say, from the evidence in the record or from anything contained in the briefs, that the claims held by plaintiff did not entirely accrue before the aggregate amount of valid claims presented under the act had reached the sum of $295,000. It is, however, stated that the aggregate amount of unpaid claims against the state arising under this act was $287,615, and that suits were instituted under the act of 1891 for only $224,345, and that the judgments entered were for an aggregate of only $175,000. These amounts were all within the constitutional limit of indebtedness. It is further stated, however, that prior to the presentation of any of these claims, and, so far as appears, prior to the accrual thereof as debts against the state, the state officers had paid $187,485 on prior claims accruing under the act of 1891. These claims should not have been paid without prior appropriation (Ingram v. Colgan, supra); but, nevertheless, being in fact paid, they no longer constituted a part of the indebtedness of the state, and cannot be taken into consideration in determining the question as to the validity of claims subsequently accruing.

The judgment in favor of plaintiff, and the order, are affirmed.

BICKERDIKE v. STATE. (Sac. 1,224.)

COYOTE BOUNTY—CLAIMS—ASSIGNMENT—EVIDENCE—LOST CERTIFICATES—EFFECT—APPEAL—ERRORS AGAINST RESPONDENT.

1. In an action against the state on certain coyote bounty claims, proof that plaintiff's assignor purchased them from the person claiming to be the person named as the owner in the certificate issued to such owner by the clerk of the county board, as required by bounty act (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198), and who then had such certificate in his possession and thereupon delivered it to the purchaser, and each of the holders of such certificates transferring the same in the name of such holders, authorized the purchasers by power of attorney to receive the warrant therefor from the state Controller and the money from the state Treasurer, was sufficient to establish that such claims were transferred to plaintiff by the original owners, in the absence of evidence that the persons making the assignments were not the identical persons named in the certificates.

2. On an appeal by the plaintiff, the Supreme Court cannot consider alleged errors in the admission of evidence against the defendant.

3. In an action on certain coyote bounty certificates assigned to plaintiff, evidence held sufficient to establish the due execution of powers of attorney given by the original owners of such claims to their transferees to receive the warrants from the state Controller and the proceeds thereof from the state Treasurer.

4. In an action against the state on certain coyote bounty warrants, for which it was claimed the certificates of the board of supervisors of the county in which the coyotes were killed, required by St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, were lost, a certificate of the clerk of such county that it appeared from the records in his office that, pursuant to an order of the board "passed on or about the ——— day of ———, 189–, the county clerk of said county on or about the ——— day of ———, 189–, issued to the following named persons certificates for coyote scalps bounty and for the number of scalps set opposite their respective names," etc., followed by a list of the original claimants, the number of scalps credited to each, and the dates of issuance of the certificates, ranging from January 6, 1892, to July 18, 1894, was inadmissible; being a mere statement of the officer's conclusions as to the effect of certain records in his office.

5. Where, in an action against the state on certain coyote bounty warrants, due proof of ownership of the claims in plaintiff was made, and the evidence established that county clerk's certificates, required by St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198, had been duly issued on such claims and had been delivered to the secretary of the state board of examiners, and a record in his office showed that they were on file therein in 1895, but could not be found at the time of the trial, such certificates, though lost, were sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover, in the absence of evidence on the part of the state showing their invalidity.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Charles Bickerdike against the state of California. From an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial on certain causes of action alleged, on which a recovery was denied, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. E. Bates, W. C. Van Fleet, and Edward F. Treadwell, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Devlin & Devlin, of counsel), for the State.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought under the provisions of the act of March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214), authorizing suits against the state on claims arising under the coyote bounty act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198), and is the same action involved in the appeal in Bickerdike v. State (Sac. 1,237, heretofore decided) 78 Pac. 270, to which reference is made for the general facts of the case. That was an appeal by the state from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff as to most of the 892 counts of the complaint, and from an order denying a new trial in regard thereto. As to some of the counts, the findings and judgment were in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff moved for a new trial as to 66 of these counts. His motion having been denied, he took this appeal from the order denying the motion. The plaintiff sued as the successor in interest of the original owners of the claims, claiming to be the present owner and holder thereof.

1. As to 57 of these counts, the trial court found that all of the allegations of the complaint are true, except the allegation contained in each count to the effect that, before the filing of the complaint, the certificate, claim, and demand were by the owners sold, assigned, transferred, and delivered to plaintiff, and that plaintiff ever since has been and now is the owner and holder of the same, which allegation, as to each of said counts, was found to be untrue. This finding is attacked by plaintiff, his contention being that the evidence is insufficient to justify the same. The question is as to the alleged assignment by the original owners of some of these claims to the Kern Valley Bank, and by the original owners of the others thereof to David Hirshfield and C. Cohn; it being admitted that plaintiff was the assignee of all the rights, title, and interest of said bank and said Cohn and Hirshfield.

The evidence is without conflict to the effect that each of the claims involved in these counts was purchased by either the bank or Cohn and Hirshfield from the person claiming to be the person named as owner in the certificate issued by the county clerk, and who then had such certificate in his possession, and thereupon delivered the same to the purchaser. In practically all of the transactions of purchase of the claims here involved, the person purporting to sell the claim was not personally known to the purchaser, and the only evidence that he was the owner was the fact that he had the certificate in his possession, claimed to be the person named therein as the owner, as such person purported to sell the claim, and in the name of such person authorized the purchaser by powers of attorney to receive the warrant therefor from the state Controller, and the money from the state Treasurer. There is, however, absolutely nothing in the record to overcome the effect of this evidence, and there is no pretense that it has ever been claimed by any one that the person making the assignment was not the identical person named in the certificate. We are satisfied that, under such circumstances, it must be held that the finding assailed is not supported by the evidence. It may be that the mere possession of the certificate would not afford sufficient proof that the holder was the person named therein and the owner of the claim against the state evidenced thereby. He was, however, presumptively the owner of the certificate (section 3, Bounty Act 1901; subdivision 11, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.), which constituted the only tangible evidence of the claim, except in so far as the records of the board of supervisors might evidence such claim, and upon which the state officers might act and pay the claim. Being so in possession of such certificate, the holder exercised over the claim an act of ownership of the highest character, viz., the absolute disposition thereof by sale.

The law presumes that a person is the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it (subdivision 12, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.), and we know of no reason why such presumption should not obtain under the circumstances set forth. Likewise the law presumes that a person is innocent of crime or wrong (subdivision 1, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.) in civil as well as in criminal cases (Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261, 267, 43 Pac. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180), and it will be presumed that the persons making the transfers and executing the powers of attorney did not attempt to personate others, and by so doing fraudulently procure property to which they were not entitled, but rather that they were the persons whom they represented themselves to be, the persons designated in the certificates of which they had possession, and the owners of the claims which they purported to sell. In each transaction the person signing the power of attorney signed as his name the name appearing in the certificate as the name of the person to whom the certificate had been issued. There has never been any claim to the effect that the person so signing did not sign his true name. Identity of person is presumed from identity of name (subdivision 25, § 1963, Code Civ. Proc.), and it must therefore be presumed that the person signing the power of attorney was the person named in the certificate as the original owner of the claim. As the person who signed the power of attorney is the person who sold the claim, the proof is complete. While presumptions of the character here mentioned may be controverted by other evidence, and the effect thereof easily overcome, the court or jury is bound to find according thereto, unless they are so controverted. Section 1961, Code Civ. Proc.

It is contended that the execution of the powers of attorney was not proven. It appears that the powers of attorney were received in evidence without any specific objection on the ground that the execution thereof had not been proved; the objection of defendant being only "that they simply constituted the person therein named an agent, and did not convey to him any interest in said claim, and that the same was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial." Assuming, however, that the question as to the execution of these powers of attorney is before us, the evidence shows such execution.

The uncontradicted evidence of Charles Bickerdike, David Hirshfield, and C. Cohn, was to the effect that in every instance the person selling the claim executed and delivered a power of attorney directed to the state Controller, asking him to deliver his warrant for the claim to the purchaser, and also a power of attorney directed to the state Treasurer, asking him to pay such warrant to the purchaser, and admittedly the powers of attorney subsequently introduced were the powers of attorney referred to. It is true that the evidence above set forth was objected to by defendant on the ground that it was not the best evidence, but the court overruled the objection, and we cannot, on this appeal by plaintiff, consider errors or alleged errors against defendant. The evidence was admitted, and must be considered, for the purposes of this appeal, as properly before the court. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the question as to the competency or effect of the proof of the genuineness of the signature of the subscribing witness, by a person other than the subscribing witness. This question may not arise on another trial.

2. As to the remaining nine counts, the trial court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were untrue. These findings are attacked. Due proof of ownership of these claims in plaintiff was made. The evidence showed in each case a transfer of the claim and the execution and delivery of the certificate and power of attorney to the purchaser, the sending of the same by the purchaser to the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. at Sacramento for collection, and the delivery of the same by said bank to the secretary of the state board of examiners. All of the certificates so sent appeared "in a record kept by the said secretary" in his office, and the certificates were on file in said office in the year 1895, but none of them could be found on file in such office or elsewhere at the time of the trial, and there was no record showing the withdrawal thereof by or delivery to any person. There can be no question, under the record before us, that there was a supervisor's certificate for each one of these claims. The only other evidence offered to sustain the allegations of the complaint as to these claims was the certificate of the county clerk of Kern county, of date July 10, 1902, wherein he certified "that it appears from the records in my said office that, pursuant to an order of the board of supervisors passed on or about the ——— day of ———, 189—, the county clerk of said county, on or about the ——— day of ———, 189—, issued to the following named persons certificates for coyote scalps bounty, and for the number of scalps set opposite their respective names, to wit." The list of original claimants, the number of scalps credited to each, and the dates of issuance of the certificates, ranging from January 6, 1892, to July 18, 1894, follow. To the introduction of this certificate in evidence the defendant objected, on the ground that the same was not a certificate of any record of the office of said county clerk, was but the conclusion of the witness and hearsay, that the certificate was not required or authorized by any law, and was immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant. The objection was sustained, and plaintiff excepted.

The ruling of the court excluding this certificate was undoubtedly correct. The certificate did not purport to contain a copy of any record of the office of the county clerk, but showed upon its face that it was nothing more than a written statement of that officer as to his conclusions as to the effect of certain records that he found therein. The officer did not certify that the document contained a copy of any record or entry, and clearly it did not contain such a copy. A certified copy of the records of the office, so far as they related to these claims, might have been admissible; but we know of no statutory provision or rule of law that would have warranted the admission of the certificate in question for any purpose. It, however, sufficiently appears from the evidence that was introduced that the certificates were in fact issued, and finally deposited with the secretary of the board of examiners, and the question remains as to whether this proof was sufficient to require findings for plaintiff; it appearing that the certificates had been lost or destroyed. We have discussed the effect of these certificates, as evidence, in the opinion in the case of Bickerdike v. State, supra. The certificate was, under the provisions of the bounty act, in effect the expression of the determination of the board as to the validity of the claim, a document expressly authorized and required by the law to be issued for the purpose of establishing, prima facie at least, the validity of such claim against the state. Its issuance was a prerequisite to the collection of any money from the state. The fact of its issuance and delivery to a person prima facie established his claim, and dispensed with the production of further evidence in support thereof. While such a certificate would ordinarily be the best and probably only evidence of its issuance and its contents, we have no doubt that, where it had been lost or destroyed, both its issuance and contents might be shown by other competent evidence, and that when this was done the claim would be established to the same extent as if the certificate itself had been produced in evidence.

We are of the opinion that the motion for a new trial should have been granted as to all the counts involved therein. The order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial is reversed.

BAUER v. STATE. (Sac. 1,293.)

BOUNTIES—ACTION—STATUTE—ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIMS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—SUFFICIENCY—DEPOSITIONS.

1. In an action under St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, authorizing suits against the state under the act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps, where plaintiff sued as assignee in trust of a large number of claimants, and presented instruments purporting to be assignments from them, evidence examined, and held sufficient to show that the instruments offered were all executed by the parties alleged.

2. The positive statement of a witness that an instrument was signed by a given person is not overcome because it incidentally appears that he was not present when it was signed.

3. In an action under St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214, authorizing suits against the state on claims arising under the act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps, where plaintiff sued as assignee in trust of a large number of claimants and by virtue of his substitution in place of a bank as attorney in fact for the claimants, it was error to exclude a resolution of the bank's board of directors reciting the powers of attorney and substituting plaintiff; it appearing that the powers of attorney authorized the bank to make substitution and constituted part of plaintiff's power to sue as assignee.

4. Where plaintiff's depositions were noticed to be taken on a certain day, but were not then taken, and the court was warranted in finding that the defendant had no notice of a continuance of the time for taking them, they were properly suppressed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento county; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by John J. Bauer against the state of California. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. C. Spelling and Grove L. Johnson, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty Gen., and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Devlin & Devlin, of counsel), for the State.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to obtain a judgment against defendant on claims for bounty on coyote scalps, and was prosecuted under "An act authorizing suits against the state on claims or demands arising under an act of the Legislature entitled 'An act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps,' approved March 31, 1891, and regulating the procedure therein." St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214. Plaintiff sued as the assignee in trust of some 200 bounty claimants, and his complaint contained a separate count on each of said claims; the aggregate amount for which judgment was sought being $5,260. The evidence in the case was addressed in detail to proof of plaintiff's right to recover as assignee of one Ramon Silvas; it being stipulated that the evidence and proceedings in the case with reference to the proof of that claim should govern and apply to the other claims mentioned in the various counts in the complaint. At the close of the plaintiff's case the court granted a nonsuit, and, judgment having been entered accordingly, plaintiff appeals from such judgment upon a bill of exceptions.

It is apparent from the record that the particular ground upon which the nonsuit was granted was that in the opinion of the court there was no evidence to support the claim of plaintiff that he was the assignee, in trust or otherwise, of Ramon Silvas, or any of the other bounty claimants. Upon this particular matter it is insisted by the appellant, under his bill of exceptions, that the court improperly excluded certain evidence offered by him tending to prove that he was such assignee, and which, had it been admitted, he claims would have sustained his position in that regard; and this presents the only point which we think requires special consideration. If the proffered evidence was correctly excluded, then the judgment of nonsuit was proper; if not, the judgment must be reversed.

Plaintiff, in support of his right to maintain the action as alleged assignee, introduced in evidence, without objection, an instrument in writing, consisting of three parts; the first two being separate powers of attorney, dated October 20, 1897, and executed by Ramon Silvas and by each of the other claimants mentioned in the complaint, in favor of the California State Bank, a corporation, authorizing and empowering it "for me and in my name" to receive from the state Controller any warrant, and from the state Treasurer any money, authorized to be delivered or paid by any act of the Legislature, on his claim for such bounty, and further granting to the bank full power of substitution. The third part of the instrument was of the same date, and consisted of an authorization to said bank to pay to one T. C. Spelling, attorney for each claimant, one-third of all money collected, less charges and expenses of collection. These powers of attorney did not pretend to carry any assignment of the claims, or to confer any authority upon the bank to take any measures toward their collection, save as attorney in fact and in the name of the various claimants. The plaintiff then offered in evidence a resolution of the board of directors of the California State Bank, adopted May 17, 1901, reciting the execution of the foregoing powers of attorney, and substituting the plaintiff "in place of this bank as the attorney in fact under and by virtue of all such powers with the authority conferred thereby." To this offer defendant objected upon the ground that the instruments referred to in the resolution "were mere powers of attorney, that the California State Bank had no title to assign or substitute, and that by said assignment the plaintiff derived no title to the claims set out in the complaint and could not be substituted."

Pending a ruling on this objection, and to obviate its force, the plaintiff undertook to produce additional evidence, and in that behalf the attorney for the plaintiff, T. C. Spelling, was sworn as a witness, and testified that in the summer of 1897, while at Bartlett Springs, he undertook the procurement of coyote scalp claims against the state, and arranged with the California State Bank to have the powers of attorney above referred to taken in its name. These were printed, and some forwarded to the claimants for signature before he returned to San Francisco. When he reached that city he discovered that these powers had not been printed according to the copy he had furnished, and that certain words and provisions had been omitted therefrom. At this point in his testimony he produced a written instrument, which he testified was a pencil copy of an original, reading as follows: "Whereas, by a clerical mistake and oversight the words 'or in its own name or in the name of any person substituted by it as herein provided,' after the words 'in my name' wherever they occur, are omitted from a certain agreement in three parts of this date made, executed, and delivered by me to the California State Bank, said mistake and omission is by me hereby corrected, and the said words are hereby, and by the force and effect of this instrument, inserted and incorporated in said agreement, at all the places indicated in all the parts of said agreement, without further act on the part of any party to said agreement; and whereas, T. C. Spelling has heretofore, acting in the place of said bank, paid me the sum of twenty-five cents for an assignment of the claims and demands mentioned in said agreement, for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of said agreement by said bank, which by like clerical mistake was omitted therefrom: It is now agreed that said agreement be, and the same is hereby, corrected by inserting at the end of each of the first two parts of said agreement the words 'and for all the purposes hereof said corporation shall be, and is hereby, created and constituted the assignee in trust of the undersigned as to all said claims and demands, and this instrument shall be considered as signed as of any and all future dates when used by said bank.' Full force and effect shall be given this instrument of even date with said instrument in three parts hereby corrected, and both together shall constitute the entire agreement between the parties thereto." The witness then testified that he had had printed as many copies of this latter supplemental instrument as there had been printed powers of attorney first referred to, and that "these were signed by all who had previously signed the said instrument in three parts, one of which was signed by Ramon Silvas, and by all who subsequently signed it, and all were delivered to me as agent for the California State Bank. I was not present at the time of the signing of said papers. The nominal consideration of 25 cents was paid to each of the claimants executing these instruments. The persons referred to as having executed and delivered said writings are those named in the complaint and in said papers offered to prove the substitution of plaintiff, and were introduced on a previous trial of this action. I was not present at the payment of said consideration." The witness further testified that all these instruments from the claimants were received in the latter part of 1897, and prior to May, 1898; that about May, 1898, the witness became too ill to attend to business, and gave up his office, and stored all his papers, including the originals, one of which the paper in pencil above set forth was a copy, in a warehouse in San Francisco; that in the summer of 1898 one W. S. Cull, who had signed the original powers of attorney and the supplemental instrument, asked witness to permit him to examine the papers he had signed and delivered, and witness accompanied him to the warehouse and allowed him to do so. While there the witness took a full copy in pencil of the supplemental instrument signed by Cull, which was the copy he was testifying about; that the originals were all identical, save as to signature and dates of execution; that subsequently the case which contained all these originals broke open in the warehouse, and through the neglect of those in charge such originals were lost; that witness had made diligent search and inquiry of those in charge of and employed in the warehouse, but was unable to find them. Upon this testimony the plaintiff offered, and the court admitted in evidence, the pencil copy, but sustained the objection of defendant to the resolution of the board of directors of the California State Bank offered by plaintiff to prove his substitution in place of the bank; and, the plaintiff offering no other evidence, a nonsuit was granted.

As we gather it from the discussion between counsel and the court appearing in the record, when the final offers on this point were made, the court, notwithstanding it had admitted in evidence the pencil copy, held that the evidence, taken altogether, was insufficient to show that the originals, of which it purported to be a copy, were executed. We are of the opinion, however, that the evidence was sufficient for that purpose. The testimony of the witness Spelling was addressed solely to the matter of execution. His testimony, as we understand it, was direct and positive that the originals, identical in all respects save as to name and date with the pencil copy, had been executed by all those who had signed the original powers of attorney to the bank, and particularly by the claimant Ramon Silvas; that they had been executed by all those who were mentioned in the complaint as bounty claimants; and that as so executed they had been delivered to him as agent for the bank. It appears to us, in the face of this uncontradicted and unquestioned testimony, that it was sufficiently proven as a fact that these instruments were all executed by the parties. It is true that he testified that he was not present when these supplemental instruments were signed. But the simple circumstance that he was not present did not conclusively negative the possession of other sufficient knowledge by him upon which his unequivocal declaration that they were signed by the parties could be based. Proof of the execution of an instrument is not limited to the testimony of one who actually saw it signed. There are other methods by which the necessary knowledge may be acquired, which would permit one to swear to the fact. Code Civ. Proc. § 1942 et seq. A person may be sufficiently familiar with the signature in question to swear to its genuineness, although he did not see the party sign it. In this view the positive statement of a witness that an instrument was signed by a given person is not overcome, because it incidentally appears that he was not present when it was signed.

All the testimony relative to the execution of these instruments was given by the witness on his direct examination. No cross-examination was had. If the defendant desired to question the accuracy of the positive statement of the witness that these documents were executed, he could have done so. He could have tested the accuracy of his general statement in this particular, or investigated his ability, capacity, or qualification to testify upon the subject. Having failed to do so, his general statement of the execution of these instruments should have been accepted as sufficient proof thereof as far as plaintiff's case was concerned, as the simple fact that the witness did not see the instruments executed did not exclude all means of knowledge which he might have possessed upon which his declaration could be supported. This evidence was prima facie sufficient to show execution of these supplemental instruments, to be used in connection with the original powers of attorney, of which in terms they became a part. Together they must be deemed one instrument, and as such expressly constituted the bank the assignee in trust for the claimants as to their bounty claims, with power of substitution for general purposes of collection; and the bank, as authorized thereunder, having by proper resolution (long after such supplemental instruments were executed and became effective) substituted the plaintiff, with all the powers and authority conferred on it, the court should have allowed such resolution in evidence, as establishing the right of the plaintiff as such assignee in trust to maintain the action in behalf of such claimants. Under the act of 1901, authorizing these suits against the state, it is provided that they may be maintained by the "owners or holders of claims or demands." This general language authorizes actions either by assignees succeeding absolutely to the former owner's title by assignment, or by assignees of such claim for purposes of collection. As respondent makes no point in this respect, however, but only insists that the proof did not show that the plaintiff was assignee for any purpose, further discussion of this point is unnecessary. Our conclusion is that it was error to refuse to admit the resolution of substitution of the plaintiff in place of the bank, and that the judgment must be reversed on that account.

Another ground urged for reversal is the refusal of the court to allow certain depositions tending to support the execution of these supplemental instruments to be admitted in evidence. These depositions were noticed to be taken on a certain day. They were not so taken, and the court was warranted, under the evidence, in finding that the defendant had no notice of a continuance of the time for taking them, and, hence, properly suppressed them.

We have thus far considered this case on the particular points presented on this appeal relative to the evidence and rulings of the court thereon. Aside from insisting that the rulings of the court were correct, the respondent presents the same points against the right of the plaintiff under any circumstances to recover, as urged by it in the case of Bickerdike v. State of California, 78 Pac. 270, the constitutionality of the statute, etc. That case has just been decided adversely to the respondent upon all these points, and nothing further than a reference to the opinion in that case, where these matters are fully discussed, is necessary.

The judgment of the lower court, for the reasons that we have assigned, is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SHARP v. SALISBURY. (L. A. 1,455.)*

STATE LANDS—SALE — CERTIFICATE HOLDERS — CONTEST—JURISDICTION—SUMMONS—PUBLICATION—JUDGMENT—FRAUD.

1. Where the specific averments as to efforts made by the district attorney to discover the whereabouts of the owner of a state land certificate, as alleged in an affidavit to obtain an order for the publication of summons in a suit to foreclose the rights of such certificate holder, were not denied, a denial of the conclusions stated in such affidavit that the attorney had made diligent search and inquiry to ascertain the holder's whereabouts and residence was insufficient to show that the order for publication, and judgment of foreclosure based thereon, were fraudulent.

2. The superior court does not obtain jurisdiction of a state land contest by reason of a reference of the contest by the Surveyor General, but only by the commencement of an action following such reference, in which a prima facie case is made in the complaint against defendant, showing that his certificate of purchase is for some reason invalid.

3. A defendant in a state land contest is not bound to come into court and affirmatively set up his rights where the facts stated in the complaint are insufficient to establish a prima facie case.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Geo. Puterbaugh, Judge.

Action by Frances W. Sharp against William B. Salisbury. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Darew and Edwin A. Wells, for appellant.

GRAY, C. The plaintiff held a certificate of purchase for a certain section of school land in San Diego county. Suit was brought against her by the state to foreclose all her interest and annul her certificate of purchase because of nonpayment of interest on the balance due of the purchase price of said land. A decree was rendered therein against her, canceling said certificate. Thereafter a certificate of purchase for the same land was issued by the state Surveyor General to defendant. A contest was made in the land office by plaintiff against this second certificate, and the matter referred by the Surveyor General to the superior court for determination. A purported complaint was filed by plaintiff, service had on defendant, and the default of the latter entered for failure to answer. Subsequently an amended complaint was filed. The plaintiff then offered to make proofs to establish the allegations of her amended complaint; but the court refused to permit her to do so, for the reasons that the amended complaint failed to state a cause of action, and also "that the order of reference made by the Surveyor General does not give this court jurisdiction of the issues tendered by said complaint." The plaintiff refused to amend further, and judgment was entered against her that she take nothing, and that the case be dismissed, from which judgment she appeals.

We think the action of the court should be upheld, for the reason that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. The judgment roll in the foreclosure proceeding is attached as an exhibit to the complaint and made part thereof. So far as we can learn from an inspection of this roll, the judgment in the foreclosure proceeding is valid. Indeed, appellant fails to point in her brief to anything on the face of this roll that could be claimed to render the judgment void. We understand appellant, however, to contend that the facts stated in the complaint (which must be here admitted as true) show that the foreclosure judgment was obtained by fraud on a false affidavit for publication of summons. The allegations of the complaint in this regard are to the effect that the affiant who made the said affidavit, the deputy district attorney, did not in fact make diligent search or inquiry to ascertain the residence or whereabouts of the defendant in the foreclosure suit; "that if he made any search or inquiry at all thereof, the same was a sham and pretended search, and not made in good faith," etc. The affidavit for publication need not be here quoted. It was made part of the complaint, and it is sufficient to say that it was very similar to the affidavit in Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732, and on the authority of that case and the cases following it the affidavit must be held sufficient. The contradictions of this affidavit contained in the complaint were directed only at those general statements and conclusions contained in it which might be drawn from the specific statements of facts therein. The complaint does not deny or controvert that the deputy district attorney inquired of the persons named in the affidavit as therein declared by him. These specific statements as to the inquiries and efforts made and the names of the parties inquired of to ascertain the whereabouts of the defendant are the more important parts of an affidavit for publication. It is these specific allegations of specific facts that must be shown to be false in any successful effort to establish the fraudulent character of an affidavit for publication. Such allegations constitute the essential part of the affidavit, and to admit their truth is to admit the truth of what the court acted upon when it made the order of publication. The complaint for these reasons fails to show that the affidavit of publication was false in any essential particular, and consequently fails to show that the foreclosure judgment was obtained by fraud. Upon the face of the complaint, then, the foreclosure judgment must be treated as valid and binding. It follows that the complaint altogether fails to show anything that would invalidate defendant's certificate of purchase, and therefore states no cause of action.

The superior court does not get jurisdiction of a state land contest by reason of a reference of the contest by the Surveyor General. This must be followed by the commencement of an action, and unless an action is commenced, following the reference, in which a prima facie case is made in the complaint against defendant, showing his certificate of purchase to be for some reason invalid, "he is not compelled to come into court and affirmatively set up his rights. The mere fact that defendant has a certificate of purchase, and that the plaintiff protested against the issuance to him of any further evidence of title, and that the order of reference has been made, do not make a case that the defendant is required to answer." Polk v. Sleeper (Cal.) 76 Pac. 819.

Therefore, even though the defendant's default had been entered, the court was warranted in refusing to hear evidence in the matter until a complaint was filed that demanded an answer; indeed, in the absence of a complaint stating some cause of action, there was no case before the court.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; SMITH, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. PERRY et al. (Cr. 1,154.)

CRIMINAL LAW — BURGLARY — MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—INSTRUCTIONS—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where the district attorney, in answer to a question, asked by defendant's attorney of the jury in argument, as to why a prior conviction of defendant of petty larceny, if it had occurred, had not been alleged in the information, stated that he had no knowledge of such prior conviction when the information was drawn, and, on defendant objecting to such statement, the court charged the jury that such matter was not for their consideration, defendant was not prejudiced thereby.

2. Where a witness for defendant testified on cross-examination that she was "not so very friendly" with him, defendant was not prejudiced by evidence admitted in rebuttal that during the trial the sheriff met such witness and two other ladies, one of whom was defendant's wife, and that they all then and there kissed defendant.

3. In a prosecution for burglary, an instruction that if the defendant entered the building in question in the nighttime—that is, between sunset of one day and sunrise of another day—with the intent to commit larceny, the jury should find him guilty of burglary in the first degree, was in conformity with the express provisions of Pen. Code, §§ 460, 463.

4. That the court, in instructing the jury in a criminal case, merely stated the law too emphatically, is not ground for reversal.

5. Where the jury were charged that defendant's guilt should be determined upon the evidence before them alone, and that no juror acting conscientiously could base his verdict on any other consideration, etc., defendant was not prejudiced by the refusal of an instruction that if, after considering the whole case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, it was his duty not to vote for the verdict of guilty, nor be influenced in so voting by the reason that the majority of the jury should be in favor of such verdict.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; E. W. Wilson, Judge.

William James Perry was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Quinn, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., O. C. Gregor, and C. H. Cormick, for the People.

VAN DYKE, J. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of Humboldt county of burglary in the first degree, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and the appeal is taken from the judgment, and also from the order denying a new trial. The questions presented by the appellant on the appeal are: (1) Misconduct of the district attorney; (2) error in the admission of evidence; (3) errors in giving and refusing certain instructions.

1. It seems the defendant formerly resided at Pinole, in Contra Costa county, and at the trial certain witnesses who resided there were produced by the defendant to give testimony as to his good character for "honesty and integrity as a law-abiding citizen." On cross-examination they were asked by the district attorney whether they had ever heard "that the defendant was charged with burglary in the city and county of San Francisco in February, 1899," and also whether they had heard "that he was convicted of petit larceny on February 20, 1899, before the police court of the city and county of San Francisco." When the first of this class of questions was asked, an objection was made to the cross-examination, which was overruled by the court, but no exception taken by the defendant to the ruling, and no further objection or exception was made in reference to such testimony. In People v. Gordon, 103 Cal. 573, 37 Pac. 535, it is said that, a witness "having testified as to the defendant's general good character, his opinion and the value of it may be tested by asking the witness on cross-examination whether he has ever heard that the person in question has been accused of doing acts wholly inconsistent with the character which he has attributed to him." And in People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 624, 45 Pac. 862, it is said: "While it is not permissible to give evidence of wrongful acts for the purpose of impeaching the witness, it is proper upon cross-examination of a witness who has given testimony either for sustaining or impeaching the credibility of another witness to question him with reference to his knowledge of specific acts, and with reference to the specific acts themselves, for the purpose of overcoming the effect of his testimony upon the direct examination." Such questions should not be asked by a district attorney in the absence of information warranting a reasonable belief on his part that the fact is as implied by the questions; in other words, the questions should not be asked for the mere purpose of getting before the jury an intimation that the defendant had theretofore been guilty of specific acts of misconduct; and where it is apparent that such is the only object of the questions it is undoubtedly misconduct on the part of the district attorney. We cannot, however, say that this appears to be the case here.

Appellant also complains that the district attorney on the day before the trial asked some of these character witnesses if they had heard of the matter covered by the questions referred to. The district attorney, the same as an attorney for any party, may ask a witness while out of court, and not under the binding obligation of an oath, if certain matters are within his knowledge; and is not bound by answers that may be given when not on the witness stand. The district attorney may have thought, and probably did think, that these witnesses, friends of the defendant, who had traveled a great distance to be of service to him, would not admit, when not under oath, any facts detrimental to his cause, and had a right on cross-examination, as already stated, to ask the questions referred to.

It is also complained that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in his argument to the jury to the prejudice of the defendant. The record in reference to this matter is as follows: "In the argument of counsel for the defendant, in discussing the questions asked by the district attorney of the witnesses produced by the defendant on good character, as to whether or not they had heard that the defendant was charged with burglary and convicted of petit larceny in San Francisco in 1899, he stated that no evidence was produced by the people to show that the defendant had in fact suffered a prior conviction of petit larceny, or been charged with burglary; and then and there stated to the jury that the cross-examination of said witnesses was merely a trick or scheme on the part of the district attorney to get evidence before the jury of facts that never existed. Thereupon the district attorney took exception to the remark of defendant's counsel, and the court thereupon stated to defendant's counsel that such evidence had been introduced under the ruling of the court, and that consequently its introduction could not be legitimately denominated a trick, and should not, therefore, be so characterized. Immediately after, defendant's counsel asked the clerk of the court for the information herein, and upon receiving the same from the clerk he then read the entire information and exhibited the same to the jury for the purpose, then stated, of showing that the prior conviction was not charged in said information, and that, in the absence thereof, it was presumed that none existed; and while so exhibiting said information to the jury used substantially the following language: 'If it is a fact that the defendant has suffered a prior conviction of petit larceny, why did not the district attorney charge such prior conviction in the information in this case?'" During the closing argument of the district attorney the following occurred: "District Attorney: Mr. Quinn has asked you the question why have we not charged a prior conviction of petit larceny in the information in this case. I will answer him. I am glad he has given me an opportunity to answer him, and I will tell you now the reason it was not charged was because when the information was drawn I was not in possession of the knowledge that he had suffered a prior conviction of petit larceny. That is the reason he was not charged, and therefore I could not charge it afterwards. Mr. Quinn: At this time I take an exception to that. District Attorney: You have asked me the question why it was. Court: I don't think it is proper on either side to discuss that question. District Attorney: I don't intend to. Court: As to whether or not there was a prior conviction, and why, if at all, it does not appear to have been charged in the information in this case, either upon the one side or the other, neither upon the one side or the other, do I think it is a proper matter for the consideration of the jury. District Attorney: I don't think so either, but, inasmuch as he challenged me, I thought it was fair. He placed me in a position that I am not willing to answer the challenge. Mr. Quinn: I would like the reporter to note an exception to the remark made by the attorney. The Court: I have directed the jury not to pay the least regard to that matter, one way or the other. District Attorney: If you withdraw your statements made in connection with the same matter I will withdraw mine. Mr. Quinn: I will take an exception; that is all." Nothing prejudicial to the defendant's interest is here shown. Though the answer of the district attorney was called for by the question of defendant's counsel, it would have been better if the district attorney had not made the statement complained of. There was no evidence in the case to show that the defendant had ever been convicted of petit larceny, and therefore defendant's counsel was justified in so arguing to the jury. The district attorney, in his answer to defendant's counsel, rather intimated, however, that as a matter of fact there had been such a conviction. But the jury were instructed by the court that the matter was not for their consideration, and that they were not to pay the least regard to the matter one way or the other. Presumably they followed the instruction of the court in this regard. From the fact that this court has in many cases been constrained to animadvert upon the conduct of district attorneys in transcending the bounds of propriety in their zeal to obtain a conviction, as is said in People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 340, 38 Pac. 946: "There seems to be a disposition on the part of counsel for defendants in all criminal cases, since the decision in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459, 34 Pac. 1078, to count upon the alleged misconduct of the prosecution as cause for a reversal." And the court there remarks that the case referred to, to wit, People v. Wells, was an extreme case, where the assistant district attorney had willfully and persistently offered incompetent evidence to prejudice the defendant, so that the animus of the prosecution was very apparent, and the court deemed it but just to stamp it with the seal of disapprobation, and remarks that it is only in extreme cases that the remedy there administered applies. This case clearly does not fall within the class of cases referred to by this court as extreme cases demanding any particular consideration.

2. The witness Georgia Wood, who had testified in behalf of the defendant, stated on cross-examination that she was "not so very friendly" with him. In rebuttal the undersheriff, in answer to a question by the prosecution, testified that during the trial, in the courthouse corridor, he met witness Georgia Wood and two other ladies, one being defendant's wife, and they all, Georgia Wood included, then and there kissed defendant. The court refused to strike out this testimony, on defendant's motion, on the ground that it was admitted simply for the purpose of showing the friendly feeling between the witness Georgia Wood and defendant. Although defendant's counsel contends that it was error to refuse to strike out this testimony, he is not very clear whether this worked to the prejudice of the defendant or not, as he says, "It would be very hard to judge just what effect such testimony would have on the jury." This being the case, it is very clear that it did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant.

3. The contention of appellant with reference to the instructions is that the first one given in behalf of the people is erroneous. This instruction is that, if the defendant entered the building in question in the nighttime—that is, between sunset of one day and sunrise of another day—with the intent to commit larceny, the jury will find him guilty of burglary in the first degree. This is in strict compliance with the provisions of the Code. Pen. Code, §§ 460, 463. The criticism upon instructions 11, 12, and 13 in behalf of the people seems to be that they stated the law on the subject "altogether too strong," and were therefore "harmful." But merely stating the law too emphatically furnishes no ground for reversal. Instructions 9, 10, 11, and 12 asked for by the defendant, and refused by the court, were properly refused. There was no evidence upon which to base the same. Appellant's defense was that he was drunk, and did not know anything about the crime. There was no evidence showing that the defendant received the stolen property from any other person "knowing that it was stolen," or that he "received the goods with the suspicion of the other's rightful ownership." Instruction 20 asked for by defendant and refused is as follows: "If, after a consideration of the whole case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, it is the duty of such juror so entertaining such doubt not to vote for a verdict of guilty, nor to be influenced, in so voting, for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of guilty." Appellant contends that the refusal to give this instruction was error justifying a reversal, and relies upon People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50, in support of his contention. The court there say that the instruction correctly stated the duty of a juror, and should have been given, but adds: "If any juror needed an instruction upon this point, it was harmful to refuse it; if no juror needed the instruction, it would have been harmless to give it." But that case was not reversed solely or principally upon the refusal to give that instruction, but mainly upon other errors of the trial court referred to in the opinion in that case. In the later case of People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 259, 63 Pac. 358, this court says on this subject: "Juries are impanelled for the purpose of agreeing upon verdicts if they can conscientiously do so. They are admonished at each recess of the court not to form an opinion as to the merits of the case until it shall be finally submitted to them, and when it is so submitted it is the duty of jurors to deliberate and consult together with the view of reaching an agreement, if they can, without violence to their individual understanding of the evidence and instructions of the court. They should not be lectured by the court to make them strong and steadfast in their individual opinions; neither should they be exhorted to reach an agreement; and while it is probably true that 'each juror should decide the matter for himself,' yet he should do so only after a consideration of the case with his fellow jurors, and he should not hesitate to 'sacrifice his views or opinions of the case' when convinced that they are erroneous, even though in so doing he defer 'to the views or opinions of others.'" By an instruction previously given, however, in the case at bar the court states to the jury: "This case, like all other cases where crime is charged, should be determined by the jury upon the evidence before them, and upon that alone, and no juror acting conscientiously can base his verdict upon any other consideration." And in one of the instructions given at the request of the defendant the court stated to the jury: "To warrant a conviction of the defendant, he must be proved to be guilty clearly and conclusively, so that there is no reasonable theory upon which he can be innocent when all the evidence in the case is considered together." And, again: "You will not be warranted in returning a verdict of guilty unless you find that the evidence excludes to a moral certainty every reasonable hypothesis except that of guilt, and the conviction of guilt must flow naturally from the facts proved, and not from any forced or constrained construction, and must be consistent with all the facts, for, if any one fact is entirely inconsistent with the conclusion of guilt, your verdict must be 'Not guilty,' and in cases of reasonable doubt it is your duty to acquit." And, again: "There must be in your minds an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge, derived from a comparison and consideration of all the evidence. You must be satisfied with the truth of the accusation against the defendant to a moral certainty, and beyond all reasonable doubt, or your verdict must be 'Not guilty.'" Similar instructions were repeated over and over, so that there can be no question that the case was so submitted to the jury as to guard in every possible way the rights of the defendant to a fair and impartial trial.

We fail to find any error justifying a reversal in this case. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

I concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the opinion of Justice VAN DYKE. In People v. Howard, 76 Pac. 1116, I approved the concurring opinion of the Chief Justice, in which it was held error to refuse an instruction similar to defendant's instruction No. 20 here involved. At that time my attention had not been called to the case of the People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 259, 63 Pac. 351, cited in the opinion of Justice VAN DYKE. Upon further consideration of the question I am satisfied that the refusal of such an instruction should not be considered an error of sufficient importance to justify a reversal in any case where the jury are fully instructed that the verdict must be based upon the evidence alone. Each juror is required at the beginning of the trial to take an oath that he will well and truly try the matter in issue, and a true verdict render according to the evidence. Code Civ. Proc. § 604; Pen. Code, § 1046. The proposed instruction assumes that an instruction from the court is necessary to inform a juror that this oath means that he is to act upon his own judgment, or that it is necessary to inform him that, after having taken such an oath, it would be a violation of it to render a verdict because a majority of the jury believed it to be according to the evidence, although he himself did not so believe. The defendant has no right, as matter of law, to be so safeguarded against the misconduct of the jurors. Section 1258 of the Penal Code provides that this court on appeal must disregard "exceptions which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." An exception which involves nothing more important than the failure of the court to protect the defendant against the very remote contingency that some juror may so misunderstand or disregard his oath and the other instructions, or the equally remote contingency that such a juror would be prevented from so doing by an instruction such as that here involved, does not, in my opinion, affect the substantial rights of the defendant.

CONTRACTS—WELL-DRILLING—CONSTRUCTION—BREACH.

1. A contract provided that plaintiff should drill not less than 2,000 feet of oil wells at a specified price "per foot sunk," and should receive the amount earned for each foot of hole sunk in accordance with "the said scale of prices." The contract also provided that, if the drilling should be stopped by defendant before 400 feet had been sunk in any one hole, it would pay the cost of moving the drilling outfit to another place, in addition to the amount earned for the number of feet sunk, and that, should the work be stopped on any well for any cause after a depth of 400 feet had been sunk, then the plaintiff should move the rig at his own cost and expense to the place designated by defendant. Held, that where plaintiff in good faith drilled a hole to a depth of 580 feet, when, by reason of the breaking of a stem or bit attached to the drill, without plaintiff's fault or negligence, the well could not have been drilled deeper, and was thereupon abandoned, plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price therefor.

2. A contract for the drilling of certain wells provided that defendant should furnish casing pipe and shoes, to be delivered on the ground, of such sizes as it might select, and should be properly inserted and used in the wells by plaintiff, and carried to the bottom, if possible, without diminishing the size, except in cases where it was found absolutely unavailable after the use of under-reamers and other appliances. Plaintiff drilled a hole 1,420 feet deep, and, being of the opinion that it was impossible to put eight-inch casing, which he had been using, to any greater depth, informed defendant of such fact, and asked for six-inch drive pipe for further use. Defendant did not comply, whereupon plaintiff abandoned the work. Held, that defendant's failure to furnish such pipe constituted a breach of contract entitling plaintiff to recover for the work.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge.

Action by James B. Cook against the Columbian Oil, Asphalt & Refining Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. M. Parcells and C. A. Storke, for appellant. Reardon & Whittaker and W. P. Butcher, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to recover a balance claimed to be due plaintiff for boring and drilling holes or wells in the lands of defendant under a written contract. The case was tried with a jury, and a verdict returned for plaintiff in the sum of $2,700. A motion for a new trial was denied, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The appeal involves two propositions upon which appellant relies. The first is as to whether or not plaintiff is entitled to recover under the contract for one hole bored to a depth of 580 feet, and the second is as to whether the plaintiff was prevented by the fault of defendant from boring the second hole or well more than 1,420 feet in depth. There is no dispute as to the facts that plaintiff bored or drilled two holes in the lands of defendant of 580 feet and 1,420 feet, respectively, and that, if the plaintiff is entitled to recover for each foot of hole bored, the verdict is for the correct amount of the balance due to plaintiff. It will be necessary to set forth the parts of the contract material to the controversy, plaintiff being the party of the second part, which are as follows:

"First—That the party of the second part will furnish at his own cost and expenses all the machinery, tools, paraphernalia and materials of all kinds, including labor, fuel, water, and any and all things of whatsoever kind and nature that may be necessary and needful (except casing, pipe and shoes) to properly perform the work of drilling or boring not less than 2,000 feet of hole or wells, and to drill or bore the same at any one or more places on the said property as may be desired and designated by the party of the first part, for the agreed price per each foot depth sunk, as shown and set forth in the following scale of prices, at different depths up to 2,000 feet and in accordance with the further terms and conditions herein contained. * * *

"Provided, however, that in case the drilling of any well shall be stopped by the party of the first part for any cause after it has been begun, that the party of the first part will pay the net cost of moving the drilling outfit to any other place on the property where another well is to be started, in addition to the amount earned for the number of feet sunk, in accordance with the said scale of prices per foot; and that should work be stopped on any well for any cause after a depth of 400 feet has been sunk then the said party of the second part shall move the rig at his own cost and expense to the place designated by the party of the first part.

"Second—That in case of abandonment of any well or wells for any cause, the party of the second part will pull and remove in a careful manner all casing pipe and fittings used in said well or wells, that can be got out by a reasonable and faithful effort, by the use of all appliances and tools ordinarily used in performing such work.

"Third—That all casing pipe and shoes of the proper sizes necessary to be used in the well or wells will be furnished and delivered on the ground by the party of the first part and that it shall be of such sizes as it may select, and the same shall be properly inserted and used in the wells by the party of the second part, and carried to the bottom if possible without diminishing the size, except in cases where it is found absolutely unavailable after the use of under-reamers, and other appliances, as may be necessary and proper for keeping the hole in proper shape and condition.

"Fourth—That in case a body of asphaltum be encountered at any considerable depth, and it is found impossible after a faithful and reasonable effort so to do, that it cannot be drilled through nor penetrated by the use of any of the known tools and appliances, then the said well will be considered as completed and a settlement made in full for the depth drilled according to the said scale of prices: provided, however, that the party of the first part shall have full and free right and privilege to use and operate the machinery and outfit of the party of the second part at its own cost and expense for a period not to exceed ten days in making a further effort to sink the well or until satisfied that the hole cannot be sunk any deeper. * * *

"Sixth—That in case oil, gas or asphaltum shall be found at any depth in any well, and the party of the first part shall elect to stop the drilling in such well, the party of the second part shall properly test the well and leave the same in condition ready for the pump or other working appliance before moving the rig and outfit away.

"Seventh—It is understood by and between both parties hereto that this contract is for a total of 2,000 feet of hole or wells, and that the party of the second part agrees to put down any one hole to a total depth of 2,000 feet, if the ground is such that it can possibly be done, by reasonable effort, or that he will stop the drilling of any well at any depth, as directed by the party of the first part, and in accordance with the said scale of prices per foot sunk, and the terms and conditions herein contained.

"Eighth—That the party of the first part will pay or cause to be paid to the party of the second part the amount earned for each foot of hole sunk, in accordance with the said scale of prices at times and as follows, to wit: An advance sum of $250 (two hundred and fifty dollars) when the rig and outfit is on the ground and ready to commence the work of drilling; seventy per cent. of the amount earned as per scale when the well has been sunk to a depth of two hundred (200) feet and a like seventy per cent. of the amount earned at the completion of each two hundred feet until the well is either completed or abandoned, or the work stopped by the party of the first part, when the balance in full shall be paid after deducting the said advance payment of $250."

After the plaintiff had bored the first hole to a depth of 580 feet, because of a broken stem or bit the well could not be drilled deeper, as it caved in on the bit one hundred and fifty feet. After discussing the matter with Mr. Ayres, the defendant's superintendent, and upon his advice, plaintiff abandoned the 580-foot hole, and moved his machinery a short distance away for the purpose of commencing the second well or hole. It is conceded in the appellant's brief that this 580-foot well was "abandoned because of an accident which made it impossible to go further." We think the plaintiff is entitled under the contract to be paid for this 580 feet of hole. The contract provides for "not less than 2,000 feet of hole or wells." The scale of prices is "per foot sunk," and under the eighth clause of the contract the plaintiff is to receive "the amount earned for each foot of hole sunk in accordance with the said scale of prices." It is expressed in the contract that, if the drilling shall be stopped by defendant before a depth of 400 feet has been sunk in any one hole, that it will pay the cost of moving the drilling outfit to any other place, "in addition to the amount earned for the number of feet sunk in accordance with said scale of prices per foot." Then follows the provision "that, should work be stopped on any well for any cause after a depth of 400 feet has been sunk, then the said party of the second part shall move the rig at his own cost and expense to the place designated by the party of the first." It is evident that the above-quoted clauses meant that plaintiff should be paid the schedule price for any well or hole sunk, but that he should not be required to pay the expense of moving the rig if he was prevented by defendant from boring 400 feet in any one place. If this is not the correct construction of the contract, the plaintiff would be entitled to full pay and the expense of moving his machinery for a well 400 feet deep or less, but for any well or hole over 400 feet deep he would receive nothing, and have to move the machinery at his own expense besides, unless the well could not be drilled by reason of encountering a body of asphaltum as provided for in section 4 of the contract. Section 6 provides that in case of discovery of oil or asphaltum at any depth the defendant may elect to stop the further drilling in such hole or well. No provision is made in the said section as to compensation to plaintiff in such case, but clearly the contract contemplates that the plaintiff shall be paid the prices fixed in the schedule per foot for each foot sunk. If plaintiff had acted in bad faith, or had attempted of his own volition to drill holes or wells of only a few feet depth, so as to make up 2,000 feet of holes or wells, a very different question would arise; but such claim is not made. On the contrary, the contract provides that plaintiff, if desired by defendant, shall put down any one hole to a depth of 2,000 feet, if the ground is such that it can possibly be done by reasonable effort, or that he will stop drilling any well at any depth if so directed by defendant. The eighth clause provides that plaintiff shall be paid "the amount earned for each foot of hole sunk." We must construe the contract according to its plain common-sense meaning as gathered by reading it all together and each and every clause. When so construed, it means that plaintiff should be paid at a fixed price per foot for each and every foot of well or hole sunk by him in good faith in an honest endeavor to carry out the contract. Of course, if plaintiff, by his own fault or negligence, or by reason of not having proper machinery, had bored a hole a short distance, and for such reason had to abandon it, the loss would be his. But no such question is here presented. The plaintiff appears to have had experience in boring oil wells. His machinery is not claimed to have been unfit for the business in which he was engaged. The contract was evidently made with the view of sinking holes for the purpose of discovery. Defendant did not know how deep it would want any one well, nor how many it would desire to have bored. If plaintiff had bored a well 1,990 feet, and had been compelled to abandon it by reason of many contingencies that might have happened, appellant claims that it would not be responsible, unless it had directed plaintiff to stop drilling, or unless the body of asphaltum mentioned in section 4 had been encountered. If such is the meaning of the contract, what would become of the advance payments provided for in section 8? What, in such case, would be the meaning of that part of section 8 which provides that, if the well is completed or abandoned, or the work stopped by the defendant, the balance in full shall be paid? The 580-foot well was abandoned for a good reason, and with the consent of defendant.

As to the second proposition, there is evidence sufficient to justify the implied finding of the jury to the effect that plaintiff was prevented from sinking the 1,420-foot well to a greater depth by reason of the failure of defendant to supply the kind of casing necessary. Plaintiff testified that it was not, in his opinion, possible to put the eight-inch casing, which he had been using, down to any greater depth; that he so informed the officers of defendant, and asked for six-inch drive pipe; that defendant never furnished him with the necessary six-inch pipe; that he could go no deeper without it. Plaintiff also made a written demand upon defendant for the six-inch pipe. In a letter dated March 11, 1903, defendant, in answer to the written demand, stated as follows: "That the company is in control of a large amount of 6-inch drive pipe now at Summerland and I will order a shoe for the same immediately to be sent down. And will keep this drive pipe ready to be delivered on the ground in a few hours in case it is required and deemed advisable." In this same letter, after calling the plaintiff's attention to the provisions of the contract authorizing defendant to select the size of the pipe, defendant stated: "When it has been established by the use of all means described in the contract that it is impossible to continue the well with 11⅝ casing further we will then decide after carefully considering the nature of the material passed through at the bottom of the well just what the next size of casing to be used shall be. If it is decided to use 6-inch drive pipe, we are already provided with sufficient to begin the work and can deliver it on the ground in a few hours." Defendant never delivered the six-inch pipe on the ground. It did not attempt to show that it was possible for plaintiff to have continued with the sized casing that he had been using. Plaintiff testified: "I waited from February 24th to April 28th for the company to furnish the 6-inch drive pipe, and they never did furnish it." Appellant claims that plaintiff had sold his tools, and was not in a position to go on with sinking the well, even if the pipe had been placed upon the ground, and that his demand was only for the purpose of putting the defendant in default. On the contrary, plaintiff claims that defendant, not having found oil, had decided to abandon further work, and that it never intended in good faith to furnish the pipe when it demanded the further sinking of the well. As to the intentions of the parties or their good faith in respect to these matters it is not for us to determine. Plaintiff testified that he retained the right to use the outfit to finish the well if he desired it. In any event, we must hold that it was the duty of the defendant, before it could place plaintiff in default, to "furnish and deliver on the ground" the necessary casing pipe for the further prosecution of the work on the 1,420-foot well. If the construction we have placed on the contract is correct, the court did not err in its instructions to the jury.

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

BOSKOWITZ et al. v. THOMPSON, Collector, et al. (Sac. 1,079.)*

INTERVENTION—RIGHT OF INTERVENER TO AFFIRMATIVE RELIEF—EQUITY JURISDICTION—POWER TO DECREE AND ENFORCE LIEN OF IRRIGATION BONDS.

1. In a suit by owners of land within an irrigation district against the collector of the district to enjoin the collection of a tax levied to pay interest on its bonds, holders of such bonds, while they may be permitted to intervene for the purpose of joining in the defense, cannot obtain affirmative relief to which the defendant would not be entitled. They cannot upon cross-complaints obtain an adjudication of the validity of their bonds, the district itself being a necessary party to an action for that purpose, nor can they obtain a judgment declaring their bonds to be a lien on the lands of the district.

2. A court of equity has no jurisdiction to adjudge that bonds issued by an irrigation district constitute a lien upon the lands within the district, nor to decree the enforcement of such lien, since, if it exists, it is by virtue of the statute under which the bonds were issued, and must be enforced by the levy and collection of a tax in the mode therein provided.

3. Under St. 1891, p. 149, c. 128, § 22, authorizing the board of directors of an irrigation district to levy an assessment sufficient to raise the annual interest on its outstanding bonds, the board has a certain discretion in determining the amount of the assessment, and, while its action is subject to the control of the judiciary in case of an abuse of discretion, and the collection of the assessment may be enjoined in case the board should seek to raise an excessive amount, courts have no authority to determine the amount to be raised, or that only a portion of an assessment shall be collected.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; Wheaton A. Gray, Judge.

Action by C. J. Boskowitz and others against W. M. Thompson, as collector, and others. From the judgment rendered, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Geo. H. Maxwell, R. M. F. Soto, and Purcell Rowe (C. L. Russell and G. W. Zortman, of counsel), for appellants. E. T. Cosper, for respondent collector. B. F. Thomas, for respondent interveners.

HARRISON, C. The Tipton irrigation district, in Tulare county, was organized as a public corporation under the provisions of the Wright act (St. 1887, p. 29, c. 34), in July, 1891, and in the year 1896 its board of directors levied an assessment of $2.47 upon each $100 assessed value of the real property in the district, for the purpose of raising $3,600 with which to pay the annual interest on $50,000 of bonds theretofore issued by it and outstanding, and the further sum of $1,242.55 for a fund created by the district, called "bond expense fund." The defendant Thompson is the collector of the district, and prior to the commencement of this action had given notice, as required by the act, that, unless the assessments upon the land in the district were paid before a certain day, the land would be sold on that day to satisfy the same. The plaintiffs are severally owners of certain lands within the district which are set forth in the complaint, and brought the present action to enjoin the defendant from selling the same, alleging as grounds therefor that the board of directors did not, prior to calling the election at which the issuance of the bonds was authorized, estimate or determine the amount of money to be raised for the purpose of constructing the necessary canals and works and acquiring the necessary property and rights therefor, and did not have the report or specifications of any engineer, or any basis or plan which might be used for determining what amount would be requisite for such purposes. Issues upon these allegations were presented by the answer of the defendant Thompson. Certain holders of the bonds so issued, amounting to $18,000, under leave of the court intervened in the action and united with the defendant in resisting the claim of the plaintiffs, and in addition thereto filed cross-complaints, in which they recounted the matters set forth in their answers, and also set forth the proceedings for the issuance of the bonds and the character of the bonds, that they were bona fide purchasers thereof, that the interest thereon for the year 1896 had not been paid, and the amount thereof, and prayed that the amount due them be adjudged to be a lien upon the lands within the district, and that the defendant Thompson be directed to sell said lands for such proportion of the assessment as would pay the amount due them. To these cross-complaints the plaintiffs filed a general demurrer, and, upon it being overruled, answered the same. Upon the trial of the cause the court found that the district is a valid corporation; that bonds to the amount of $50,000 had been issued in accordance with the provisions of the act, and had been regularly sold; that the several cross-complainants are bona fide holders of portions of said bonds as set forth in their cross-complaints; and that the interest thereon from January 1, 1896, was unpaid. It also found that no special election had been held in the district authorizing an assessment to raise the $1,242.55 for the "bond expense fund." Upon its findings of fact the court rendered judgment that the interveners are respectively the owners of the number of bonds set forth in their cross-complaints, and that each of the same, together with the interest unpaid thereon, and interest accruing after the year 1896, is a valid and subsisting lien upon the lands within the boundary of the district; enjoining the defendant Thompson from selling any portion of the lands described in the complaint, except so much as may be necessary to pay to the interveners the amounts respectively due to them on account of interest on their respective bonds; and directing him, or his successor in office, to sell, in accordance with law, such proportions of said land advertised by him as may be required to pay to the interveners the amounts found due to them respectively for interest on their said bonds for the year 1896. From this judgment the plaintiffs have appealed upon the judgment roll alone, without any bill of exceptions.

*Rehearing denied October 20, 1904.

1. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes an intervention by "any person who has an interest in the litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both." The intervention takes place when a third person is permitted to become a party to the action "either by joining with plaintiff in claiming what is sought by the complaint, or by uniting with the defendant in resisting the claims of the plaintiff, or by demanding anything adversely to both the plaintiff and the defendant." Upon being permitted to intervene, the intervener is to be regarded as a plaintiff or as a defendant in the action (unless he seeks something adversely to both), according as is the party for whose success he seeks to intervene, and is limited to the same procedure and remedies as is such original party, either for the purpose of defeating the action or resisting the claim of the plaintiff. People v. Perris Irr. Dist., 132 Cal. 289, 64 Pac. 399, 773. Section 442, Code Civ. Proc., gives to a "defendant" the right to file a cross-complaint whenever he seeks affirmative relief against any party "relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates." In East Riverside Irr. Dist. v. Holcomb, 126 Cal. 315, 58 Pac. 817, it was held that section 442 "is primarily applicable only to the defendant; that is, the person whom the plaintiff had originally made defendant. Before any other person could take advantage of the section, he must have been made a defendant for the purpose of filing a cross-complaint, and his cross-complaint must have been of such a character as would warrant the court to order him brought in for the purpose of filing it." In the latter part of this sentence the court had reference to section 389, Code Civ. Proc., which authorizes the court to bring in "other parties" when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without their presence, and "to that end" to order a cross-complaint to be filed.

The bondholders herein were not brought into the action upon the ground that the controversy between the original parties could not be determined without their presence, but they were permitted to intervene by reason of their interest in the success of the defendant. They have, therefore, placed themselves by his side for the purpose of uniting with him in defeating the claim of the plaintiffs, and their right in this action to affirmative relief against the plaintiffs is no greater than is his. It does not appear whether the interveners named any persons as parties defendant to their cross-complaints, or that their complaints were served upon any other party to the action. The plaintiffs, however, answered their cross-complaints, and it may be assumed that they are named as defendants to the claims therein set forth. It is very clear, however, that the defendant, as collector of the district, would not be entitled to the affirmative relief against the plaintiffs which is sought by the interveners, and that if he had asked for such relief the court would not have been authorized to grant it. For the purpose of defending the validity of the assessment in his efforts to collect it, the defendant Thompson sufficiently represents the district (Hughson v. Crane, 115 Cal. 404, 47 Pac. 120); but he is not authorized to represent it in any proceeding for the purpose of having it adjudged that the bonds, for the payment of whose interest the assessment was levied, constitute a lien upon the land within the district, or that the district is estopped from questioning the validity of the bonds by reason of the fact that the holders thereof were bona fide purchasers for value. In any litigation of this nature the district itself is a necessary party, and in its absence the court has no authority to render a judgment determining the questions. The interveners herein are equally precluded with the defendant from seeking such affirmative relief in the action. They have no greater right to seek such affirmative relief by means of a cross-complaint than they would have had in an original and independent action therefor. Whatever lien the bondholders have against the lands within the district exists by virtue of the statute under which the bonds were issued and the assessment levied. The lien does not exist by reason of any equity in their behalf, or spring from any contract between parties, but is purely a creature of the statute.

The collection of taxes belongs to the executive branch of the government, and can be assumed by the judiciary only under express legislative authority therefor. Courts may inquire into and determine the validity of the assessment or other proceedings, but, unless the statute has declared it to be a lien, it cannot adjudge it to be one, and if the statute has declared it to be a lien, and provided for its enforcement, its enforcement can be only in the mode provided by the statute. The right of a court of equity to adjudge that a lien exists against certain land carries with it the right to enforce such lien; but the rule is well recognized that a court of equity as such, and in the absence of statutory authority therefor, has no jurisdiction to enforce a lien that is created by statute, and for whose enforcement the statute has provided a mode. Thompson v. Allen County, 115 U. S. 550, 6 Sup. Ct. 140, 29 L. Ed. 472; People v. Biggins, 96 Ill. 481; Corbin v. Young, 24 Kan. 201; Grand Rapids, etc., v. Trustees, 102 Ky. 556, 44 S. W. 98; Board of Com'rs v. King, 67 Fed. 202, 14 C. C. A. 421.

2. It appears from the record that the assessment levied by the board of directors, amounting to $4,851, if it were all collected, would be only a trifle in excess of the amount needed for the payment of the annual interest upon the bonds and for the "bond expense fund"; but, as the court has found that there had been no special election authorizing an assessment for this fund, the amount sought to be so raised, viz., $1,242.55, was improperly included in the assessment. Under the provision of section 22 of the statute (St. 1891, p. 149, c. 128), authorizing the board of directors to levy an assessment "sufficient to raise" the annual interest upon the outstanding bonds, the board has a certain discretion in determining the amount to be raised, and courts will not interfere with their action unless it can be shown that they have abused this discretion. Hughson v. Crane, 115 Cal. 404, 47 Pac. 120. Upon the determination by the court that this portion of the assesement was unauthorized, it should have also determined whether the disparity between the amount as levied and the amount which the board was authorized to raise was such as to vitiate the entire assessment. If so, it should have declared the entire assessment unauthorized and void. If not, it should not have interfered with its collection. The court did not, however, determine whether the assessment was valid or void, nor has it assumed to determine what portion of it was valid, but by enjoining the collector—the defendant Thompson—from selling any part of the lands described in the complaint, except such as may be necessary to produce sufficient money to pay the amount found due to the interveners for the interest accrued on their bonds, viz., $855, and directing him to sell such proportion of the lands as will pay them these amounts, it has assumed that the assessment is valid to that extent, and has delegated to that officer the authority to apportion that amount of money upon the lands, irrespective of the original assessment thereon, or of the amount for which the assessment should have been made. By this portion of its judgment the court has in effect directed the defendant to levy an assessment upon the said lands sufficient to raise $855. It is unnecessary to say that in giving such direction the court exceeded its jurisdiction. It found that the district had issued bonds to the extent of $50,000, all of which are presumably of as valid obligation as are the $18,000 held by the interveners. No imputation is made upon the validity of the assessment so far as it was for the purpose of raising the $3,600 with which to pay the interest upon these bonds, and no reason is suggested why the lands within the district should not bear the burden of meeting this interest, or why the interveners should have the right to collect their interest to the exclusion of the other bondholders. It may be assumed that, if the board of directors had considered that they were unauthorized to provide in the assessment for the "bond expense fund," they would have made the assessment for only sufficient to raise the annual interest upon the outstanding bonds; but as the statute has given to that board the authority to determine whether it is necessary to provide a margin in excess of the actual amount of the interest, and also the extent of that margin, whatever amount is to be raised by the assessment must in all instances be determined by the board. While its action is subject to the control of the judiciary, and the collection of the assessment may be enjoined, in case the board should seek to raise an excessive amount, courts have no authority to determine the amount to be raised, or what proportion of the assessment shall be collected. The statute has vested the board with the exclusive right to levy assessments and to determine the percentage to be levied upon the property within the district. The amount thus levied is to be uniform upon all the property within the district, and it is not within the province of the court to declare the amount which is to be raised or to determine the percentage for which an assessment should be levied. The statute gives to the collector authority to sell the property in case of nonpayment of the assessment thereon which is levied by the board, but a sale by him in satisfaction of an amount directed by the court is unauthorized, and would vest no title in the purchaser.

The judgment should be reversed.

BEST v. WOHLFORD et al. (L. A. 1,367.)

DEED — DESCRIPTION—PAROL EVIDENCE—MAP—ADMISSIBILITY—STATUTE.

1. Where a deed to land was executed by the collector of an irrigation district in pursuance of a sale for the nonpayment of an assessment, describing the land by number of lot, block, acreage, and district, but without reference to any map, an old map of the district is nevertheless admissible, in an action to quiet title, to show the sufficiency of the identification of the land as described in the deed, under St. 1891, p. 244, c. 171, § 18, subd. 2, relating to irrigation districts, and providing that in the assessment book which the assessor is to prepare the land within the district shall be listed by township, range, section, or fractional section, and, when the land is not a congressional division or subdivision, by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient to identify it.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. H. Conklin, Judge.

Withington & Carter, for appellants. E. E. Powers, Powers & Holland, and G. H. P. Shaw, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. Action to quiet title. The land in question is a portion of the Rancho Rincon del Diablo, and is described in the complaint as "Lot No. 4 in block No. 178 of a subdivision of the Rancho Rincon del Diablo, containing 14.42 acres of land, more or less, according to the official map thereof on file in the office of the county recorder of said San Diego county, state of California." The title thereto was originally vested in the Escondido Land & Town Company, from which corporation the plaintiff, by mesne conveyances, derived his title. In the deed from that corporation, dated August 6, 1886, the land is described as "Lot 4 in block 178, according to the map of Rancho Rincon del Diablo made by O. N. Sanford, civil engineer, which map is on file in the office of the county recorder of said county of San Diego, state of California, being part of the Rancho Rincon del Diablo." In the deed to the plaintiff, dated April 24, 1901, it is described as land in San Diego county, California, "in the Rancho Rincon del Diablo, lot 4 in block 178, according to the official map thereof on file in the office of the county recorder of said county of San Diego." At the trial the plaintiff introduced the conveyances from the Escondido Company down to himself. It was admitted that the maps referred to in each of said deeds were on file in the office of the county recorder, and showed the lots and blocks delineated thereon as mentioned in said deeds.

The defendants offered in evidence a deed of conveyance, dated October 25, 1897, from E. J. Hatch, collector of the Escondido irrigation district, to the defendant Sallie B. Wohlford, executed to her in pursuance of a sale for the nonpayment of an irrigation district assessment for the year 1894, containing the several recitals prescribed by statute for a deed upon a sale by an irrigation district for the nonpayment of delinquent assessments. The description of the property sold and conveyed is set forth therein as "land lying and being within the said Escondido irrigation district, county and state aforesaid [county of San Diego, state of California], described as follows, to wit: Lot four (4), block one hundred seventy-eight (178), 14.42 acres, Rancho Rincon del Diablo." The plaintiff objected to the introduction of this deed in evidence on the ground that the same contained no description of the property in controversy, and that it does not refer to any map, and it cannot be ascertained therefrom what property, if any, is referred to in said deed. In connection with the offer of the deed the defendants thereupon offered evidence to prove that there is, and was at the time of said assessment under which the deed was made, but one lot 4 in block 178 in the Rancho Rincon del Diablo, and that such fact is, and was at the time of such said assessment, well known. It was admitted by the plaintiff that the Escondido irrigation district was duly incorporated in 1889, and that the same included the Rancho Rincon del Diablo and no other land, and that such was the fact at the date of the assessment in 1894, under which defendants claim. He, however, objected to the introduction of any evidence showing, or tending to show, a survey or map or plat of the Rancho Rincon del Diablo by Sanford, or any map or plat not referred to or mentioned in said tax deed, as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. The court sustained his objection to all of said evidence, and also his objections to the deed, and excluded it from evidence, to which ruling the defendants objected. It is to be noted that the deed to the plaintiff is of lot 4 in block 178 of the rancho, according to the official map thereof on file in the office of the county recorder, and that unless the map made by Sanford, under which the Escondido Land & Town Company originally conveyed the land, is the official map, or identical with it, the plaintiff has failed to show any title in himself.

Section 18 of the statute concerning irrigation districts provides (St. 1891, p. 244, c. 171) that in the assessment book which the assessor is to prepare the property within the district shall be listed as follows: "* * * Second. Land by township, range, section, or fractional section, and when such land is not a congressional division or subdivision, by metes and bounds, or other description sufficient to identify it, giving an estimate of the number of acres, locality, and the improvements thereon."

The purposes to be subserved by the description are to enable the owner to discharge his land from the lien of the assessment by paying the same; and also, in case the land shall be sold to satisfy the lien, that bidders may know what land is offered for sale, and that the purchaser may receive a sufficient conveyance. The assessment becomes a lien only upon the land which is described in the assessment book, and it is, therefore, essential that such description be sufficiently definite to inform the owner whether any of his land is burdened by the lien. The description must be such that the land claimed by virtue of the deed can be identified or located upon the ground by means thereof. Mr. Cooley states (Taxation, p. 745) a satisfactory rule to be that "the designation of the land will be sufficient if it afford the owner the means of identification and do not positively mislead him, or is not calculated to mislead him." This rule was referred to with approval in San Gabriel Co. v. Witmer Co., 96 Cal. 635, 29 Pac. 500, 31 Pac. 588, 18 L. R. A. 465, 470. The strictness of construction which at one time prevailed in matters of taxation has been greatly relaxed in modern days. The obligation of all citizens to contribute to the expenses of government is recognized, and, instead of regarding proceedings for the levying and collection of taxes as hostile to the property owner, he is considered to be interested equally with all other citizens in the prompt collection of the taxes. A tax properly imposed upon his property will be upheld if the description of the property is sufficient to give him notice that it is burdened with the tax. Rollins v. Wright, 93 Cal. 395, 29 Pac. 58; Davis v. Pacific Imp. Co., 137 Cal. 245, 70 Pac. 15.

Parol evidence will not be admitted to help out a defective description, or to show the intention with which it was made, or to resolve an ambiguity in its terms; but the rule that the description must be certain and definite and sufficient in itself to identify the land, does not exclude evidence for the purpose of applying the description to the surface of the earth, and thus identifying it with the tract in controversy. If a monument is given as the starting point, evidence may be given to show its location, but if the direction of the course from that monument is not given, evidence will not be received to show what direction was intended. If the land is described by some name or designation, evidence will be received for the purpose of showing that the tract in controversy was well and generally known by that name or designation.

The above subdivision of section 18 does not require, as does the third subdivision, which refers to lots in cities and towns, any reference to a map, nor does it require the description of the land to be given in any particular form, other than that it shall be "sufficient to identify it." The designation of a tract of land as a portion of a larger tract, by number and block, without any reference to a map, may be sufficient to identify it, and if so the omission to refer to a map is not fatal to the description. If reference is made to a map, the map thereby becomes a part of the description, and may be read in evidence to identify the land, by showing that it is delineated thereon according to the recital. Although it is not competent to show that any particular map was intended, if none is referred to, yet if it can be shown that there is only one map of a tract which includes the lot in controversy, upon which this lot is delineated or designated, and that that map is well known and generally accepted as authentic, it may be received in evidence as tending to identify the land before the court.

The provision in the section that the description is to be "sufficient to identify it" implies that evidence may be received for the purpose of showing the sufficiency of the identification, and any competent evidence which is relevant to such issue should be received by the court. Whether the description of the land is sufficient to identify it is a question of fact, to be determined from the evidence presented on that issue. Woodside v. Wilson, 32 Pa. 52. In Greene v. Lunt, 58 Me. 518, it was said: "The assessment must be complete in and of itself as much as a deed or contract. Parol proof may be resorted to for the purpose of applying the terms of the description to the face of the earth, but no further. It cannot supply any deficiency in the butts or bounds. These must be ascertained from what is written, and from that alone." The description in this case was by the number of lot and range, without any reference to any map or plat—"the Cyrus Keen place in lot 6, range 2"; "the whole of lot 4, range 3, Lunt's lower tract"—of which the court said: "These lots are sufficiently described to enable any one to identify them by having the knowledge necessary to apply the description to the face of the earth." In Law v. People, 80 Ill. 268, the court said: "Any description by which the property may be identified by a competent surveyor with reasonable certainty, either with or without the aid of extrinsic evidence, will be sufficient." In St. Peter's Church v. Board of Commissioners, 12 Minn. 395 (Gil. 280), the property assessed was described as "S. ½ of lots 9 and 10 in block 49, Shakopee city," of which the court said: "In the absence of specific provision affecting the question, any description which is sufficiently definite and certain to ascertain the premises is good. In this case the town consists of lots and blocks, and the description points out the lot and block by the numbers thereof, respectively, and the premises assessed, as the south half of this lot. This, we think, is a sufficient description." See, also, Noyes v. King Co., 18 Wash. 417, 51 Pac. 1052; Taylor v. Wright, 121 Ill. 462, 13 N. E. 529; Koelling v. The People, 196 Ill. 353, 63 N. E. 735; Driggers v. Cassady, 71 Ala. 529; Davis v. Pacific Improvement Co., 137 Cal. 245, 70 Pac. 15. In Fowler v. People, 93 Ill. 116, the land was described as "block 3 in Wrightwood." The court received evidence that there was but one subdivision in Cook county called "Wrightwood," and but one block 3 in Wrightwood, and held the description sufficient. Similar rulings were made in State v. Woodbridge Tp., 42 N. J. Law, 401; Stewart v. Colter, 31 Minn. 385, 18 N. W. 98; Judd v. Anderson, 51 Iowa, 345, 1 N. W. 677, the court in the last case saying: "Parol evidence is admissible, not for the purpose of adding to or varying the description contained in the certificate of purchase, but of applying that description to its subject-matter, and when it is shown that H. B. Goe owned one tract of land, and but one, in the section, the description is just as definite and certain as if it had been written out in full in the certificate." In Godfrey v. Valentine, 45 Minn. 502, 48 N. W. 325, where the land was described as "lots 9 and 10 of Hoyt's outlots," evidence was received showing that the property in question was well known by that term, and so designated by those who had occasion to refer to it, and the description was held sufficient. In Minneapolis Railway Co. v. Minnesota Debenture Co., 81 Minn. 66, 83 N. W. 485, the description was "lot 1 Auditor's subdivision No. 22." The court received in evidence a map or plat which had been made by the county surveyor and recorded in the office of the register of deeds, and also evidence that this particular tract of land was commonly known and designated as "lot 1 Auditor's subdivision No. 22." In Kershaw v. Jansen, 49 Neb. 467, 68 N. W. 616, the description was by lot and block according to a map which had been filed and afterwards vacated. It was objected that the description was defective as referring to lots which had no legal existence. The court overruled this objection, saying: "Where, for the purposes of taxation, a description is used, so certain in its terms that it must, as to the taxpayer, have apprised him of the proceedings and of the land assessed, he cannot avoid his share of the public burden merely because there is nothing of record which ascertains the property described." In Labs v. Cooper, 107 Cal. 656, 40 Pac. 1042, cited by the respondent, the diagram in the assessment as copied in the record failed to describe any parcel of land, and it was held that from the description so copied the owner could not determine that his land was affected by the assessment. The court also held that it could not take judicial knowledge of the map of Sacramento for the purpose of identifying the description with that map. In Miller v. Williams, 135 Cal. 183, 67 Pac. 788, the land assessed in the city of Santa Cruz was described by numbers in certain tracts which were not subdivisions of the city, and no map of the tract was referred to. The court held that the description did not conform to the requirements of subdivision three of the section and was insufficient. In neither of these cases did the court consider the right to offer evidence in support of the description.

It appeared by the evidence in the present case, introduced on behalf of the plaintiff, that as early as 1886, O. N. Sanford, civil engineer, had made a survey and map of the Rancho Rincon del Diablo, and that on that map the land described in the complaint was delineated as lot 4 in block 178 of the rancho. It was also admitted that the land included in the Escondido irrigation district is, and was at the time of the assessment, identical in territory with the land included in the rancho. If now it can be shown that at the time of the assessment under which the deed to the defendant was made there was but one lot 4 in block 178 of the rancho, and that such fact is, and was at the time of said assessment, well known, such evidence, if not conclusive of the fact, would very strongly tend to show that the land described in the deed to the defendant is identical with that described in the complaint. It would then clearly appear that the plaintiff was not only not misled, but was directly informed that his lot was charged with the assessment. The evidence offered by the defendant was not only relevant, but was also competent to establish this fact. The court erred in refusing to admit this evidence, and for this error the judgment and order should be reversed.

GREEN v. SOULE. (S. F. 3,035.)*

BUILDING CONTRACT—NEGLIGENCE—PERSONAL INJURIES — INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—INSTRUCTION—VERDICT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE —RIGHTS OF PARTIES—APPEAL.

1. A subcontractor who furnishes all necessary materials required in the plastering of the building, and has charge of that part of the work, and sole control of the workmen engaged therein, is an independent contractor, as to the original contractor; and the fact that the building is to be erected under the supervision of an architect, and that the right to make alterations is reserved, does not change the relation.

2. In an action against a building contractor for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the contractor's negligence in leaving obstructions in a street, where it appeared that defendant made a subcontract with another person to do the plastering, the subcontractor agreeing to furnish all necessary materials and perform all the labor, and the evidence showed that the subcontractor had the entire charge of that part of the work, and sole control of the workmen engaged therein, it was error to refuse to charge that, if the injuries were the result of negligence on the part of the subcontractor, they must find for the defendant; the evidence tending to show that the mortar box and some lumber used by the plasterer were among the obstructions in the street.

3. Where there is no conflict in the evidence as to the terms of a contract involved in litigation, and its provisions are not ambiguous, the effect of the contract is a question of law for the court.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Kerrigan, Judge.

Action by Marian G. Green against A. C. Soule. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Robert Ash, for appellant. E. A. Bridgford, B. G. White, and John R. Wilson, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The action is to recover damages for personal injuries arising from the negligence of the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that one Charles Gebhardt made a contract in writing with the defendant for the erection of certain buildings at the corner of Eddy and Franklin streets, in San Francisco; that there was an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco providing that any person by whom, or under whose immediate authority, as principal contractor or employer, any portion of a public street should be made dangerous should, while the danger continued, maintain a good and substantial barrier around the dangerous portion of the street and cause to be maintained during every night, from sunset to daylight, a lighted lantern at the ends of the dangerous portion of the street; that the defendant, in the erection of said building, caused to be placed on the southerly line of Eddy street, in front of the building, a mortar bed, boxes, barriers, and other building materials extending from the sidewalk to within four feet of the car track in the center of the street, the said obstructions being from two to three feet in height, and rendering the street dangerous to travelers; that on the night of December 7, 1900, the defendant, having failed to erect any barrier or place any lights at said obstructions, the plaintiff, passing along the street in a buggy, ran over the obstructions, and was thereby thrown out of her vehicle and injured. The evidence showed without conflict that Gebhardt, the owner of the premises, made two separate contracts for the erection of different parts of the building—one with the defendant, and the other with one C. G. Stuhr. By the contract with the defendant it was agreed that the defendant should furnish the necessary labor and materials, and perform all the excavations, concrete, brick work, marble steps, carpenter work, glass, bell and electric work, vestibule tiling, plastering, tinning and iron work, and "other works shown and described in and by and in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications for the same, * * * hereto annexed." The plans and specifications were not introduced in evidence. It will be observed, however, that the above enumeration does not expressly include the plumbing or sewer work connected with the building. By the contract with Stuhr it was agreed that Stuhr should furnish the necessary labor and materials and perform and complete all the gas fitting, sewering, plumbing, and other works described in and by and in conformity with the plans, drawings, and specifications annexed to the said contract. These plans and specifications were not introduced in evidence. The testimony shows, however, without contradiction, that the defendant had nothing whatever to do with the placing of the sewers in the building, or with making the excavations necessary for that purpose, and that that part of the work was done under the contract with Stuhr, and not under that made by the defendant. The evidence shows further that the defendant made a subcontract with D. Leahy, whereby, for a specified sum, Leahy agreed to furnish all the necessary materials and perform all the labor required in the plastering of the building in accordance with the plans and specifications, and that in pursuance of this contract Leahy did the plastering and had the entire charge of that part of the work and sole control of the workmen engaged therein. A number of witnesses for the plaintiff testified that immediately after the accident to the plaintiff they examined the street in front of the building, and found obstructions in the street from two to three feet high, extending from the sidewalk to within two or three feet of the street car track in the center of the street, consisting of lumber, barrels, boxes, mortar beds, and other building materials. None of them gave any statement concerning the relative location of the different materials mentioned, nor did they expressly state that they were all mixed together in the pile; and on these points, so far as the plaintiff's testimony was concerned, the jury were left to conjecture. For the defendant several witnesses testified positively that they examined the premises the following morning; that there was a pile of broken concrete and pieces of asphaltum, taken from the street pavement in digging the trench for the sewer connection, extending along the east side of the trench from the sidewalk to within two or three feet of the car track, and from two to three feet high, and that there were no other materials or obstructions in the street except the mortar box used by the plastering contractor, Leahy, and this box did not extend into the street to exceed five feet from the sidewalk. The sewer trench had been filled in to the level of the street the day before the accident, but according to the testimony of these witnesses the concrete and asphaltum had been left in the pile alongside the trench. The distance between the curb and the nearest rail of the car track was shown to be about seventeen feet. It was also shown without conflict that the defendant had nothing to do with the employment of the men engaged under Leahy, the subcontractor for the plastering, nor any control of them while engaged in the work.

The court instructed the jury that "an independent contractor is a person who is employed in the exercise of an independent and distinct employment, and not under the immediate control or supervision of the employer," and that, if they should find that the injury complained of was caused by an obstruction erected by Leahy in carrying out a contract between himself and the defendant, and should also find that Leahy was an independent contractor, then they should render a verdict for the defendant. Instructions numbered 7 and 8 asked by the defendant and refused by the court, were as follows: "(7) A subcontractor under an original contractor may be an independent contractor as to such original contractor, and I instruct you that D. Leahy, the contractor for plastering the building, was an independent contractor as to the defendant, A. C. Soule, when he became the contractor for the work of plastering the house. (8) If you believe from the evidence that the injury complained of was the result of negligence on the part of the subcontractor, D. Leahy, then you must find for the defendant." We think the refusal of these instructions was error. "An independent contractor is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to the results of his work, and not as to the means whereby it is to be accomplished." Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) vol. 16, p. 187. "The chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right of control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for." Id. The fact that the work is to be done under the supervision of an architect, or that the employer has the right to make alterations, deviations, additions, and omissions from the contract, does not change the relation from that of an independent contractor to that of a mere servant. Id.; Frassi v. McDonald, 122 Cal. 402, 55 Pac. 139. These principles apply "likewise in favor of the principal contractor as against any liability on his part for the acts of a subcontractor or of a subcontractor's servants." 16 Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 194, and cases cited. There was nothing in the contract for the plastering which contemplated or required that the person doing the plastering should place his materials on the street or sidewalk, and therefore it could not be contended that the contract itself was for the creation of an obstruction in the street which would constitute a nuisance. There was no conflict in the evidence with respect to the terms of the contract between the defendant, as the principal contractor, and Leahy, as subcontractor for the plastering; nor were its terms in any respect ambiguous or uncertain, so as to require any fact to be established in order to determine its effect. The meaning and effect of the contract, and the relation of the parties to it thereby created, consequently became a question of law to be decided by the court. 11 Ency. Pl. & Pr. pp. 78–80, 88, 89. Under the evidence there can be no question but that Leahy occupied the relation of independent contractor to the defendant. He exercised an independent occupation, his contract required him to bring about the result of plastering the house, and he was left entirely free to select for himself the means and mode of doing the work and the persons to be immediately employed therein, without any control or right of control in the defendant. It was, therefore, the duty of the court, on request, to instruct the jury that Leahy was an independent contractor, and not leave it to the jury to determine according to their own notions the effect of the contract in that respect. 11 Ency. Pl. & Pr. pp. 80, 89. The instruction was important because of the vague and unsatisfactory state of the evidence in regard to the character of the obstructions which caused the injury. There was a conflict as to whether or not there were any boxes, barrels, and lumber in the street at the point where the buggy upset, and it was uncertain whether, if in fact there were any such material there which caused the injury, such material was a part of that in use by the defendant or a part of that in use by Leahy, the plasterer. There was some evidence that the persons who made the excavation for the sewer connection used lumber belonging to Leahy for the purpose of holding up the sides of the trench while they were digging it, and that the trench was filled in again the day before the accident. The lumber would then be no longer necessary for use in the sewer work, and it may be that this was the lumber observed by the witnesses for the plaintiff who testified that the obstructions consisted in part of lumber, and that it was carelessly left in the street by Leahy after it was returned to him. The boxes and barrels testified to may also have been those left there by Leahy, and not by the defendant. All these things were questions to be determined by the jury, and the instructions requested by the defendant should have been given for their guidance in considering of their verdict. For this error the order denying a new trial must be reversed.

It is earnestly contended by the appellant that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The principal claim as to this point is that it was proven without conflict that there was at the time of the injury an obstruction made by the sewer contractor, consisting of a pile composed of sand, broken concrete, and pieces of asphalt pavement, extending from the sidewalk to within two or three feet of the car track, and some two or three feet high alongside of and directly east of the sewer trench; that the trench itself had been filled up the day before; that all the other obstructions were situated along the street further to the east; that the plaintiff was driving along the street from west to east, and consequently must have been first struck and upset by the pile of asphaltum and concrete, for which the defendant was in no wise responsible. Some five witnesses for the defendant testified directly that there was such a pile of paving material at that time and place, and that there were no other materials on the street at the point where plaintiff said her buggy was upset. The defendant also testified that there were marks on this pile of material the next morning, showing where the wheel of some vehicle had run upon and over it. The only contradiction of the fact of the existence of this obstruction in the street was the testimony of Cleary, a witness for the plaintiff, who testified that he was the sewer workman who excavated and filled the sewer trench; that practically all the sand and concrete taken from the trench was replaced therein; and that the asphaltum was first taken off the top of the trench, and was then piled on the sidewalk. This evidence, though not very satisfactory, is sufficient to raise a conflict which cannot be decided by this court. If the court below was satisfied that the witnesses for defendant were entitled to equal credit with Cleary, it might well have ordered a new trial. But this court cannot pass upon the credibility of witnesses, and hence cannot interfere upon this ground. We frequently have cause to believe that the judges of the superior court are too reluctant to exercise their power of granting a new trial for insufficiency of the evidence, and too much inclined to acquiesce in a verdict of the jury which does not meet with their own approval. There is a clear and obvious distinction between the duty of a trial court and the duty of an appellate court with respect to the decision of such questions, and it is well established by the decisions of this court. The trial court cannot rest upon a conflict in the evidence, but must weigh and consider the evidence for both parties, and determine for itself the just conclusion to be drawn from it. "Where the decision is against the weight of the evidence, it is the duty of that court to grant a new trial." Irving v. Cunningham, 58 Cal. 309; Mason v. Austin, 46 Cal. 387; Hawkins v. Abbott, 40 Cal. 639; Bjorman v. Fort Bragg Co., 92 Cal. 500, 28 Pac. 591. If the judge is not satisfied with the verdict, and is convinced that it is clearly against the weight of the evidence, it is his duty to set it aside, even though there may have been some conflict in the testimony. He has had the same opportunity as the jury to observe the manner of the witnesses, and to decide upon their credibility, and it is his duty to see that the verdict is not clearly against the weight of the evidence. He must exercise a wholesome and discreet supervision over the jury in this respect. Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 569. "There, although there may be what to us, judging from the cold record, seems a substantial conflict in the evidence, the court having heard the evidence, and having had ample opportunity to judge as to the demeanor, manner, and credibility of the witnesses, may, if he is dissatisfied with the verdict, and is of the opinion that it is clearly against the weight of the evidence, set it aside, and grant a new trial. The judge of the superior court is in a position to determine between the apparent and the real, to detect the fallacy of specious testimony which may have misled the jury, but which his wider experience enables him to readily comprehend." Bates v. Howard, 105 Cal. 178, 38 Pac. 716. Of course, the judge should give due respect to the verdict of the jury, and may sometimes properly deny a new trial in cases where, if submitted to him without a jury, he might, upon the evidence, have made a different decision. He must be clearly satisfied that the verdict is wrong; otherwise he should let it stand. But in considering the question upon the motion he must act upon his own judgment as to the effect of the evidence. The parties are entitled to the judgment of the jury in rendering a verdict in the first instance, but upon a motion for a new trial they are equally entitled to the independent judgment of the judge as to whether such verdict is supported by the evidence.

We have considered the case upon the theory that the answer sufficiently denies the allegation that the defendant placed in the street the mortar beds, boxes, and barrels extending from the sidewalk to within four feet of the car track. We have done so because the plaintiff does not raise the question, and the case appears to have been tried upon the theory that the denial is sufficient. As the question may be raised upon another trial, the attention of counsel is directed to the form of the denial, so that, if objection is then made, the defendant may amend as he may be advised.

The order denying the new trial is reversed, the judgment vacated, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

1. An olographic will, defined by Civ. Code, § 1277, as "one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself," is not rendered invalid by the fact that the date therein written is erroneous, and not the date on which the will was actually written.

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Appeal by Mary J. Scott and others from an order refusing to admit to probate an instrument purporting to be the olographic will of John Fay, deceased. Reversed.

Louis S. Beedy, for appellants. Bart Burke and Chas. J. Pence, for respondents.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal from an order refusing to admit to probate an instrument purporting to be the olographic will of deceased. The instrument was entirely in the handwriting of deceased, and bore date "May twenty-fifth, eighteen hundred and fifty-nine." It is not claimed that the deceased was not of sound mind, nor that the purported will was not his free act and deed. In the instrument the deceased made provision for his son Luke Fay, who was born in 1861; for his son John Fay, who was born about 1865, and for his daughter, Mary Montealegre, who was married to Carlos F. Montealegre in January, 1887, and died March 29, 1900. It is thus evident from the testimony that the instrument was not written in 1859, but at some time between the marriage of the daughter and her death. If we were to indulge in conjecture, we would say that the will was written May 25, 1889, the words "fifty-nine" being, by mistake or carelessness, inserted instead of the words "eighty-nine." There does not appear to be any explanation as to the discrepancy in the date which the instrument bears and the actual date or time when it was executed. No reason is suggested, and none suggests itself to us, as to any object the deceased could have in dating the instrument "eighteen hundred and fifty-nine." He had the right to make an olographic will, provided he complied with the statute in so doing. It is declared in the Civil Code (section 1277) that "an olographic will is one that is entirely written, dated and signed by the hand of the testator himself." This is the same provision as in the Code Napoleon. The instrument in this case is an olographic will, unless we hold that the word "dated" in the above section means the actual and correct time when the instrument was written. The Legislature has not used the words "truly dated" nor "correctly dated," but the word "dated," which must be construed according to the approved usage of the language (Civ. Code, § 13), and in its primary and general sense (Code Civ. Proc. § 1861). If we should hold that the word "dated" means the true and correct time when the will was written, then any difference shown between the date given in the instrument and the time when it was written would invalidate it. If, under such rule, a testator, in his right mind, by his own hand, should write his will, and date it January 1, 1903, and it should be shown by oral evidence to have been written January 1, 1904, the will would be void; and yet we know by constant experience that business men many times during the first few days of the new year write the date of the old. And also many times we get the wrong impression as to the day of the month, and instead of the correct date write the date as of the day preceding or even of the following day. The word "date" or "dated" is often used as referring to the date or time written in an instrument. Thus it is provided in our Code that any date may be inserted in a negotiable instrument, whether past, present, or future. Civ. Code, § 3094. The Century Dictionary defines the verb "date" "to mark with a date, as a letter or writing." A will other than an olographic will is not required to be dated, and as to all other wills parol evidence is admissible to show the true date, even if contradictory of the written date. Underhill on Wills, § 268. An olographic will must be dated for the reason that the Legislature has said so, but we do not think it would be a sound rule to hold that any mistake or error in the date would invalidate the will. It will be presumed that the date given is the true date. We apprehend that cases will rarely occur in which this is not so. If it becomes necessary in any case upon a question as to the sanity of the testator or probably other questions, the true time at which the will was made may be inquired into; but we hold that simply showing that an olographic will was made at a time different from that written therein will not invalidate it. The date is not the material thing, although made necessary by the statute. It is a means of identification, and aids in determining the authenticity of the will; but the main and essential thing is that the will be wholly written and signed by the hand of the testator. The origin of olographic wills arose probably under the civil law, where among unsolemn privileged wills was that of a father bestowing his property on his children; all in his own handwriting. Brown's Civil and Admiralty Law, vol. 1, p. 290. An olographic will may be proved in the same manner that other private writings are proved. Code Civ. Proc. § 1309. A private writing may be proved by evidence of the genuineness of the handwriting of the maker. Id. § 1940. We do not mean to be understood as holding that an olographic will must not be dated, because that is made essential by the statute. Our attention has not been called to any case directly in point, nor have we been able to find any. It is said in Bement & Dougherty v. Trenton Locomotive, etc., Co., 32 N. J. Law, 515: "The primary signification of the word 'date' is not time in the abstract, nor time taken absolutely, but, as its derivation plainly indicates, time given or specified, time in some way ascertained and fixed. This is the sense in which the word is commonly used. When we speak of the date of a deed, we do not mean the time when it was actually executed, but the time of its execution as given or stated in the deed itself. The date of an item or of a charge in a book of account is not necessarily the time when the article charged was in fact furnished, but simply the time given or set down in the account in connection with such charge." In Underhill on Wills (section 181) it is said: "Where the date is given, it may be contradicted by parol, though until that is done it will be presumed, in a case of holograph, that the will was executed upon the date which is stated in it." The language of the Civil Code of Louisiana is the same in meaning as the section of our Code in regard to olographic wills. It was held by the United States Circuit Court in Gaines v. Lizardi et al., 3 Woods, 77, 9 Fed. Cas. 1042, that where the proof showed that an olographic will was written and signed by the testator, and bore date of some day in a designated month, but did not show of what particular day, it was a sufficient compliance with the provisions of the Code as to dating. The case involved the probate of an olographic will which had been lost or destroyed, but it illustrates the point in the case at bar. In case of an olographic will which has been lost or destroyed it might be impossible to prove the day of the month, or even the month in which it was executed, and yet the evidence might be clear and convincing that the will was entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator. Should the courts in such cases exclude the will from probate because the correct time at which it was written could not be proven? In Estate of Skerrett, 67 Cal. 587, 8 Pac. 181, the deceased in his lifetime signed a deed purporting to convey certain property to his sister. The record in the case shows that the deed was dated April 26, 1881, and acknowledged before a notary April 27, 1881. The deed was never delivered, and therefore could not take effect as a deed. It was not of a testamentary character, and could not be given effect by itself as an olographic will. But a copy of the deed in the handwriting of deceased was found after his death in an envelope with a letter addressed to the sister. The letter was without date, but showed an intention clearly expressed in the handwriting that his sister should have the property. The time at which the copy of the deed was made by deceased did not appear, nor was there anything to indicate the time when the letter was written, except that it was some time after the acknowledgment of the deed. This court said: "Neither the copy of the deed nor the letter, taken by itself, constitutes a will. The one is not testamentary in its character, and the other has no date. But taking them together as the deceased left them, forming one document, it is complete. The first part furnishes the date, and the latter the testamentary character." Now, it appears evident in the above cited case, from the contents of the letter, that the copy of the deed and the letter must have been made after the date of acknowledgment. There was in fact nothing to show when the copy was made, but it contained a date, and with the letter the olographic will was held good. The case was followed and approved in Re Soher, 78 Cal. 478, 21 Pac. 8. In Estate of Lakemeyer, 135 Cal. 28, 66 Pac. 961, 87 Am. St. Rep. 96, an olographic will was headed, "New York, Nov. 22, '97," and it was held that the will was dated, the abbreviation "'97" meaning 1897. Therefore it appears to be the rule of this court, as all other courts, to construe wills as valid, in preference to holding them void.

It is provided in the Civil Code (section 1326) that of two modes of interpreting a will that is to be preferred which will prevent a total intestacy. The Supreme Court of Louisiana adopted the above liberal rule in Heirs of McMichael v. Mrs. F. Bankston et al., 24 La. Ann. 451, in which it was held that where two words in an olographic will were not in the handwriting of deceased, but did not change the meaning nor alter the dispositions made by the testator, the will would be upheld. When a man of sound mind and memory, by his own hand and signature, has plainly made a disposition of his property, the courts should carry out his intention if it can be done without violating the mandates of the law.

Respondent contends that this appeal was not taken within 60 days after "the rendition of the judgment," and hence the evidence cannot be considered on this appeal. The appeal was taken within 60 days after the entry of the order, and was within time. The section of the Code in regard to rendition of judgments does not apply. Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3; In re Smith's Estate, 98 Cal. 636, 33 Pac. 744; Estate of Scott, 124 Cal. 675, 57 Pac. 654. The stipulation shows "that the testimony of the appellant John Fay and the testimony of Luke Fay, set forth in full in said transcript, was the only evidence adduced at the hearing of the petition for the probate of said will contained therein." Appellants are parties aggrieved, and entitled to appeal. They are beneficiaries under a trust created by the will, and the court will not here determine the validity of the trust clause as to appellants. Code Civ. Proc. § 1299; Estate of Mary Cobb, 49 Cal. 599; Estate of Murphy, 104 Cal. 554, 38

ALCORN et al. v. BRANDEMAN. SAME v. HOWARD. SAME v. GIESEKE.

(Sac. 942–944.)

ESTOPPEL—PRESENTATION OF QUESTION BY DEMURRER—CONSTRUCTION OF COMPLAINT.

1. The question whether plaintiffs, suing to recover lands as heirs at law of a decedent, are estopped to impeach a decree making a partial distribution of the estate by which they were given certain other lands, while those in controversy were distributed to defendant's predecessor in title, cannot arise on the face of the complaint, so as to be presented for consideration by a demurrer, where the proceedings for distribution and decree are set out merely to show the source of defendant's claim, and the complaint does not show that plaintiffs took under the decree, but alleges its invalidity, and that it was made without their consent or knowledge.

2. Where plaintiffs sue as heirs and as grantees of a remaining heir of an intestate to recover certain real estate, claiming two-thirds of the land described in the complaint as heirs and one-third under the deed, the fact that they may be estopped by their conduct from claiming under the deed does not render the complaint insufficient to support their claim as heirs at law of the decedent for the other two-thirds of the land described therein.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Edward I. Jones, Judge.

Several actions by James Ben Alcorn and others against Henry Brandeman, C. A. Howard, and E. E. Gieseke. From judgments sustaining demurrers to the complaints, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. B. Hall (J. F. Ramage, of counsel), for appellants. S. M. Spurrier and A. C. White, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. The appeals in all these cases are taken from judgments on demurrers to the complaints, the plaintiffs declining to amend, and in the main no different questions are presented now than were submitted and disposed of in the case of Alcorn et al. v. Buschke et al., 133 Cal. 655, 66 Pac. 15, wherein the complaint, except as to the names of the defendants and the descriptions of the property, was identically the same as those now challenged on these appeals. The allegations of the complaint, the grounds of attack upon it, and the conclusion of the court thereon are set forth fully in the opinion in that case, and discussion of them here is unnecessary. (In the opinion in that case as reported there are two errors in dates. The deed from Sebree to the plaintiffs was June 6, 1900, instead of June 6, 1890, as stated, and in the first paragraph, on page 657, 133 Cal., and the second column of page 16, 66 Pac., the date of the deed by Kyle, as attorney in fact, to Jenning, stated as October 17, 1896, should be June 26, 1896.)

It is contended, however, by respondents that one point is advanced by them on these appeals which was not presented or passed on in the above case. This is relative to the effect of a decree of distribution, the general terms of which are set forth in the complaint.

The plaintiffs sue as heirs at law and as grantee of one Sebree, the remaining heir at law of one McKinney, who died intestate, seised of the property mentioned in the complaint and other property. Pending the administration of such estate, Sebree, who was administrator thereof, petitioned for a partial distribution of the estate, which was granted, the decree distributing to the defendants' predecessor the land described in the complaint, and to the plaintiffs and Sebree, as heirs at law of the decedent, other lands of the estate.

Notwithstanding this court held in Alcorn v. Buschke, supra, that such decree was void for the reasons therein stated, still it is now insisted by respondents that it nevertheless appears from the allegations of the complaint, as they construe them, that the plaintiffs are estopped by their own conduct, and the conduct of Sebree, from questioning the validity of the decree, and asserting title to the premises in dispute which the defendants claim under it. In this regard it is claimed that they are especially estopped from asserting claim, under the deed from Sebree to them, of his one-third interest in the property as heir at law, because of Sebree's conduct in petitioning for and obtaining the decree of distribution of the particular land in dispute in favor of defendants' predecessor in interest, under whom defendants claim, and of which action and conduct on Sebree's part they had full notice and knowledge when they took the conveyance from him. And that as to the original interests (two-thirds) which plaintiffs claim as heirs at law of McKinney, respondents insist that as it equally appears from the complaint that plaintiffs actually took under the decree the other lands of the estate particularly distributed to them, and took advantage of and enjoyed the benefit which the decree gave them in that respect, they are estopped from now questioning its validity as to the interest acquired to the land in dispute by the respondents under the same decree; that they could not accept the decree in as far as it conferred advantages on them, and repudiate it as far as it attempted to confer advantages on others; that they must elect to be bound by it in its entirety or reject it in its entirety, and, having elected to accept the benefits it conferred on them, are estopped to dispute defendants' rights under it, or to now question its validity.

As far as concerns the interest which the plaintiffs acquired to the lands in dispute under their conveyance from Sebree, a question may arise, not only as to the effect of the decree of partial distribution, obtained at his request, upon whatever interest he might have had in the property distributed to respondents' predecessor under it, but whether his petition asking for such distribution to defendants' predecessor in interest, and the distribution under it, did not operate as a ratification of a deed made by one Kyle under the power of attorney set forth and discussed in Alcorn v. Buschke, supra. This would not, however, of itself affect the sufficiency of the complaint in the cases now under consideration, because, independent of the one-third interest which plaintiffs claim to have acquired from Sebree, as heir of McKinney, the complaint would still be sufficient to support their claim as heirs at law of the said decedent for the other two-thirds of the land described in it, unless the point made by defendants that they are estopped by the decree of distribution can be availed of on the face of the complaint, and we do not perceive that it can.

While the complaint sets forth in general the proceedings for distribution, and shows that distribution of the land in question was made to respondents' predecessor in interest, and that other lands were distributed under it to plaintiffs and Sebree, there is nothing whatever to indicate that the plaintiffs actually took any lands under said decree, or derived any advantage or benefit under it. The proceedings in partial distribution were averred by plaintiffs, in their complaint to quiet title, solely as being one of the sources of respondents' claim of title to the property in question, and which proceedings they alleged were totally void; that they neither authorized or were cognizant of them, and never consented, agreed to, or approved of the object thereof. Under these circumstances, the benefit of the rule of law which respondents contend for is not available to them upon the face of the pleading. If the facts (which they incorrectly infer are all set forth in the complaint and upon which assumption he makes the claim of estoppel) exist, they will have an opportunity of availing themselves of the rule of law contended for, by appropriate pleading and proof.

This additional point now urged on these appeals being without present merit, and as all the other points made to sustain the judgment have heretofore been disposed of adversely to respondents in the case of Alcorn v. Buschke, supra, the judgments in the three above-entitled causes are reversed, and they are remanded, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrers interposed in each case.

ROGERS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 2,485.)

CONTEMPT — CERTIORARI—RES JUDICATA — HABEAS CORPUS — GRAND JURY—WITNESS — REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTES.

1. Since under the statute a judgment on habeas corpus remanding a petitioner is not a bar to a subsequent application of the same kind, a decision of the Supreme Court on habeas corpus, remanding a petitioner who had sought his discharge from a judgment fining him for contempt of court, is not available as res judicata on certiorari to review the judgment.

2. On certiorari to review a judgment fining plaintiff for contempt in refusing to answer questions propounded by the grand jury, the transcript showed that the plaintiff, in response to the first order to show why he should not be punished for contempt, presented a verified answer seeking to show that he was justified in his refusal on statutory and constitutional grounds. The affidavit of the foreman as to the ground on which the order was based stated that the questions were asked plaintiff in the investigation by the grand jury of a charge of forgery against another person, and that the questions were material in that investigation. The court ordered plaintiff to answer. Held, that a second affidavit of the foreman, subsequently presented, simply alleging that, when plaintiff appeared in response to another subpœna, the same questions were again put to him, and that he again refused to answer, notwithstanding the previous order of the court to do so, is insufficient as a basis for proceedings for contempt, since it fails to show that the charge against such other person was under investigation when plaintiff was again called to testify, and there is no mention of any other charge to which the questions might have been material or pertinent.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2066, providing that a witness can be compelled to answer only such questions as are legal and pertinent to a matter in issue before a tribunal, a witness cannot be adjudged guilty of contempt for a refusal to answer questions that are not legal and pertinent.

4. A judgment for contempt for refusal of a witness to answer questions is reviewable on certiorari, on the question whether the answers would have a tendency to degrade the witness or his character, in violation of the direct provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2065.

5. A judgment for contempt for refusal of a witness to answer interrogatories is reviewable on certiorari, on the question whether the interrogatories were material and pertinent to any matter then in issue, in violation of the direct provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2066.

6. Where a third person had been charged with criminal misconduct in relation to the distribution of an estate, and he himself testified that he had been guilty of various crimes, including forgery, and the grand jury commenced an investigation, and asked certain questions of a witness relating entirely to his conduct and acts in the matter of the estate, and as to his knowledge and information as to whether one claimed as an heir was in fact the true heir of the deceased, and the reason why such witness abandoned the cause of his clients, who were heirs of the estate, and whether he had received any money for so doing, as the questions in connection with the admitted facts were all material on the question as to whether such witness had himself been guilty of criminal misconduct, the witness could not be required to answer them under the direct provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2065, as the answer might have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony.

7. Where an indictment had been found against a certain person for forgery, and was pending in court, the investigation of the charge on which the indictment was based was concluded, and was no longer pending before the grand jury, and questions thereafter propounded to a witness before the grand jury as to that charge were no longer material and pertinent to any issue before such jury, save the single question of the guilt or innocence of the witness in connection with such crime, and his refusal to answer was justifiable.

In Bank. James Taylor Rogers was fined for contempt by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for refusing to answer questions, and brings certiorari to review the judgment. Judgment annulled.

Houx & Barrett, for petitioner. I. Harris, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Certiorari to review a judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco imposing upon plaintiff a fine of $500 for contempt of court. The judgment in the contempt proceedings against plaintiff declared him guilty of contempt for his refusal to answer any of 11 questions propounded to him by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco, after having been directed by the superior court to answer the same, and adjudged that for said contempt he pay a fine of $500, and, further, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of said city and county for five days. Having been imprisoned under said judgment, he sought his discharge by habeas corpus, but was by this court remanded upon the ground that, so far as the record then before the court showed, at least one of the questions propounded was relevant and pertinent to the matter under investigation by the grand jury, and it had not been made to appear that his answer to the question would either have a tendency to incriminate him or degrade his character, and that, therefore, his refusal to answer this question was not justified in law, and he had properly been adjudged to be in contempt. In re Rogers, 129 Cal. 468, 62 Pac. 47.

The defendant pleads the judgment of this court in the habeas corpus matter in bar of this proceeding, but we are satisfied that it can have no such effect. It is well settled that the doctrine of res adjudicata is not, in the absence of statutory provision, applicable to the decision of a court or judge remanding a person in habeas corpus proceedings. Church on Habeas Corpus, § 386; In re Ring, 28 Cal. 247–251; Bradley v. Beetle, 153 Mass. 154, 26 N. E. 429; People v. Brady, 56 N. Y. 182. Under our statute, a judgment on habeas corpus remanding a petitioner is not, as a matter of law, a bar to a subsequent application of the same kind to the same or another court (In re Ring, supra), and it certainly can have no such effect in this proceeding. This is true, whether all of the material facts were presented at the first hearing or not. Bradley v. Beetle, supra.

The transcript of the record certified to this court shows that the plaintiff, in response to the first order to show why he should not be punished for contempt for failing to answer the questions propounded by the grand jury, presented a verified answer, and a copy of this is contained in such transcript. The affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury upon which the order was based was presented and filed July 24, 1900, and stated that the questions were asked plaintiff in the investigation by the grand jury of a charge of forgery against one Chretien, and that the questions were pertinent and material in such investigation. In his answer, plaintiff sought to make it appear that he was justified in refusing to answer any of the questions by section 2065, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that a witness need not give an answer which will have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony, or which will have a direct tendency to degrade his character, unless it be the very fact in issue, and by section 13 of article 1 of the state Constitution, which provides that no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself. He also alleged certain facts tending to show that the investigation against Chretien had been concluded, and that an indictment had been found and presented. No showing as to the facts was made in reply to the verified statement of plaintiff, and the court did not find that such statement was in any respect untrue, but simply found "that the matters and things set up in said answer do not constitute just and legal cause why the said questions should not be answered by said Rogers," and ordered and adjudged "that the said questions propounded to said * * * Rogers were legal and proper, and that it was the duty of said Rogers to answer the same," and further ordered that he answer each and all of said questions "whenever thereto subpœnaed and requested, and when next appearing before said grand jury."

The second affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury, presented August 3, 1900, simply alleged that, when the witness appeared on that day in response to another subpœna issued, the same questions were again put to him, and he again refused to answer, notwithstanding the previous order of the court requiring him to so do. This affidavit is entirely silent upon the question as to whether any investigation was then being made by the grand jury as to the charge against Chretien mentioned in the first affidavit, or as to any charge against Chretien. The second order to show cause was thereupon made, and, upon the hearing, the court refused to allow the plaintiff to file his affidavit in reply to the order, doubtless upon the theory that the questions thereby presented had been disposed of on the previous hearing. Thereupon the court found that the refusal of the plaintiff to answer the questions was a "direct disobedience of the order of the superior court made * * * July 25, 1900," and that he was therefore guilty of contempt, and pronounced the judgment in question. It is apparent that if the order of July 25, 1900, was invalid, the judgment subsequently pronounced is void; for it is entirely based upon the previous order, and the punishment was imposed solely for the disobedience of said order. The second affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury is manifestly insufficient as the basis of a proceeding for contempt on account of the refusal of a witness to answer questions, for it entirely fails to show that the charge against Chretien was under investigation by the grand jury at the time plaintiff was again called before that body to testify as a witness, and there is no mention in either affidavit of said foreman of any other charge to which the question might have been material or pertinent. A witness can be compelled to answer only such questions as are legal and pertinent to a matter in issue before a tribunal, and for a refusal to answer questions that are not pertinent to the issue being tried he cannot be adjudged guilty of contempt. Code Civ. Proc. § 2066; Ex parte Zeehandelaar, 71 Cal. 238, 12 Pac. 259; Overend v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 280, 286, 63 Pac. 372; In re Rogers, supra. A grand jury, like a court, may ask only such questions as are pertinent to a matter then under investigation, and, if there be no matter under investigation, a refusal to answer questions cannot be made to constitute a contempt. "When the contempt is a constructive contempt, namely, committed without the presence of the court, the affidavit of facts forming the basis of judicial action must show upon its face a case of contempt; and, if it does not, then the court is wanting in jurisdiction, and the order of contempt is void." Overend v. Superior Court, supra.

It is, therefore, only by reading the second affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury in connection with the prior affidavit and proceedings, and upon the theory that a disobedience of the order of the court requiring the witness to answer the questions or any of them would, of itself, without regard to the conditions existing at the time the witness again appeared before the grand jury, constitute a contempt, that the judgment of contempt can possibly be justified. This is apparently the theory upon which the superior court proceeded, and, unless such order was a valid and enforceable order, the judgment of contempt was, as already said, unauthorized. The order in question admitted the truth of the matters and things set up in plaintiff's answer, finding simply that such matters and things did not constitute just and legal cause why the said questions should not be answered. There is thus presented only a question of law, viz., the question as to whether the allegations of the answer, taken as true, established a case in which the witness was justified in refusing to answer, upon the ground either that the answers would have a tendency to incriminate him or degrade his character, or that they were not material and pertinent to any matter then in issue. The decision of the court adjudicating one guilty of contempt is, upon both these questions, reviewable either on habeas corpus (Ex parte Zeehandelaar, supra; In re Rogers, supra), or upon certiorari (Overend v. Superior Court, supra). See, also, Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 112, 43 Pac. 580. If such a case is shown, the superior court was without power to adjudge plaintiff guilty of contempt.

We have carefully examined the allegations of the answer in connection with the questions propounded to the plaintiff, and are satisfied that he was justified upon both grounds in refusing to answer each and all of the questions. It appears from the answer presented in the contempt proceedings that distribution of the residue of the estate of one Joseph Sullivan, deceased, including several thousands of dollars in money, had been made by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to an alleged heir, "John Sullivan," under such circumstances as to give rise to the suspicion that the property of the estate had, through fraud on the part of parties and attorneys appearing in the matter, been distributed to a spurious heir, and divided among those participating in the fraud. Chretien appeared as the attorney for John Sullivan. The plaintiff, who had appeared for certain persons alleged to be heirs, and filed a petition for distribution of the residue to them, claiming that he had become satisfied that his clients were not entitled to share in the estate, had abandoned his claim, and had thus allowed the distribution to be made to "John Sullivan." Chretien, plaintiff, and others were charged by a statement published in the San Francisco Call, a daily newspaper, with serious criminal misconduct in relation to the distribution of the estate, and an investigation was had by the superior court having jurisdiction of the estate, resulting in an order purporting to vacate the decree of distribution. In that investigation Chretien himself testified that he had been guilty of various crimes relative to said estate, including that of forgery of various receipts purporting to have been given by "John Sullivan" for moneys received therein. Within a few days thereafter there were published in the San Francisco Examiner, a daily newspaper, two statements, purporting to have been severally made by Chretien and another, accusing plaintiff in effect of having received $600 for the abandonment of the claim of his clients, and charging that the estate had been robbed through the instrumentality of spurious heirs, and accusing plaintiff of consciously aiding therein. It was under these circumstances that the grand jury commenced the investigation, and, upon the theory that the same were pertinent and material in the investigation of the charge of forgery against Chretien, the 11 questions were asked of plaintiff. These questions related entirely to his (the plaintiff's) conduct and acts in the matter of said estate of Joseph Sullivan, the allegations contained in the papers filed by him therein, his knowledge and information as to whether or not John Sullivan was, in fact, the true heir of deceased, his reasons for the abandonment of the cause of his clients, and as to whether he had received any money therefor.

Considered in connection with the admitted facts, the questions asked were all material and pertinent upon the question as to whether the plaintiff had himself been guilty of criminal misconduct, and, with the exception of one or two, were material only upon that question. The one or two questions that might possibly be considered pertinent to the investigation of the charges against Chretien went to the question of the information of plaintiff as to the falsity of the claim made by Chretien on behalf of the alleged heir, "John Sullivan," at the time that he (plaintiff) withdrew his opposition to distribution to said "John Sullivan," and thus aided in the accomplishment of a crime. It was charged, in effect, that he had willfully aided and abetted in the commission of a felony, the obtaining of the property of this estate, amounting to several thousands of dollars, by fraud and false representations. It requires only a reading of the questions asked to demonstrate that they were asked for the purpose of obtaining evidence upon which to proceed against the plaintiff himself, rather than Chretien, for a felony. That the answers to such questions would, if the charges made were well founded and the witness answered truly, serve such purpose, is too clear for question. However commendable may be a desire to ascertain the truth and to punish offenders against the law, so long as we adhere to the settled policy of this country and of England that no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal proceeding, so long must a witness be protected in his refusal to answer questions, the answers to which will serve to show that he has been guilty of a felony for which he may be prosecuted. Where it is made to appear that such is the nature of a question asked, a court is without power to compel an answer, and its adjudication of contempt is a nullity.

The answer in the contempt proceedings, presented in response to the first order to show cause, further in effect alleged that the grand jury had already, upon the testimony adduced before it, and without the evidence of plaintiff, found and presented to the superior court an indictment against Chretien, upon the charge stated in the affidavit of the foreman of the grand jury, which was one of forgery of the indorsement of a certain check, and that such indictment was pending in said court. The truth of these allegations being conceded, it is apparent that the investigation of the charge mentioned in such affidavit had been concluded, and that said charge was no longer pending before the grand jury. Under these circumstances, the questions were no longer material or pertinent to any issue before the grand jury, so far as the record shows, save and except the single question as to the guilt or innocence of the plaintiff himself. Whatever may have been the situation when the questions were first asked, the superior court had no power to compel the plaintiff to answer them, after the issue to which they were material had been determined, and the investigation thereof by the grand jury finally concluded.

For the two reasons stated, the judgment of the superior court must be held to have been beyond its jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to notice other points made by the plaintiff. It may be contended that the conclusion here reached is at variance with the conclusion in the habeas corpus proceeding (In re Rogers, supra), wherein this court remanded the plaintiff, to suffer the imprisonment imposed by the judgment. We have already shown that such disposition of the habeas corpus matter is no bar to this proceeding. It was said in the opinion filed therein that it was not made to appear that "his answer to the question would either have a tendency to incriminate him or degrade his character." Such may have been the condition of affairs in that proceeding. The opinion does not show, and the record of the proceeding does not disclose, what was made to appear therein. Nor was anything said in the opinion as to the effect of a showing that the investigation of the charge against Chretien had been finally concluded prior to the making of the order requiring plaintiff to answer the questions. Regardless, however, of the question as to whether the habeas corpus matter was, upon the record then before the court, correctly decided, it is clear to us that upon the record now before the court the plaintiff is entitled to the relief sought.

The judgment of the superior court imposing a fine of $500 upon the plaintiff is annulled.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—INCORPORATION OF EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTION—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A person convicted of burglary in the second degree cannot complain on appeal that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, because it showed without contradiction that defendant was guilty of burglary in the first degree.

2. On appeal from a conviction for burglary, the bill of exceptions stated that witnesses for the people and for defendant were sworn and examined, and that the testimony included certain testimony set out in detail and relating solely to the time when the burglary was committed. One ground of the motion for new trial was that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. Held that, while it would be presumed that the bill of exceptions contained all the evidence as to the time of the commission of the crime, it could not be presumed that it contained all of the evidence submitted.

Charles Coulter was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. McCloskey, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary of the second degree, and adjudged to suffer imprisonment in the state prison for three years. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The motion for a new trial was made upon several grounds, one being "that the verdict is contrary to the evidence." This is the only ground relied on upon this appeal; counsel for defendant stating in his brief that the venue was not shown, the date of offense was not shown, the ownership of the property entered or of the property taken was not proven, the right of the defendant to take the articles was not questioned, and that no wrongful intent was shown. An examination of the bill of exceptions discloses the fact that the bill does not purport to state all the evidence. So far as applicable to the questions involved in this appeal, it is as follows, viz.: "The opening statement was made by the district attorney, and witnesses were then sworn and examined on behalf of the people, and the people rested. Witnesses for the defendant were then sworn and examined, and the defendant rested. Witnesses were then sworn and examined in rebuttal. Whereupon the testimony was closed. The testimony given during the trial included the following: Joseph Catania testified as follows: 'Q. About what time in the morning was it when you heard this glass crack, you think? A. It was just about exactly 10 minutes to 5.' The witness further testified that not more than two or three minutes after he saw the defendant put a wire through the window, pull out articles, and hand them to another man. George C. Douglass, the police officer who arrested the defendant, testified that it was about 25 minutes past 5 when Catania ran up to him and told him about the burglary. When the testimony was all in the cause was argued and submitted by the respective counsel."

The copy of the minutes of the trial contained in the judgment roll shows that three witnesses were sworn and examined on behalf of the people, twelve witnesses on behalf of the defendant, and five witnesses for the people on rebuttal. It is apparent that there was no attempt to state in the bill of exceptions the evidence given upon the trial, and that the only object of inserting the particular portion set out was to point out some particular error relied on, and claimed to be an error by reason of that particular testimony. A bill of exceptions must contain so much of the evidence only as is necessary to present the questions of law upon which the exceptions were taken (section 1175, Pen. Code), and where it is made to appear affirmatively that only a portion of the material evidence is included, and that there has been no attempt to state anything about the nature of the omitted evidence or its effect, it is clear that the portion inserted is so inserted for another purpose than that of supporting the claim that the verdict is contrary to the evidence in some other respect than that as to which the inserted evidence is applicable.

It will be observed that the inserted evidence is directed solely to the question of time; the substance thereof being that it was not later than a few minutes after 5 o'clock a. m. when the burglary was committed. It may well be that, under the authorities, it will be presumed that the inserted evidence was all the evidence introduced on the question as to the time of the commission of the offense, and, therefore, as to whether the burglary was of the first or second degree. The crime being alleged to have been committed on the 14th day of February, 1902, this evidence showed a burglary committed between sunset and sunrise, which was a burglary of the first degree, while the verdict was that the defendant was guilty of burglary of the second degree only. The only claim really presented by this bill of exceptions is that by reason of the fact that all of the evidence given upon the question of time showed that the defendant was guilty of the more serious offense of burglary of the first degree, instead of the lesser offense of burglary of the second degree, of which he was convicted, the verdict was "contrary to law or evidence." It is well settled that a defendant cannot complain where the determination of his case was more favorable to him than the evidence warranted (People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 303, 47 Pac. 128, and cases there cited); but we can conceive of no other reason for the statement that the evidence given included the portion inserted as to time than the desire to present on this appeal the question as to whether the evidence as to time was such as to render the verdict contrary to the evidence. We adhere to the rule declared in People v. Muhlner, supra, and other cases, and can therefore see no reason why the fact that the evidence as to time was as stated in the bill of exceptions renders the verdict contrary to the evidence.

The claim of defendant's counsel now appears to be that where a defendant has specified as one of the grounds of his motion for a new trial that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, without specifying either in his motion or in his bill of exceptions the particulars wherein the evidence is claimed to be insufficient, this not being necessary in criminal cases, it will be conclusively presumed on appeal that the bill of exceptions contains the substance of the evidence as to every fact put in issue by the information or indictment and the plea of not guilty, unless it be stated that facts concerning which no evidence is inserted were proven, or that evidence was introduced tending to prove them. The true rule does not, we are satisfied, go to the extent claimed by counsel. Where the trial court denies the motion of a defendant for a new trial, it devolves on him, if he wishes to have the action of the court reviewed on appeal, to present the draft of a bill of exceptions purporting, at least, to contain a fair statement of the evidence material to the determination of the questions desired to be determined on appeal. Although he may have specified in his motion insufficiency of the evidence as one of his grounds for a new trial, there is no law requiring him to further press this ground on appeal, after the ruling against him by the trial court, and in the great majority of cases it would be useless to so do, in view of the well-settled rule that the appellate court will not disturb the action of the trial court as to matters concerning which there was simply a conflict of evidence. If, therefore, notwithstanding the statement of that ground in his motion, he should, after the denial of his motion, present a bill of exceptions containing absolutely no evidence, and the bill of exceptions presented to the appellate court contained no evidence, or any reference thereto, except a statement that witnesses were sworn and examined, there would be no presumption that there was, in fact, no evidence given on the trial. The presumption would rather be that the defendant had abandoned this particular ground for a new trial, and that all reference to the evidence had therefore been intentionally omitted. The presumptions are all in favor of the correctness of the action of the trial court, and it is not to be presumed that such court has refused to allow the insertion of such evidence as the defendant may have desired, so far as the same is necessary to the determination of any question sought to be presented on the appeal.

It would not be incumbent on the district attorney, in such a case, to propose amendments in order to make the bill show the evidence. It is not for him to prepare a bill of exceptions for the defendant. His duty is confined to proposing such amendments in regard to the matters set forth in the bill as will make the bill show the truth as to those matters. And so, when the bill proposed by the defendant in terms purports to give the evidence as to only one matter or issue out of many, and is expressly confined to that purpose, as we think it is in the case at bar, there can be no presumption, arising from the absence from the bill of evidence on the other issues, that there was, in fact, no evidence thereon. In such a case the presumption is only as to the completeness of the record as to the evidence upon the particular matter to which, by its terms, the bill is limited. If, on the other hand, the proposed bill can be said to fairly purport to give the substance of the evidence in the case, or to state what the same tended to show, the matter of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict is presented, and the district attorney must see that the bill truly presents the actual condition as to the evidence on all the issues; for, under the authorities, it will be presumed on appeal that the bill of exceptions does contain all the evidence, even though there be no statement therein to the effect that no other evidence was given. The true rule, we are satisfied, goes no further than this. In this state it is not essential that the bill should, in terms, state that the evidence contained therein was all the evidence given. It is enough to raise the presumption that it does contain all the evidence, that the bill on its face fairly purports to state the evidence or its effect. But there can be no good reason for a rule establishing a conclusive presumption to the effect that a bill of exceptions does contain all the evidence in a case, simply because insufficiency of evidence was one of the grounds specified in the motion for a new trial, where the bill affirmatively shows that the fact is otherwise, and that it does not contain all the evidence, and the rule invoked by defendant's counsel has never been held to include such a case.

All that was said in the three cases principally relied upon by defendant was said with reference to cases very different from this, and the language used therein by this court must be read in connection with the facts of those cases. In People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319, it fully appears from the opinion that the bill of exceptions did purport to contain the evidence; for it stated that the several witnesses testified in substance as therein stated. There was nothing in the bill from which it could be reasonably inferred that there was other evidence. It was in reply to the contention of the Attorney General that, in the absence of an affirmative statement that there was no other evidence, it must be presumed, in accordance with the rule that formerly prevailed in several states, that there was such evidence sufficient to support the verdict, that the opinion of the court was directed; and the language there used cannot be held applicable to a case where the bill affirmatively shows that it does not state all the evidence, or the effect thereof. In People v. Buckley, 116 Cal. 146, 47 Pac. 1009, the record shows that the bill did purport to give the substance of the testimony of each witness, and the statement of evidence constituted over 75 pages of the transcript, ending with the words, "This closed the testimony." In People v. Griffith, 122 Cal. 214, 54 Pac. 725, over 50 pages of the transcript consisted of evidence, and it was stated at the end that "this was all the evidence." These cases bear no analogy to the case at bar. This is a case where the record shows affirmatively that there was evidence, presumably material, that is not contained in the bill; and in support of the action of the trial court it must further be presumed that such evidence, so omitted, was sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury. The mere fact that the evidence as to the time of the commission of the offense was as stated in the bill, which is, under our views, the only point made by the insertion of the portion of the evidence contained therein, would not warrant the granting of a new trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. Aside from the special importance of this appeal to the defendant, the case is of general importance on account of the question of practice which it involves—a question destined apparently never to reach a definite settlement in this court. There is no doubt that a defendant in a criminal case, who has moved for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, is entitled to a reversal of the order denying his motion, when it appears by the record on appeal that there was a total failure of proof as to any material allegation of the indictment or information. But there has long been a question as to the method by which the record in such case can be made to show the failure of proof. In civil cases a party moving for a new trial on the ground that the verdict or other decision is contrary to the evidence (except when he moves on the minutes of the court) must prepare a statement or bill of exceptions as a foundation for the motion, and must specify therein the particular findings, or, in case of a general verdict, the particular issues, as to which he claims that the decision is contrary to the evidence. If he neglects to make such specification, his motion as to this ground fails; but if he makes a sufficient specification, it devolves upon the party resisting the motion to see to it that the proposed statement or bill of exceptions is, if necessary, so amended before settlement as fairly to show all the evidence in support of the finding or verdict. And on appeal the presumption is that there was no evidence given at the trial upon the controverted issues, except that which is contained in the settled statement or bill of exceptions. The propriety, convenience, and economy of this rule in civil cases is universally recognized, and there is no reason why the same rule should not obtain in criminal cases, so far as it can be made applicable in view of the different order of procedure prescribed in moving for a new trial. In civil cases the motion is made after judgment; in criminal cases it must be made before judgment and without any settled statement or bill of exceptions, so that the only specification of particular allegations respecting which it is claimed that the proof has failed are such as counsel may make in the course of his oral argument.

It would have been a wise provision if the statute had required the defendant, in proposing a bill of exceptions to the order denying his motion, to specify the particular allegation or allegations of the indictment or information which he claimed to be unsupported by the evidence; for then the district attorney would have had the same guide in proposing amendments to the bill that the resisting party has in civil cases, and the justice and propriety of applying to the settled bill the same presumption that attaches in civil cases would have been unquestioned. But unfortunately no such provision has ever been made, and, since the verdict may be attacked in this court upon any ground the defendant may select, it devolves upon the district attorney, according to one line of decisions, to see that the proposed bill is, if necessary, so amended as to contain some evidence, if evidence there was, sufficient to support the verdict upon every material issue. These decisions, it will be seen, bring the practice into close analogy with the practice in civil cases, and are founded upon the doctrine that, when the motion for a new trial is based upon an alleged failure of the evidence, the presumption here is, and ought to be, that, if the settled bill of exceptions contains no evidence tending to prove a material allegation of the indictment, then that there was no such evidence. The principle of these decisions is the same that in the law of evidence imposes the burden of proof upon the party holding the affirmative of the issue. Another line of decisions reverses this principle in its application to this particular matter of procedure, and imposes upon the defendant the task of demonstrating by the record the negative proposition that there was no evidence to support one or more of the material allegations of the indictment or information, and is based upon the doctrine that in this court the presumption is, and ought to be, that there was abundant evidence given at the trial to support the verdict, although none is contained in the record, unless it is affirmatively shown by the bill of exceptions that it contains all the evidence.

It may be conceded that the language of the statute affords as much support to either of these conflicting lines of decision as it does to the other, and it may also be true that either rule, if consistently maintained, would protect the rights of defendants. But when counsel, in reliance upon recent and deliberate decisions of the court reviewing and commenting upon previous and conflicting decisions, has brought himself within the protection of the rule first above stated, we are not justified in denying his appeal upon the ground that the bill of exceptions does not respond to the test which we have discarded. It is not, however, on account of the particular injustice which in my opinion this defendant has suffered in consequence of the changed views of the court, that I feel compelled to give full expression to the reasons for my dissent. The more important consideration, as regards the public, is that in a mere matter of procedure, where a rule once established should be adhered to unless its enforcement is found to involve grave inconvenience, we are by this decision discarding a plain, simple, and convenient rule, and substituting in its place one difficult of comprehension, more difficult of application, productive of increased trouble and delay in the disposition of criminal causes, and of increased expense to the counties of the state. For what is the test now prescribed for determining whether there was a failure of evidence as to a material allegation of the charge? "It is not essential," the court say, "that the bill should, in terms, state that the evidence contained therein was all the evidence given. It is enough to raise the presumption that it does contain all the evidence that the bill on its face fairly purports to state the evidence or its effect." This, then, is the test of sufficiency for future cases. The old rule which required the bill to show expressly that it contained all the evidence—a rule which at least had the merit of simplicity and certainty—is abandoned, and in its place is substituted the requirement that the bill must, on its face, fairly purport to state the evidence or its effect. But when will a bill fairly purport to state the evidence or its effect? The criterion proposed is as uncertain as the length of the chancellor's thumb, and if a bill stops short of an explicit statement that it contains all the material evidence, there will be varying opinions, according to the composition of the court, as to what it fairly purports to contain. Some way or other, however, the bill must be such as to induce the presumption that it contains all the evidence, and since counsel generally prefer to leave nothing to chance that can easily be made secure, the practice hereafter will be to put in all the evidence, in order to insure the insertion at the end of the bill of the old formula, "The foregoing was all the material evidence introduced at the trial," or some statement equally explicit. In short, we shall have fallen back into the old rut, from which an adherence to the decision in People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319, would have extricated us, and we shall have hereafter the same inordinately bulky records that have afflicted the court for so many years, with all their attendant inconvenience to the parties and expense to the counties of the state for copying, printing, etc., and the consequent delay in bringing up the record for review.

And what is the reason to be gathered from the opinion of the court for this abandonment of a plain and simple rule, based upon a reasonable presumption, in favor of a rule so vague and uncertain, and necessarily involving the mischievous consequences which years of experience have taught us are entailed by a practice based upon the opposite presumption?

Partly, it would seem, the present opinion of the court, like the opinion in department, is based upon the assumption that the bill of exceptions as it appears in the record before us is purely the work of defendant's counsel. It is spoken of as his bill, and its assumed deficiencies, attributed in the department opinion to an attempt on his part to throw upon the district attorney the labor of putting into the bill the evidence which it was his duty to have set forth in the draft as proposed by him, are now accounted for on the supposition (unwarranted, I think) that it was prepared for the sole purpose of presenting a point which counsel have never made—the point, that is to say, that a conviction of burglary in the second degree cannot be upheld in view of testimony showing that it was committed between sunset and sunrise.

It ought not to be necessary to call attention to the fact that a settled bill of exceptions is the result of the joint efforts of counsel for defendant, the district attorney, and the trial judge. It may contain no part of the bill as proposed by the defendant. It may contain more or less than the defendant's draft. It is not what he states, but what the court states, to have been the evidence bearing upon the several exceptions reserved. But, conceding that it may have been the intention of counsel to urge in this court the absurdly untenable proposition with reference to which the court supposes the bill was framed, it still does not follow that it was the only point upon which he was relying for a reversal. On the contrary, the district attorney and the trial judge were plainly informed by the only means known to the law that he was also relying upon the point that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and if he wholly failed to set out any of the evidence which tended to support the verdict he was clearly within his right in omitting to do so, according to the very latest decisions of this court bearing upon the point.

In People v. Fisher, 51 Cal. 319, in which the court considered and construed the provisions of the Penal Code relative to the settlement of bills of exception, the ground of the decision was thus stated: "The presumption in this court is that there was no evidence introduced in support of a fact in issue, unless the bill of exceptions contains the substance of the evidence introduced to prove the fact, or states that the fact was proven, or that evidence was introduced tending to prove it." And the rule based upon this statement of the presumption attaching to bills of exception was laid down in accordance with its principle—the principle, that is to say, which in the law of evidence imposes the burden of proof upon the party holding the affirmative of the issue. In conformity to this principle it was declared to be the duty of the district attorney, when the ground, or one of the grounds, of the motion for a new trial was insufficiency of the evidence, to have a statement inserted in the bill of exceptions that the facts as to which there was no controversy were proven, with the substance of the evidence as to the controverted facts, or sufficient of the evidence to establish them prima facie, which is all that is necessary in a criminal case to prevent a reversal in this court. And the opinion of the court pointed out how easily, and in what little space, a perfect case for the people could be put into the record if the case had, in fact, been proved. The opinion of the court recognized the fact, familiar to all, that the controversy in regard to the sufficiency of the evidence is usually confined to some one or two facts—the venue, for instance—and that as to other facts it is sufficient to state in three words that they were proven, while as to the controverted facts it properly devolves upon the district attorney to have inserted in the bill enough of his evidence to sustain the verdict. It was plain, also, that the practice thus enjoined, if conformed to, would not only shorten the statement of the evidence and lessen the expense of copying and printing, but would lighten the task of the district attorney and the trial judge, as well as the counsel for the defendant. This wise and commendable decision was followed in People v. English, 52 Cal. 211, and then it appears to have been forgotten. A new court came in with the new Constitution, and People v. Fisher and People v. English, without citation or reference, were silently overruled by a reversion to the old rule as stated in People v. Williams, 45 Cal. 25, and quoted in the department opinion in this case. See People v. Leong Sing, 77 Cal. 117, 19 Pac. 254; People v. Carroll, 80 Cal. 153, 22 Pac. 129; People v. Tonielli, 81 Cal. 279, 22 Pac. 678. But when the attention of the present court was again called to the Fisher and English Cases, and to the manifest advantages of the rule of practice which they enjoined, we gave them our unequivocal indorsement. See People v. Buckley, 116 Cal. 146, 47 Pac. 1009, and People v. Griffith, 122 Cal. 214, 54 Pac. 725.

An attempt is made in the opinion of the court to distinguish these cases by arguing that the bills of exception, as contained in the several records, covered a large number of pages, and fairly purported to contain all the evidence. But this ignores the principle of those decisions. If they had been based upon the doctrine here asserted, that the bill must demonstrate that there was no evidence given at the trial to prove the material allegations of the charge, it would have been necessary for the court to dispose of the contention of the Attorney General that the record did not purport fairly, or otherwise, to contain all the evidence. It will be seen, however, by reference to the several opinions, that they put this argument aside as having no bearing upon a conclusion founded solely upon the doctrine that, when the ground of the motion for a new trial is failure of proof, it is the duty of the district attorney to make the record show that he proved his case, if in truth he did prove it. The difference between the record in this case and the records in the Fisher, English, Buckley, and Griffith Cases does not, therefore, constitute a ground of distinction. They were decided upon a principle which had no regard to this supposed difference—a principle utterly inconsistent with the present decision, which affirms a conviction upon a record which admittedly contains no evidence to sustain the material allegations of the charge.

It remains only to notice the point, so strongly insisted upon in the department opinion and restated in the present opinion of the court, that the defendant cannot be allowed in cases like this to shirk the duty of setting forth in his draft of the proposed bill the substance of the evidence given at the trial, and thereby impose upon the district attorney the burthen of preparing a bill for him. This ground of the decision totally ignores what is so clearly shown in the opinion of the court in People v. Fisher, that the task thus imposed upon the district attorney is the lightest possible. There is, in fact, no course that the defendant could possibly pursue which would impose so little labor on the district attorney and trial judge in a case of this character as to propose a bill of exceptions containing not one word of the evidence given at the trial. It would save them the reading and comparing and correcting of the long and redundant statement to which we are accustomed, requiring hours of their time and attention, and impose upon them the comparatively trivial task of drafting an amendment which could easily, in any ordinary case, be compressed into a single page of manuscript in five minutes' time. Take the present case as an illustration, and suppose the defendant's draft to the bill to have been as meager as the settled bill in the record. It could have been read through almost at a glance, and if in truth the charge was proved, as alleged in the information, an amendment in the following words would have made an invulnerable case: Geo. H. Kahn, a witness for the people, testified: On the 13th and 14th of February last I was the proprietor of the store known as 201 Kearny street, in the city and county of San Francisco, and owned the articles in the show window. During the night of February 13th-14th that show window was broken and various articles stolen therefrom (describing them). Joseph Catania, a witness for the people, testified: On the morning of February 14, 1902, I was standing near the show window of the store at 201 Kearny street in this city, and at about 5 o'clock heard the glass crack. A minute or two later I saw this defendant put in a wire, abstract several articles, and hand them to another man. The two then ran away.

Compare the labor of the district attorney in preparing this amendment, and of the judge in acting upon it, with the task that would have been imposed upon them if the course enjoined upon counsel for defendant by the opinion of the court had been pursued—if, in other words, the substance of the testimony of the 20 witnesses, shown by the minutes of the court to have testified at the trial, had been fully or substantially set forth in the proposed bill. And compare the size of the record, as so amended, with what it would have probably been if all the evidence had been brought up. Compare it, for example, with the record in the recently decided case of Doshia Nolan, 77 Pac. 774, a common instance, in which 115 pages of the printed record are devoted to the cross-examination of a single witness—a cross-examination full of repetitions, and which for every practical or useful purpose might have been so condensed as to cover 5 pages at the outside. And it is to be remembered that every unnecessary page allowed to go into a bill of exceptions costs the county a dollar for printing for no purpose except to cumber the record and delay the hearing. It may be that this defendant was shown to be guilty, and that a reversal of the judgment on this appeal would have enabled him to escape deserved punishment; but an affirmance of the judgment in his case is dearly purchased at the cost of unsettling a rule of practice which experience has demonstrated to be as useful and convenient and economical as it is simple and definite.

Supplemental Opinion.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The dissenting opinion in this case having been prepared some time after the filing of the majority opinion, it would seem proper to notice briefly one or two suggestions made thereby. It may be freely admitted that it is most important, as regards the public, that in a matter of procedure a rule once established should be adhered to. It was attempted to be shown in the majority opinion that it has never been held that a presumption to the effect that a bill of exceptions contains all the evidence will obtain, where there is an affirmative showing on the face of the bill that it does not contain all the evidence, or any statement of the substance thereof. The cases cited, both in the majority and dissenting opinions, were all cases where there was nothing upon the face of the bill to indicate that it was not a complete statement as to the effect of all the evidence given on the trial, and the presumption that it was a complete statement, therefore, existed. Whatever was said by the court in those cases was said with reference to the facts then before the court. If, however, the bill itself affirmatively shows the fact to be that it does not contain a statement as to the effect of all the material evidence, there can be no reason why the appellate court should declare, in the face of the affirmative statement to the contrary, that it must be held that there was no other evidence. We can hardly believe that if the bill in this case had declared "there was other evidence given on the trial material to the issues involved" it would have been asserted by any one that a presumption to the contrary would still have obtained, and yet such bill in effect does so state.

Nor is there anything uncertain in the rule laid down in the majority opinion to the effect that it is essential to the existence of the presumption invoked that the bill should on its face fairly purport to state the evidence or its effect. What is meant by the expression "fairly purport to state the evidence or its effect" is amply illustrated by the record in the cases relied upon in the dissenting opinion. If there is apparent any attempt to state the effect of the evidence given on the trial—that is, all the evidence—it must be held that the bill fairly purports to state all the evidence, and the presumption will obtain; but where, by its terms, the bill is limited to the statement of only a portion of the material evidence, as here, where it simply states that "testimony given during the trial included the following," it cannot be said that the bill "fairly purports" to give all the evidence or its effect.

Nor can we see any force in the suggestion that the decision in this case will result in increasing the size of transcripts on appeal. Experience has demonstrated that some attorneys always insist upon unnecessarily long and elaborate bills of exceptions. This has been the fact at all times, and whatever the rule of practice governing bills of exceptions. The record in the Doshia Nolan Case, 77 Pac. 774, referred to in the dissenting opinion, is but a sample of the record in many cases brought to this court while the rule contended for by the dissenting opinion must, if ever, have been in force, and what is said regarding that case shows that the supposed rule did not operate to prevent unwieldy records on appeal. It has never been necessary, and it will not be necessary under the decision in this case, for a defendant, desiring to present the contention of insufficiency of the evidence, to state all the evidence, word for word, as it fell from the mouths of witnesses. As to those matters concerning which there is no dispute, the briefest statement as to the effect of the evidence will be, as is well shown by the dissenting opinion, all that is requisite; and as to the one or two matters concerning which the dispute exists the statement should be sufficiently elaborate to show the facts. This has always been, and will continue to be, the rule. It is the duty of the judge settling the bill to strike therefrom all unnecessary matter, and to see that it is no more lengthy than the necessities of the case require; and we know of no other remedy in those cases where attorneys persist in proposing for insertion matters unnecessary to a determination of the questions desired to be presented on the appeal.

PRESENTING FRAUDULENT CLAIM—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment under Pen. Code, § 72, making it an offense to, with intent to defraud, present for allowance to a county or city officer any false or fraudulent claim, is insufficient, in alleging merely that defendant presented a certain false and fraudulent claim, without alleging wherein it was fraudulent, to satisfy sections 950–952, providing that an indictment shall set forth the acts constituting the offense, and the particular circumstances of the offense charged.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Albert B. Mahony was indicted for presenting a fraudulent claim. A demurrer to the indictment was sustained, and the people appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People. Geo. D. Collins, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by the people from a judgment in favor of defendant, sustaining and allowing his demurrer to an indictment found and presented against him by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco; the grounds of demurrer specified, in addition to want of facts to constitute a public offense, being that the indictment did not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952 of the Penal Code.

The superior court, apparently being of the opinion that the objection on which the demurrer was allowed might be avoided in a new indictment, directed that the case be submitted again "to the grand jury now in session," but the attorney for the people preferred to stand upon the indictment already presented, and took this appeal.

The indictment was based upon the provisions of section 72 of the Penal Code, and alleged that the defendant did, "with intent to defraud the city and county of San Francisco," present for allowance to the auditor of said city and county "a certain false and fraudulent claim, bill, account, and writing, in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Co. Clerk F. No. 170.

"Registry Stamp."

It further alleged "that said Albert B. Mahony then and there well knew that said false and fraudulent claim * * * was then and there false and fraudulent." There was no allegation of any fact tending to show wherein the claim set forth was in any way false or fraudulent; the allegations in this respect, in addition to setting forth a copy of a claim in favor of one Davidson, which was valid upon its face, and certified as correct by the defendant as county clerk, being in the general language of the statute prescribing the offense. The falsity or fraudulent character of this claim, if it was in fact false or fraudulent, arose from some fact or facts not alleged, and concerning which the indictment furnished absolutely no information. An examination of the copy of the claim set forth shows that this apparently valid claim may have been false in any one of many ways, and fraudulent for any one of a great variety of reasons. Nothing, however, but the conclusion that it was both false and fraudulent, is alleged; and the defendant, who must be presumed to be innocent of any crime, was left entirely in the dark as to any facts upon which the allegations of falsity and fraud were based.

It is urged in support of the indictment that it is generally sufficient to describe the offense substantially in the language of the statute. This is undoubtedly the general rule, but, as has been said, such rule simply means "that, when the statute defines or describes the acts which shall constitute a particular offense, it is sufficient in an indictment to describe those acts in the language employed in the statute; applying them, of course, concretely to the person charged." People v. Ward, 110 Cal. 369, 372, 42 Pac. 894. In such cases the statutory description gives to the accused sufficient notice of the charge against him. In the vast majority of cases the statute declaring the public offense does so define or describe the acts constituting it, but in many cases it does not; and to these cases is applicable the qualification to the general rule described by Mr. Justice Harlan, in U. S. v. Simmons, 96 U. S. 360, 24 L. Ed. 819, as a qualification, "fundamental in the law of criminal procedure, that the accused must be apprised by the indictment with reasonable certainty of the nature of the accusation against him, to the end that he may prepare his defense, and plead the judgment as a bar to any subsequent prosecution for the same offense." Our Penal Code provides that the indictment or information must contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended" (section 950, subd. 2); that it must be direct and certain as regards "the particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense" (section 952, subd. 3); and that it is sufficient if, among other things, the act charged as the offense is set forth "in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." These provisions but recognize the principle universally recognized in civilized countries that one accused of crime shall be allowed to know the charge against him, so that he may have an opportunity to present his defense thereto, if any he has. See People v. Palmer, 53 Cal. 615; People v. Ward, 110 Cal. 369, 42 Pac. 894. The qualification to the general rule is peculiarly applicable in cases where fraud is an element of the offense, and the statutory definition of the crime simply includes the general term "fraud" or "fraudulently," without any description of the acts which shall constitute the fraud. This is necessarily so, in view of the fact that fraud is but an inference of law from certain facts. This was clearly set forth by this court, in bank, in the case of People v. McKenna, 81 Cal. 158, 22 Pac. 488, where the defendant was charged, in the language of the statute defining the offense, with having defrauded one of personal property "by false and fraudulent representations and pretenses." After stating that fraud is merely an inference of law from certain facts, that the question as to whether a thing was done fraudulently is a matter of law, and that an allegation of fraud in general terms presents no issuable fact, the court said: "It is a sound principle that an indictment charging fraud of any kind should aver with particularity the facts relied upon to show fraud. Many of the niceties and technicalities which existed under former methods of pleading are not allowed to prevail under the provisions of our Code, but the rule still exists that an indictment must be certain and clear as to the particular circumstances of the offense charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete offense (Pen. Code, § 952, subd. 3)." In People v. Neil, 91 Cal. 465, 27 Pac. 760, it was held by this court, in bank, following People v. McKenna, supra, that an information charging one, in the language of section 45, Pen. Code, with fraudulently voting when not entitled to vote, was insufficient as against demurrer. In the opinion in that case, Hirschfield's Case, 13 Blatchf. 331, Fed. Cas. No. 15,372, was approvingly cited, wherein it was held that a charge that one had fraudulently registered, although in the words of the statute, was insufficient; and it was said that something more must be stated, in order to give the accused any proper notice of the charge which he was to meet, it being impossible for him to determine from the charge what he would be required to show in his defense.

These decisions of this court are in line with the decisions generally on the question of the necessity of alleging the facts upon which a charge of fraud is based, and are apparently conceded by learned counsel for the people to be correct. It is sought, however, to distinguish them from the case at bar, but we can see no distinction material to the question under discussion. It was essential to the commission of the offense sought to be charged by the indictment before us that the claim presented by defendant for allowance was in fact false or fraudulent. It was alleged that it was both false and fraudulent. The allegation that it was fraudulent was the allegation of a mere conclusion of law, assumedly based upon certain facts not disclosed by the indictment. What the extraneous facts claimed by the district attorney to render it fraudulent, and alleged by the indictment to have been known to defendant, were, the indictment fails to show, and the defendant was left in absolute ignorance as to the particular charge he would be compelled to meet in this connection. It may be that the claim itself is set forth with sufficient certainty to enable the defendant to plead a judgment on the merits in bar of any subsequent prosecution, but this is only one object of the rule requiring the acts claimed to constitute the offense to be sufficiently set forth; the other equally important object being to apprise the accused, with reasonable certainty, of the nature of the accusation against him, to the end that he may prepare his defense. The rule stated by Mr. Justice Temple in Capuro v. Builders' Ins. Co., 39 Cal. 125, as applicable to civil cases, viz., that, while the party alleging fraud is not required to allege with minuteness all the particulars and circumstances which constitute the evidence of the alleged fraud, he must make the charge with sufficient distinctness to enable his adversary to come prepared with his evidence upon the general questions of fraud which will be raised, is applicable as well to criminal cases. No other rule would be consonant with a due regard for the liberty of the individual and the protection of property.

We are satisfied that where it is sought to charge one with the presentation of a fraudulent claim, under section 72, Pen. Code, the particular acts which make the claim fraudulent should be so alleged as to make the fraud appear upon the face of the indictment. See, in this connection, United States v. Goggin (C. C.) 1 Fed. 49.

It is unnecessary to determine whether the allegation that the claim was false, as well as fraudulent, adds anything to the indictment. The particular objection that we are considering is not that the indictment does not state facts constituting a public offense, but that it does not conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, 952, Pen. Code, in that it does not sufficiently set forth "the acts constituting the offense," and "the particular circumstances of the offense charged," so as to enable the defendant to know what was the precise charge against him, and to prepare his defense thereto. Being advised by the indictment that the people charge that the claim was fraudulent, as well as false, even if there be any distinction between these terms as used in connection with a claim such as is set forth in such indictment, he is certainly entitled, upon objection made by demurrer, to know with reasonable certainty the facts relied upon by the people as constituting the alleged fraud. We do not wish to be understood as holding that it would be sufficient, in alleging an offense under section 72 of the Penal Code, to allege simply that a claim was false, without alleging wherein it was false. It is very easy for the pleader to set forth specifically wherein a claim presented for allowance is claimed to be erroneous, and it certainly would be more in accord with the rule that we have discussed as applicable to this case that this should be done.

The Attorney General, in support of this indictment, relies almost entirely upon the decision of this court, in department, in People v. Carolan, 71 Cal. 195, 12 Pac. 52. The question here involved received little consideration in the opinion in that case; being disposed of by the simple statement that the indictment was sufficient—charging the offense, as it did, in the language of section 72, Pen. Code. No authority was cited in support of this conclusion, and so much of the record of that case as is now accessible indicates that no authorities therein were cited to the court. The conclusion therein reached is so opposed to later decisions rendered by this court in bank, and also to fundamental principles recognized by the decisions generally, that it cannot be now accepted as authority.

The judge of the superior court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the indictment. The judgment is affirmed.

In re SMITH'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,992.)*

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—SHARE OF CHILD BORN AFTER EXECUTION—SPECIFIC AND RESIDUARY LEGATEES.

1. Civ. Code, § 1306, provides that when a testator has a child born after the making of his will, which is not provided for or mentioned in the will, such child shall succeed to the same portion of the testator's real and personal property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate. Section 1308 provides that in such case, if there is no property undisposed of by the will, the share of the post testamentary child shall be taken "from all the devisees or legatees in proportion to the value they may respectively receive under the will, unless the obvious intention of the testator in relation to some specific devise or bequest * * * would thereby be defeated," in which case such devise or bequest may be exempted from such apportionment. A married woman, having one child, made a will by which she left all of her property to her husband during his life, and then to the child by name. It also provided that the sum of $125 per month should be paid to the mother of testatrix during her lifetime. Six days after the making of the will testatrix gave birth to a son, and a few days later she died. Held, that the one-third share of the estate which descended to the son under the provisions of section 1306 should be taken in equal proportions from the specific legacy to the mother and the residuary bequests to the husband and daughter; that there was nothing either in the language of the will or the circumstances under which it was executed which evidenced an "obvious intention" on the part of the testatrix that the specific legacy should be exempted.

Appeal by Ella J. Chamberlain from a decree making partial distribution of the estate of Ella Roberta Wilson Smith, deceased. Affirmed.

Wright & Lukens, for appellant. Garret W. McEnerney, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by Ella J. Chamberlain, the mother of deceased, from a decree of partial distribution, refusing to award her $125 per month for the period of her life, and awarding her only $83.33⅓ per month for that period. The will of the deceased was as follows:

"I, Ella Roberta Wilson Smith, being of sane and sound mind do hereby declare this my last will, and do hereby give and bequeath all of which I may die possessed, to my beloved husband to be for his benefit and maintenance during his life. At his death to go to my beloved daughter Roberta Genevieve Smith.

"To my mother I desire shall be paid $125.00 per month as long as she shall live.

"Ella Roberta Wilson Smith.

"February 1st, 1903."

Six days after the making of this will, the deceased gave birth to a son, and on February 27, 1903, 20 days after the birth of such son, she died, leaving surviving her husband and mother, and her two children, Roberta Genevieve and Randolph Wilson, the post testamentary son. She left estate, consisting of personal property valued at $200, and real property valued at $99,175, all of which was separate property. The net income from this property was $300 per month. No part of the annuity to the mother having been paid, she petitioned the court in probate for a decree directing the administrator with the will annexed to pay and deliver to her the arrears of the said annuity at the rate of $125 per month, as provided in the will. The court decreed that she was entitled to receive only $83.33⅓ per month, and ordered this amount paid to her from March 27, 1903, "so long as she shall live," and she has appealed, claiming that under the provisions of the will she is entitled to $125 per month.

*Rehearing denied November 7, 1904.

The question presented by this appeal is as to the effect upon the annuity to the mother of the birth of the post testamentary child, in view of certain provisions of our Civil Code. Section 1306, Civ. Code, is as follows: "Whenever a testator has a child born after the making of his will, either in his lifetime or after his death, and dies leaving such child unprovided for by any settlement, and neither provided for nor in any way mentioned in his will, the child succeeds to the same portion of the testator's real and personal property that he would have succeeded to if the testator had died intestate." It is not disputed that the post testamentary child comes within the terms of this section and is entitled to the benefit of its provisions. Therefore, subject to the provisions of section 1308, Civ. Code, and subject to administration, the post testamentary child succeeded immediately, by operation of law, to an undivided one-third of the property of the testatrix. As to such portion, the deceased is to be regarded as having died intestate (Smith v. Olmstead, 88 Cal. 582, 26 Pac. 521, 12 L. R. A. 46, 22 Am. St. Rep. 336), and, so far as such child is concerned, the will is to be considered as not existing.

The effect of this being to deprive both the husband and the daughter of one-third of the portions attempted to be given them by the will, the question is as to whether the annuity to the mother must also be cut down one-third. Section 1308, Civ. Code, provides that: "When any share of the estate of a testator is assigned to a child born after the making of a will, or to a child, or the issue of a child, omitted in the will, as hereinbefore mentioned, the same must first be taken from the estate not disposed of by the will, if any; if that is not sufficient so much as may be necessary must be taken from all the devisees or legatees, in proportion to the value they may respectively receive under the will, unless the obvious intention of the testator in relation to some specific devise or bequest, or other provision in the will, would thereby be defeated; in such case, such specific devise, legacy, or provision may be exempted from such apportionment, and a different apportionment, consistent with the intention of the testator, may be adopted." Concededly, the annuity here involved is a legacy. Civ. Code, § 1357. There is no estate not disposed of by will. The legacy to the mother of deceased must therefore contribute, in proportion to its value, to make up the share of the child, unless the obvious intention of the testatrix in relation to such legacy, as distinguished from her intention as to the other dispositions made by the will, would thereby be defeated. No such obvious intention is apparent from the words of the will. As stated by this court in Estate of Ross, 140 Cal. 282, 293, 73 Pac. 976, 980, "The general rule announced by the section (section 1308, Civ. Code) is that all devises and legacies must contribute in proportion to value, and that the exemption of a specific devise is only warranted when the obvious intention of the testator in relation to it would be defeated if contribution was required." By the will in that case, a lot of land was specifically devised to a stepdaughter, and, with the exception of two nominal legacies, the residue of the property was bequeathed to two daughters, and it was held that the pretermitted child of a deceased child succeeded to an undivided one-third of the whole of the property, including that specially devised, and that the specific and residuary bequests must alike contribute in proportion to value. The mere fact, then, that one legacy is specific, as is claimed by appellant for the annuity here involved, and that another legacy is in its nature residuary, does not show the obvious intention contemplated by section 1308, Civ. Code. Under that section all legacies and devises, whatever their character, must contribute in such a case, unless the obvious intention of the testator in relation to some particular legacy or devise would be thereby defeated. By her will the deceased purported, in terms, to dispose of all her property. She must be assumed to have had in mind all her property and its condition, and to have distributed the same among the objects of her bounty in such proportions as she thought proper. The amount fixed upon by her for her mother must be deemed to have been so fixed, not only in accordance with her views as to her mother's needs, but in accordance with her views as to what, under all the circumstances, including the needs of all, would be a fair division among those near and dear to her. There is absolutely nothing in the language of the will to indicate any other intention on the part of the testatrix than that, the husband holding during his life all the property of which she died possessed, and her daughter taking all of the same absolutely upon his death, the mother should receive $125 per month therefrom during her life. These were the proportions deemed just by the testatrix. The intention that the portions of the estate thus attempted to be given to the father and daughter were to be enjoyed by them unimpaired was as obvious as the intention that the mother should have the full amount of her legacy. There is nothing to indicate that the legacy to the mother was, under all circumstances, to be kept intact, in the event that the bequests to the father and daughter became in part ineffectual. So much for the language of the will.

Appellant claims, however, that the circumstances under which the will was made must be taken into consideration in determining the intention of the testatrix, and invokes the provisions of section 1318, Civ. Code, which declares that "in case of uncertainty arising upon the face of a will, as to the application of any of its provisions, the testator's intention is to be ascertained from the words of the will taking into view the circumstances under which it was made exclusive of his oral declarations." Assuming the applicability of this section, and that we may consider the circumstances under which the will was made for the purpose of determining the "obvious intention" of the testatrix in this regard (see, however, Estate of Ross, supra; In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252; Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484; Estate of Tompkins, 132 Cal. 173, 176, 64 Pac. 268), we do not see that the case of appellant is materially strengthened. The circumstance strongly relied on by her is that at the time of the execution of the will the deceased was within a few days to give birth to a child. It was urged that she must therefore have had this child in mind, and made this will because of her approaching confinement and the danger attending the same. The child, therefore, it is said, must have been in her mind, and she must be presumed to have known that such child, if born alive, would, under the law, succeed to one-third of her estate, and to have made the provision of $125 per month for her mother with the intention that she should be paid that sum in full, notwithstanding the fact that the estate from which said annuity was to be paid would be reduced one-third by the birth of the child. The provisions of the will would indicate that, if the testatrix had this child in mind at the time of the execution of the will, her omission to provide for him was intentional, and that she, in fact, did not know that the law would give him one-third of her estate if she failed to provide for or mention him in her will. It is impossible to account for her attempted disposition of all of her property to others, under such circumstances, upon any other theory. Assuming, however, in accordance with the presumption invoked, that she did know the law, she knew not only that if the child was born alive, and had not been provided for or mentioned in her will, he would succeed to one-third of her estate by operation of law, but also that under the law, unless her intention to the contrary was made obvious by the terms of her will, all devises and legacies contained therein, including the legacy to her mother, must contribute in proportion to value to make up the share of the child. Having this knowledge, she executed the will before us, without indicating therein any intention that the legacy to the mother should not contribute with the others to make up the portion that the law would give to her after-born child, or that such legacy should, in this respect, stand upon any other footing than that occupied by the other bequests. We are satisfied that it is not shown by the will, either taken alone or in connection with the circumstances under which it was made, that there was any such "obvious intention" in relation to the annuity to the mother as will exempt it from contribution to the share of the post testamentary child.

McCARDLE v. BARSTOW. (S. F. 3,823.)*

ELECTION CONTEST — PLEADING—ADMISSIBILITY OF BALLOTS—REVIEW OF RULING—PRACTICE.

1. An election contest may be instituted by the filing of a petition verified like an ordinary pleading, which is a sufficient verification "by affidavit" within the requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 1115.

2. In an election contest the question whether ballots have been so taken care of as to preclude any reasonable suspicion that they are not in their original condition is one largely within the judgment and discretion of the trial court, and its determination of it will not be disturbed on appeal if the evidence fairly warrants the conclusion which the court below reached.

3. A stamp or cross placed on a ballot in the blank opposite the words "no nomination" is a special mark, which renders the ballot invalid.

4. Where the contestant for a county office who charged irregularities in all or nearly all of the precincts offered in evidence the ballots from certain precincts until the judicial count of such precincts, taken with the official count of the remaining precincts, gave him a plurality, it was within his legal right to withdraw his objections to the vote of the uncounted precincts, and the contestee, by offering the ballots therefrom in evidence, waives the right to object that they were not so preserved as to be admissible.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

This was an election contest for the office of county recorder of Fresno county by Charles M. McCardle, contestant, against R. N. Barstow, contestee. From a decision in favor of contestant, contestee appeals. Affirmed.

Johnston & Jones, M. B. Harris, and F. H. Short, for appellant. H. H. Welsh and Everts & Ewing, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an election contest over the office of county recorder of the county of Fresno. The official canvass of the board of supervisors showed that the contestee had received a plurality of 24 votes over the contestant, and he was declared elected. Contestant instituted this contest, and, as a result of the recount, was found and declared by the court to have received a plurality of 41 votes over the contestee. The contestee appeals.

Contestant's petition was properly verified. Kirk v. Rhoads, 46 Cal. 403.

The contestee made a preliminary objection to the introduction of any and all of the ballots offered, upon the ground that they had not been safely preserved in accordance with the law, and that their integrity was not assured. The court overruled the objection. The same question was presented to this court as to certain of these ballots in the contest of Davis v. Grunig (Cal.) 76 Pac. 1102, and it was there said by this court in bank that, after a careful examination of the evidence, we discovered nothing which would warrant us in holding that the court erred, and the language of this court in Hanna v. Green (Cal.) 76 Pac. 708, was quoted to the following effect: "The question whether ballots have been sufficiently taken care of so as to preclude any reasonable suspicion that they are not in their original condition is a question which is largely within the judgment and discretion of the trial court, and its determination of that question should not be disturbed here if the evidence fairly warrants the conclusion which the court reached on the subject."

The ballots containing a stamp or cross in the blank opposite "no nomination" were properly rejected, as has been repeatedly held by this court. Maddux v. Walthall (Cal.) 74 Pac. 1026.

The contestant having charged irregularity and misconduct, upon the part of the election officers in most, if not all, of the precincts, presented the ballots to the court from certain precincts, and they were counted, the contestee making his objection to the introduction in evidence of any and all of the ballots upon the ground of their lack of proper preservation. The count proceeded under these circumstances until the point was reached where the judicial count of the precincts whose ballots were offered, taken with the supervisors' official count of the remaining precincts, gave contestant a plurality. Contestant then withdrew his charges of misfeasance and malconduct as to the uncounted precincts, and rested his contest. Contestee then felt obliged to offer the ballots from the remaining uncounted precincts in the hope thus to swell his vote. He thus put himself in the position of offering evidence in the form of ballots, the integrity and admissibility of which he had been stoutly objecting to. He here complains somewhat bitterly of the course pursued by contestant, but we do not perceive that contestant was not strictly within his legal rights in waiving and withdrawing his objections to any of the uncounted precincts. And, upon the other hand, contestee, as to the ballots which he himself offered, and, by offering, affirmatively declared to the court to be worthy of credence, cannot here be heard to say that they were inadmissible. But this question is rather of academic than of vital interest in this case, since we have held that the ballots were admissible, and since, so holding, we have been compelled to count the thousand or more contested ballots which have been presented to us for consideration. It is unnecessary to enter into a detailed discussion of the count which we have thus made. It is sufficient to say that the result has been to increase McCardle's plurality over Barstow to more than a hundred.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

ACTION AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by a corporation against a decedent's estate, where it is claimed by defendants that the claim in suit was brought for revenge, because a claim of a witness connected with plaintiff's management against the estate had been rejected, it was proper to admit in evidence a letter written by such witness before the death of decedent in relation to the claim in suit.

2. Where defendants on cross-examination examined a witness as to other matters than those testified to by him on direct examination, and presented a new issue, it was proper on redirect examination to admit evidence as to such issue, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2048.

3. In an action by a corporation against a decedent's estate, where it is contended by defendants that the claim in suit was trumped up by a third person after the latter's claim against the estate was rejected, evidence is admissible which shows that plaintiff's president knew of the claim in suit before decedent's death.

4. Evidence in an action against a decedent's estate held to justify judgment for plaintiff.

5. Where a case was in equity, and the verdict of the jury was, at most, only advisory to the court, that the court admitted improper evidence to go before the jury will not justify a reversal, as the correctness of the decision of the court, and not the verdict, is the question to be determined.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Chas. W. Slack, Judge.

Action by the California Electric Light Company against the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company and another. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Page, McCutchen, Harding & Knight, for appellants. W. S. Goodfellow, Chas. A. Shurtleff, and Garret W. McEnerney, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This was an action to recover a secret commission claimed to have been received by the defendants' testator, while an officer of the plaintiff corporation, on the sale by plaintiff of certain of its property. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, the defendants now prosecute this appeal.

George H. Roe, of whose last will and testament the defendants are executor and executrix, respectively, was in his lifetime the secretary and manager of the plaintiff, California Electric Light Company. The plaintiff was incorporated prior to 1890. The cause of action here arose in the years 1892 and 1893. Mr. Roe died December 10, 1894. The action is based upon a claim duly presented to the executors, and by them rejected. The action is one in equity for an accounting against the executors of the will of George H. Roe, deceased, and the defendants requested the court below to impanel a jury to advise it upon the issues raised by the pleadings; and, at their request, certain interrogatories were submitted, which, together with the answers of the jury, are as follows: "(1) Was there a secret agreement made between George H. Roe and C. R. Lloyd, by which, in consideration of his assistance to be rendered in procuring a commission to be allowed and paid by the plaintiff, the California Electric Light Company, of one thousand shares of the capital stock of the Edison Light & Power Company, George H. Roe should receive one-half of said commission? Yes. (2) Did George H. Roe, pursuant to such secret agreement, receive one-half of such commission, to wit, five hundred shares of the capital stock of the Edison Light & Power Company? Yes." The trial of the cause occupied pretty much all the month of November, 1897. Thereafter, to wit, March 15, 1898, the court adopted the verdict of the jury, and made additional findings of fact, and stated the account between the parties, and awarded a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $71,324.26, payable in due course of administration, with legal interest from that date. The appellants rely for a reversal upon four rulings of the court upon the admission of evidence, and upon insufficiency of evidence to support the findings. The four rulings of the court referred to are designated as exceptions Nos. 9, 10, 37, and 42.

Exception No. 9 was taken to the admission of a letter of August 6, 1894, written by Lloyd, at New York, to Roe, in San Francisco, and contained, as Lloyd stated, in an envelope returned to him by Mrs. Roe after Roe's death, with the indorsement: "Letter from C. R. Lloyd to be returned to him unopened in case of my death." The theory of the defendants, as developed at the trial, was that Lloyd, who was the principal witness on behalf of the plaintiff, was actuated by a motive of revenge against Roe's executors for having failed to comply with his demand for the payment of his claim against said estate of $21,000; and it is also the contention of the defendants that this suit was instigated by Lloyd after his claim against Roe's estate had been rejected. In seeking to show that this was the case, Mr. McCutchen, counsel for defendants, on cross-examination of Lloyd, asked the following questions: "Q. After he was dead you made a claim against his estate to recover $21,000 of it back? A. Before he died I wrote— Q. (Interrupting.) Just answer my question, please. A. I made the claim when he was living. Mr. McCutchen: I insist upon an answer to the question, and, if the witness has any explanation, he can make it. * * * The Court: You will have to answer that question, Mr. Lloyd. I will let that portion stand, 'I made the claim while he was living.' The question virtually is, did you make the claim after he was dead? Mr. McCutchen: That is my question. A. I made it during his lifetime, and after he was dead, and you know it, in both instances. The Court: Mr. Lloyd, I have cautioned you several times now about making these remarks. The Witness: I beg your pardon. The Court: Strike out that 'and you know it.'" Upon redirect examination, counsel for the plaintiff produced and submitted to Mr. Lloyd a letter which he had written on August 6, 1894, to George H. Roe. After Mr. Roe died, this letter was returned to Mr. Lloyd by Mrs. Roe, the widow of George H. Roe, in a sealed envelope, and had indorsed upon it, in the handwriting of George H. Roe: "This letter is to be returned to Charles R. Lloyd, unopened, in the event of my death." The plaintiff then offered the letter in evidence. After some discussion between court and counsel in reference to the admission of the letter, the court put this question to defendants' counsel: "Is it your theory, Mr. McCutchen, that this claim is an afterthought, and pressed by Mr. Lloyd because his own claim against the Roe estate was rejected? Mr. McCutchen: Yes, sir. The Court: That is your theory? Mr. McCutchen: Yes, sir. The Court: Well, then, that will settle it. If that is true, then this letter is admissible upon that theory, as showing that the claim was made prior to the institution, or rather the claim involved in this suit was made prior to the claim against the Roe estate. This letter is dated August 6, 1894. Mr. McCutchen: I understand your honor does not admit this letter as an admission of Mr. Roe? The Court: No, sir." The letter referred to was written from New York, as stated, August 6, 1894, and is quite lengthy, going over many matters that seemed to have occurred between Lloyd and Roe in reference to the Electric Light Company and the Edison Company. He says in the letter, among other things: "I have no desire to quarrel with you and will avoid doing so unless it becomes necessary to protect the company from injury. If that occasion should arise, it will mean your resignation, and the return by you to the California Electric Company of the $71,000 I gave you of the $100,000 worth of stock paid to me." The registered letter receipt and the registered return receipt were also read in evidence, and the envelope with the indorsement as stated. The Code of Civil Procedure (section 2048) reads as follows: "The opposite party may cross-examine the witness as to any facts stated in his direct examination, or connected therewith, and in so doing may put leading questions; but if he examine him as to other matters, such examination is to be subject to the same rules as a direct examination." In this case the attorney of defendants, in the cross-examination referred to, examined the witness as to other matters than those testified to by him on the direct examination, and in effect presented a new issue; that is, that, after the executors in the Roe estate had rejected the claim of Lloyd for $21,000, he instigated the bringing of this suit, and had invented or concocted the claim that Roe had received half of his commission, and retained the same. It was proper, therefore, on redirect examination, to admit the evidence in question, as showing that the claim was made prior to the institution of the suit, and prior to the claim against the Roe estate, in corroboration of the witness Lloyd's testimony to that effect; and the court, it seems, was very careful to limit it to that purpose. On this subject, in People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 90, the court say: "Such declarations may, however, be admissible in contradiction of evidence tending to show that the account is a fabrication of late date, when it may be shown that the same account was given before its ultimate effect and operation could have been foreseen, and also, perhaps, in other peculiar cases." And in Barkly v. Copeland, 74 Cal. 4, 15 Pac. 307, 5 Am. St. Rep. 413, it is said: "It has been frequently held that, when the witness is charged with testifying under the influence of some motive prompting him to make a false statement, it may be shown that he made similar statements at a time when the imputed motive did not exist." Citing a number of cases from other jurisdictions, and Wharton on Evidence, § 570.

In response to the cross-examination of Lloyd he was permitted to testify without objection as follows: "I had said to Mr. Roe in his lifetime that he had received $71,000 out of this transaction. On one occasion I wrote to him in Santa Barbara while he was there. I wrote to him on several occasions with respect to that, and I wrote him from New York some time in the latter part of 1894. That letter was returned to me some time after his death." Again, without objection: "In the lifetime of Mr. Roe I made a claim against him for the return of the $21,000. I once wrote him a letter to Santa Barbara. I have the original letter in pencil from which the letter to Mr. Roe was copied. I wrote it out myself in ink from the pencil copy. I retained the pencil copy, and have it with me. I left the finished draft with Miss Buttner, at Sunol, where I was staying for a few days, to mail. I inclosed the letter in an envelope, and addressed it to George H. Roe, at the Arlington Hotel, Santa Barbara. He was there at the time. After the letter was inclosed in an envelope and addressed, I left it at the Buttner house, in Sunol, with directions to mail it." Miss Buttner, the stenographer, was permitted to testify to the writing and mailing of the letter of February 18, 1894, without any objection. This letter was admitted by the court for the sole purpose of showing that Lloyd did not invent the claim that Roe had received half of his commission after Lloyd's individual demand against the Roe estate was rejected, and was limited to that purpose, and not admitted as an admission on the part of Roe of the truth of the contents of the letter. In the letter, which is quite lengthy, he calls the attention of Roe again to the $71,000 which he had received as half of the commissions in the transaction referred to in the New York letter, saying: "You are not entitled to more than one-half the San Francisco commission, and if that stock deal or the sale of the Engineering Co. does not go through soon, I hope you are man enough to refund me that $21,000 without my having to press you for it. I wish to be on friendly terms with you and regret much more than you do our present differences." Upon the authorities referred to in support of the ruling of the court in reference to the New York letter, it was not error to admit the letter written to Roe at Santa Barbara. This is the second point urged by appellants in support of their contention for a reversal, and it is designated as exception No. 10 in the transcript.

P. B. Cornwall, who was president of the plaintiff corporation during the transactions out of which the suit in question arose, was asked whether he ever had a conversation with the witness Lloyd relating to the 1,000 shares which were voted to him by the California Electric Light Company. It was stated by plaintiff's counsel that the purpose was to prove that he told Mr. Cornwall, as Lloyd had stated in his testimony, that he had divided the commission he received with Roe. "The Court: I want to know first, Mr. Cornwall, when this conversation occurred? A. It occurred between 4 and 6 months before Mr. Roe's death. I think it was in July, but it may have been about the 1st of August. It was a street conversation. Mr. Lloyd stopped me near the Merchants' Exchange, and spoke about selling me some electric light machinery. I did not care to buy. I had suffered through former connections, and it led to a conversation about the transactions he had had with the California Electric Light Co., and I think I put my hand on his collar, and put it to him very squarely: 'Did not Mr. Roe get a portion of that commission that you got from the California Electric Light Company—that thousand shares of stock?' He hesitated a moment, and answered that he got more than half of it. I was president of the California Electric Light Company during 1891, and some of 1892. I was president as long as I remained director. The negotiations between the California Electric Light Company and the Edison people went on for over a year—I think, commencing before 1891." The court overruled defendants' objections to this testimony, which is noted as exception No. 37, and the third point made by appellants in support of their contention for a reversal. The testimony was properly admitted to refute the assumption of defendants' counsel in the cross-examination of the witness Lloyd that the matter referred to had been concocted by Lloyd after the death of Roe, and after his claim on the Roe estate had been rejected. The court below, as in the case of the letters already referred to, was careful to limit this testimony to this purpose.

The fourth point made by appellants in support of their contention for a reversal is based upon the admission of a letter from Lloyd to Cornwall referring to this conversation. In his cross-examination it appeared that, upon the death of Roe, Lloyd telegraphed to Cornwall, telling him that Roe had died, and to await an important letter mailed the day before. On redirect examination the telegram was admitted in evidence, and an extract from a letter dated December 8th, two days before Roe died, was also admitted in evidence, which reads as follows: "Please consider this letter confidential, as you did a statement I made to you at the Merchants' Exchange in July of this year." This constitutes exception No. 42. As in the cases of the preceding letters and conversations, this was properly admitted for the purpose of refuting the charge assumed on the cross-examination that Lloyd had concocted the story after the death of Roe, and after his claim on the Roe estate had been rejected; and if, in admitting this evidence, or in the reading of the letters in question, the jury in any way could have been influenced in returning their verdict, this would not justify a reversal. The case was in equity, and the verdict of the jury was at most only advisory to the court. The court, in adopting the verdict of the jury, acted upon its own judgment, and, in addition thereto, filed its own findings and decision. The correctness of the decision of the court, and not the verdict as rendered by the jury, is the question to be determined here. Fisher v. Zumwalt, 128 Cal. 493, 61 Pac. 82; Schneider v. Brown, 85 Cal. 205, 24 Pac. 715; Sweetser v. Dobbins, 65 Cal. 529, 4 Pac. 540; Richardson v. Eureka, 110 Cal. 446, 42 Pac. 965; Scheerer v. Goodwin, 125 Cal. 154, 57 Pac. 789.

In the fifth point made by appellants for reversal, it is claimed that the evidence does not support the judgment in reference to the amount found due—in other words, that the judgment is in excess of the amount which should have been rendered. The commissions sued for were paid in stock, as found by the jury. The amount of the judgment was dependent upon the number of shares of stock. The court in its finding stated that the 500 shares received by Roe were delivered in two lots; the first lot being 400 shares out of a certain lot of 786 shares received by Lloyd from the plaintiff, and the second being 100 shares out of a lot of 280 shares subsequently delivered by Lloyd to Roe. The evidence discloses that there was another deal between Lloyd and Roe, by which Lloyd was to deliver to Roe 375 shares of the same stock at the same price—$100 per share—and that expenses were incurred by Lloyd amounting to $39,000, one-half of which was charged to Roe. In order to make up the amount of money that was due from Lloyd to Roe, counting the shares as money at $100 each, it is necessary to take the 400 shares at $40,000, the 280 shares at $28,000, and one-half of the expenses, or $19,500, which makes a total of $87,500. The objection of the appellant is that the court charged the expenses against the shares due to Roe upon the other transaction—the one not here in issue—whereas the appellants claim that it should have been divided between the two transactions, and a part of the expense charged against the other transaction and the remainder charged against the transaction here in issue, and hence it would not be in accordance with the evidence to charge 100 of the last lot of 280 shares against this transaction, but that the evidence requires the charge of a somewhat less amount instead. It is evident, however, that, if the 100 shares of the last lot of 280 shares were appropriated by the parties themselves to make up the total of 500 shares due upon the transaction here in issue, the court would be fully justified in making the same appropriation, and rendering judgment accordingly. There is evidence tending to show that the last 100 of the 500 shares were so appropriated out of the 280 shares included in the last lot. Lloyd testified as follows: "Besides the delivery of the 400 shares of stock to Mr. Roe, I gave him 280 shares more. * * * The 280 shares were given to him to make up the half of the total commission made in New York and San Francisco, stating the amounts that I received from the California Electric Light Company at $100,000, and the amount that I received in New York as $75,000, amounting to $1,75,000." He then mentioned the items of expenses amounting to $39,000, and, continuing, said: "I gave Roe $71,000—$3,000 with my note and 680 shares of stock, or $68,000 in cash. The 680 shares was one-half of the total net commission of $100,000 and $36,000." If the whole of the expenses, $39,000, was deducted from the $75,000 due by the other transaction, it would leave a remainder of $36,000. This testimony seems to indicate that the 500 shares were appropriated and delivered to Roe upon the transaction here in question without any reduction for expenses. He testified to other facts in connection with these which seemed to contradict this inference, or at least to show that the expenses should not have been so apportioned; but it was for the court below to determine what was the proper construction of this testimony, and the fact that it might warrant a different inference does not justify us in setting aside the verdict for want of evidence. We think it must be held that the evidence supports the judgment in this particular.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BAUM v. ROPER et al. (S. F. 2,937.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS—SEPARATE ISSUES DEPENDENT ON SAME FACTS.

1. Where the answer in an action for the recovery of real estate set up as a defense that the action was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 318, which requires the plaintiff or his predecessors to have been seised or possessed of the property within five years, and the court found that the action was not barred by said section, such finding was, in effect, that plaintiff or his predecessors had been in possession within five years, and was a sufficient determination of an issue raised by another defense pleaded, which depended upon such question of fact, although no finding was expressly made on that issue.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Chas. W. Slack, Judge.

Action by Clara Baum, administratrix of the estate of Julius Baum, deceased, against Edward Roper, Kate Roper, and David J. Spence. From the judgment, defendant Spence appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Mhoon and T. M. Osmont, for appellant. W. B. Kollmyer and Naphtaly, Freidenrich & Ackerman, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a second appeal from the judgment rendered in the superior court on February 6, 1897. The judgment as rendered was against all the defendants, but the clerk, by inadvertence in making the entry thereof, failed to insert the name of the present appellant, David J. Spence, in the judgment as entered. This omission was not observed, however, at the time, and all the defendants joined in an appeal to this court, and the judgment was affirmed. See Baum v. Roper, 132 Cal. 42, 64 Pac. 128. In the subsequent decision of Spence v. Troutt, 133 Cal. 605, 65 Pac. 1083 (erroneously reported as Spencer v. Troutt), it was held that, so far as Spence was concerned, the first appeal, although the opinion showed a full consideration of all the points in the case, and was rendered after hearing argument in his behalf, was nevertheless a nullity, because as to him the judgment was not entered, and this court could not acquire jurisdiction of an appeal taken from a judgment before the entry thereof, and that Spence had the right to take an appeal within six months from the time of the amendment inserting his name therein. This amendment was made on May 29, 1901, and this appeal was taken on June 7, 1901. Inasmuch as this appeal was taken more than four years after the rendition of the judgment, it is apparent that we cannot consider the objection that the evidence does not support the decision of the trial court. Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 1. We have, however, re-examined the evidence and reconsidered the points presented on the first appeal and decided by this court in Baum v. Roper, supra, and are satisfied with the conclusions there reached upon a consideration of the same record.

The appellant now makes the additional point that the judgment is erroneous because there is no finding on the issue tendered by the answer relating to the effect of the act of March 5, 1864 (St. 1863–64, p. 149, c. 154), upon the right of the plaintiff to maintain the action. The act provides that in any action begun more than one year thereafter for the recovery of real property in San Francisco, or affecting the title thereto, none of the provisions of the act of March 11, 1858 (St. 1858, pp. 52, 66), ratifying certain ordinances of San Francisco, nor any of the provisions of the ordinances therein recited, should be deemed to aid the right or title set up or claimed by any party, unless such party or his privies in estate shall have had actual possession of the land in dispute within five years next before the commencement of the action. The answer pleaded this statute, and alleged that neither the plaintiff nor his predecessors in interest had had the actual possession of the land within five years next before the beginning of the action. There is no express finding upon these allegations. We are of the opinion, however, that the findings made include a finding of the facts set forth in the answer. The answer alleged that the action was barred by the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This is merely a statutory method of alleging the facts which, under that section, constitute a bar to the action, namely, that the plaintiff and his predecessors have not been seised or possessed of the property within five years next before the commencement of the action. This is substantially the same as the allegation aforesaid intended to invoke the operation of the act of 1864. The court finds that the action is not barred by the provisions of said section 318. In substance, this is the same as a finding that the allegation that neither plaintiff nor his privies in estate have been in possession of the property within the five years next before the beginning of the action is not true. There was no evidence or claim that either of them were under any disability. Therefore it does, in substance, amount to a finding on the issues tendered by the answer.

We have considered this point on the theory that there was evidence sufficient to require such a finding with respect to the effect of the act of 1864. The appellant, however, does not cite us to any evidence showing that the plaintiff required aid from the act of 1858 or the ordinances referred to in that act in order to establish his title. The title seems to be established by proof of adverse possession long after that act took effect, and irrespective of any deraignment of title from the city of San Francisco.

The judgment is affirmed.

CAHILL et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 3,937.)

JUDGMENTS—MOTION TO VACATE OR MODIFY ORDER—REFUSAL TO ENTERTAIN—MANDAMUS—JURISDICTION TO SET ASIDE ORDER IN PROBATE—LACHES.

1. That the facts stated in a motion to vacate or modify a judgment or order do not justify the granting of the relief prayed is an objection which goes to the merits, and affords no ground for the refusal of the court to consider and act on the motion.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, which provides that the writ of mandate may be issued to "compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office," a proceeding will lie in the Supreme Court for a mandamus against a judge of a superior court to compel him to entertain and consider a motion to vacate an order in probate, where his refusal was not reviewable on appeal, and was based solely on want of jurisdiction, as matter of law, under the constitutional and statutory powers of the court to vacate such order, and not upon evidence or the determination of any question of fact.

3. A superior court has power, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to vacate or modify an order in probate setting apart a homestead.

4. The defense of laches differs from that of limitation, in that, in order to bar a remedy because of laches, there must appear, in addition to mere lapse of time, some circumstances from which the defendant or some other person may be prejudiced, or there must have been such lapse of time that it may reasonably be supposed that such prejudice will result if the remedy is allowed.

5. Where parties in interest promptly took an appeal from an order of a superior court refusing to entertain a motion to modify an order previously entered setting apart a homestead from the property of a decedent, which appeal was dismissed on the ground that the order was not appealable, whereupon the appellants at once instituted proceedings in mandamus within a year after the order was entered, there was not such laches as to bar their right to maintain such proceedings.

McFarland, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Application by James Cahill and William Cahill for a mandate directed against Frank J. Murasky, judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ granted.

See 76 Pac. 383.

R. C. Harrison, for petitioners. Geo. A. Connolly, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the superior court and Frank J. Murasky, as judge thereof, to hear and consider a motion of the petitioners, duly presented to said court, to modify, and in part vacate, a previous order of the court in the matter of the estate of Patrick H. Cahill, deceased, setting apart a homestead to the widow of the deceased out of the property of the estate.

The motion for the modification was made and presented within six months after the order setting apart the homestead. When the motion was presented to the superior court the widow appeared thereto and objected to the hearing. The objections were, first, that the court had no jurisdiction to vacate the former order; and, second, that the facts stated as the grounds of the motion did not justify a modification or vacation of the order.

The ground last stated furnished no reason for refusing to hear and consider the motion. It was addressed to the merits, and could only be considered after the court had, upon the consideration of the first objection, decided that it had jurisdiction to entertain the motion and make the order applied for. Both objections were taken up together and argued and submitted simultaneously. This was manifestly done merely for convenience, and in order to avoid the delay that would be occasioned by another hearing in case the objection to the jurisdiction should be overruled. The objection to the jurisdiction was not based on any facts, nor upon any defect in the service of the notice on the widow, but solely on the proposition that the original order had become final and was beyond the power of the court to revoke or modify. The preamble to the order thereupon made shows that the court never reached the consideration of the motion, but decided that the first objection was sound, and that it was without power to modify or vacate the former order, or to entertain a motion to that effect. The order accordingly stated that "upon this ground, and this only, the motion to vacate the decree heretofore made setting apart the homestead is denied." The order thus made is therefore, in substance, no more than a dismissal of the motion for lack of jurisdiction. As the case stands, the superior court has refused to act upon the motion, and has not acted thereon.

Another objection is made here to our consideration of the question of the power of the court to modify the order. It is that the court below has determined that it did not have jurisdiction, and that that determination is conclusive, and cannot be reviewed in this court upon this proceeding. The order refusing to vacate or modify the order setting apart the homestead is not appealable. Estate of Cahill (Cal.) 76 Pac. 383. An appeal from the original order would have been useless, for, as it was made without notice or contest, there could be no bill of exceptions showing the facts on which it was based. Therefore, if the decision of the court that it did not, as matter of law, have jurisdiction to act, is conclusive as to the law, the petitioners are without remedy, although the original order may have been manifestly erroneous, or may have been fraudulently obtained, and the court may have been utterly mistaken in its view that it was without power to modify it. That it was mistaken in that view is definitely settled by the decision of this court in Levy v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 590, 73 Pac. 417, holding that the superior court has power to vacate such an order under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

This court has held that where the jurisdiction of the superior court to try a cause, or hear an appeal, depends on the existence of certain facts, and that court has, upon evidence consisting either of affidavits or of the record, made its determination as to the facts, although erroneously, this court cannot in mandamus proceedings go behind this determination, and itself consider, from evidence, whether or not the jurisdiction existed; and this seems to be the law even where there is no conflict in the evidence, and the court below has acted judicially only to the extent that it has determined the existence of facts from evidence, and where the facts thus determined did not, in law, justify the decision of the superior court that it did not have jurisdiction. Thus where the lower court, acting as a court of appeal, has decided that the record in a case from a justice's court did not give the superior court jurisdiction of the appeal because the notice of appeal did not have a revenue stamp attached, or because in an appeal on questions of law alone there was no statement on appeal, and has thereupon dismissed the appeal (People v. Weston, 28 Cal. 640; Lewis v. Barclay, 35 Cal. 213); or where the superior court upon affidavits removed the cause to the United States district court and refused to proceed further therein (Francisco v. Manhattan Ins. Co., 36 Cal. 286); or upon the facts stated in a petition to be allowed to intervene had refused to allow the intervention (People v. Sexton, 37 Cal. 532); or after considering the condition of its calendar, and other facts and circumstances tending to excuse the failure to try a criminal case within 60 days after the filing of the information, had refused to dismiss the cause (Strong v. Grant, 99 Cal. 100, 33 Pac. 733); or upon the facts stated in an accusation filed under section 772 of the Penal Code had refused to issue a citation against the accused officer (Kerr v. Superior Court, 130 Cal. 184, 62 Pac. 479)—in all these cases the determination of the superior court as to its jurisdiction of the particular cause upon the facts shown has been deemed final and conclusive upon this court, where a review of that determination was sought by proceedings in mandamus.

The distinction between this class of cases and the case at bar is this: In all these cases the superior court was called upon to consider either the sufficiency of certain facts established by the record, or certain facts determined by that court upon evidence properly addressed to it, to give it jurisdiction to proceed with the particular case then before the court, and with its decision, after such consideration, this court cannot interfere by mandamus. In the case at bar there was no question of fact involved, and the superior court decided that, as matter of law purely, it could not in any case vacate an order made under the provisions of section 1465, Code Civ. Proc., setting apart a homestead. This was a proposition not dependent on any facts whatever, but wholly upon a consideration of the powers of the court as defined by the Constitution and by statute.

The Code provides that the writ of mandate may be issued to "compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. The law specially enjoins upon the superior court, and upon the judge thereof, the duty of hearing and determining all matters which are within its jurisdiction and which come properly before it. The motion under consideration did come properly before that court, but the judge decided, as matter of law, and upon the statute and Constitution only, that the court had no power in any case to make orders of the kind there applied for, and upon that ground only refused to proceed to the merits of the application. If the person holding the office could thus decide what were the duties pertaining thereto which the law specially enjoins him to perform, the writ of mandate would be practically useless. The decision refusing to act which gives occasion for the writ would also furnish sufficient cause for denying it. As was well said in Temple v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 211, 11 Pac. 699: "The court cannot, by holding without reason that it has no jurisdiction of the proceedings, divest itself of jurisdiction and evade the duty of hearing and determining it." To the same effect are Merced M. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Ortman v. Dixon, 9 Cal. 23; Heinlen v. Cross, 63 Cal. 44; People v. Barnes, 66 Cal. 594, 6 Pac. 698; Crocker v. Conrey, 140 Cal. 213, 73 Pac. 1006.

The respondent further claims that the petitioners are barred of their remedy in mandamus by reason of their laches. "Laches" is defined as "such neglect or omission to assert a right as, taken in conjunction with the lapse of time, more or less great, and other circumstances causing prejudice to an adverse party, operates as a bar in a court of equity." Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 97. "In determining what will constitute such unreasonable delay, regard will be had to circumstances which justify the delay, to the nature of the case and the relief demanded, and to the question whether the rights of the defendant, or of other persons, have been prejudiced by such delay." Taylor v. Bayonne, 57 N. J. Law, 378, 30 Atl. 431; People v. Syracuse, 78 N. Y. 56; Chinn v. Trustees, 32 Ohio St. 236; 19 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 755; Merrill on Mandamus, § 87; Wood on Mandamus, 40. "Where the delay is satisfactorily explained, the equity of the complainant, if clearly established, remains unaffected, and the court will decree for him, notwithstanding great efflux of time." 18 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 100. The statute of limitations applies to special proceedings of this kind. Code Civ. Proc. § 363; Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 6, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153. The defense of laches is different from the defense of the statute of limitations, in this: that, in order to bar a remedy because of laches, there must appear, in addition to mere lapse of time, some circumstances from which the defendant or some other person may be prejudiced, or there must be such lapse of time that it may be reasonably supposed that such prejudice will occur if the remedy is allowed; whereas in the case of the statute of limitations there need be nothing more than mere lapse of time in order to constitute a bar. The consequence of this distinction is that in cases where the defense of laches is interposed, or where it is claimed to appear on the face of the petition or complaint, the petitioner or the plaintiff may present circumstances excusing or justifying the delay, and showing the absence of prejudice therefrom, and if the court, in its sound discretion, deems the showing sufficient, the proceeding will not be barred. Many cases have been cited by the respondents in support of the proposition that the lapse of time between the refusal to act upon the motion and the beginning of the proceeding in this court for mandamus of itself constitutes laches sufficient to bar the proceeding; but upon an examination of them we find that, with very few exceptions, there appears in each case cited some circumstance from which it appeared that prejudice actually had occurred or might occur, or such lapse of time that it was supposed that prejudice had occurred or would occur if the writ was granted. The few exceptions are not well-considered cases, and are not sufficient to establish a rule contrary to that above cited from the authorities.

The order of the superior court refusing to consider the motion for a modification was made on April 10, 1903, but was not entered until after May 6, 1903. Within 60 days from the entry petitioners attempted to appeal therefrom to this court. On December 7, 1903, the widow moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the order was not appealable. This court on March 28, 1904, granted the motion and dismissed the appeal. An application for rehearing was made and denied, and on April 28, 1904, the remittitur was issued. This application for a writ of mandate was filed five days thereafter. The respondents herein do not allege that any circumstances exist, or that anything has occurred by reason of the delay, that has caused or would cause any prejudice whatever to the widow or to any other person. The lapse of time has not been so great that, under the circumstances, we can suppose or presume that prejudice will ensue if the mandate is issued. Until the decision dismissing the appeal, it had never been directly held by this court that an order refusing to vacate or modify an order setting apart a homestead was not appealable, and there was a very general impression that such an appeal could be taken. If so, the remedy would be ample, and there could be no writ of mandate. During the delay the petitioners were diligently prosecuting the remedy by appeal which they were advised they had. We think, under the circumstances, the delay was sufficiently excused, and that the court below should be compelled to proceed to hearing and determination of the motion upon its merits.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

McFARLAND, J. (dissenting). I dissent. In the first place, if what respondent did could be construed as a refusal to act for want of jurisdiction, it does not appear that respondent had jurisdiction. In Levy v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 590, 73 Pac. 417, and cases there cited, it was merely held that section 473, Code Civ. Proc., which provides for relieving a party from the judgment or order taken against him "through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect," applies to certain probate orders, and that only under said section can orders not appealable be reached. But in the case at bar the petition to set aside was not based on section 473, but merely on certain alleged errors in the order sought to be vacated. In the second place, the respondent acted in the matter, and ordered that "the motion to vacate the decree hereinbefore made setting apart the homestead is denied," and, in my opinion, the reasons upon which the action was based are immaterial. Having acted, respondent cannot be compelled by mandamus to act differently.

ASSAULT—INTENT—MISTAKE AS TO PERSON ASSAULTED — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS—TESTIMONY OF DEFENDANT — INSANITY AS DEFENSE—MEASURE OF PROOF.

1. The holding of a loaded pistol within a few inches of another person's face, pointed directly at him, where the act was accompanied by threatening language, warrants a conviction for an assault with a deadly weapon, although defendant's intention was to assault a different person.

2. On the trial of a defendant for assault with a deadly weapon, consisting of a pistol, evidence that defendant discharged the pistol shortly after the assault is admissible as tending to show that it was loaded when the assault was made.

3. Evidence that, on the arrest of a defendant for an assault with a pistol, brass knuckles were found on his person, should not be admitted on his trial for the assault.

4. A judgment of conviction in a criminal case in which the defendant was a witness in his own behalf will not be reversed because of an instruction that, in weighing his testimony, the jury may properly consider his interest in the case, and whether it might not affect his credibility or color his testimony.

5. While the burden of proving insanity as a defense in a criminal case rests on the defendant, a preponderance of the evidence is all that is required, and an instruction that the defense must be "clearly established by satisfactory proof" is erroneous.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

W. H. Wells appeals from a judgment of conviction for an assault with a deadly weapon, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Reversed.

R. E. Rhodes and Leonard B. Fowler, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

VAN DYKE, J. The defendant was charged with assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder, was tried, convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail for one year. An appeal is taken from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The first point made on behalf of the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. The alleged assault was made on one McCartney near the town of Madera, in Madera county, at or near the house of Mrs. Northfield, where the said McCartney was boarding, and McCartney in giving his testimony says: "I was standing at the northwest corner of the porch, and we were talking, and all of a sudden Mr. Wells appeared at the front gate. Don't know where he came from. He passed through the gate, but never said a word, and he came right around and walked right in front of me. He laid his left hand on my right shoulder, and at the same time he pulled a gun out of his pocket and throws it right up in my face—just within six or eight inches of my face; and he says: 'I want my money.' He says: 'I have lost thirty-five dollars,' as well as I could understand him, and, as he did, I reached with my left hand, and jerked his gun down by his side. I said: 'I ain't got your money. I don't know anything about it.' The pistol was not more than six or eight inches from my face. It was pointed directly at my face. He says: 'Excuse me, I have got the wrong man.' Miss Northfield, where she was milking, when she seen the gun fly, she jumped up and run around the back way of the house, and he quit me and started in the direction that she went, and he turned when he got a little from me, probably a couple of steps, and he says: 'Keep your hands down.' I says: 'I ain't got nothing but my jackknife.' When he says, 'Keep your hands down,' I says, 'Here is Hutson now.' I says: 'Maybe he knows something about your money.' Hutson was just driving up to the gate." It appears, also, that he then proceeded to make an assault with his pistol upon Hutson.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the mere act of pointing the weapon at McCartney did not, of itself, amount to the offense of an assault. The Code defines an assault as follows: "An assault is an unlawful attempt, coupled with the present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another." Pen. Code, § 240. This is substantially the old or common-law definition of an assault. The evidence in this case showed that the pistol, or, as the witness calls it, a gun, was loaded, and, as McCartney testified, was pointed directly at his face, and within a short distance of it, when he jerked it down. But it is contended, also, by appellant that the evidence shows that he had made a mistake in assaulting McCartney, instead of Hutson, and therefore there was no intention on his part to make an assault upon McCartney. But where one intends to assault or kill a certain person, and by mistake or inadvertence assaults or kills another in his stead, it is nevertheless a crime, and the intent is transferred from the party who was intended to the other. In People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 365, 367, 75 Pac. 1093, this question was fully considered and a number of cases cited in support of this rule. The pointing of a loaded pistol under the circumstances here shown was such an act as would raise a presumption that the unlawful act was done with an unlawful intent. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962; Pen. Code § 21. There being evidence to support the jury's finding that the weapon was pointed with guilty intent, this court will not disturb such finding; for in such case no question of law is presented and the jurisdiction of this court in criminal cases is limited to questions of law alone. People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 40, 70 Pac. 1014; People v. Gonzales (Cal.) 77 Pac. 448; People v. Donnolly (Cal.) 77 Pac. 177; People v. Smith (Cal.) 77 Pac. 449.

It is further contended that it was prejudicial error on the part of the court to permit the witness McCartney to be interrogated with reference to the discharge of the pistol by the defendant after the alleged commission of the assault upon him. But it was material to ascertain whether the pistol was loaded, and it was proper to admit evidence tending to show that fact; for, unless it had been loaded, it would not have been an assault. People v. Silva (Cal.) 76 Pac. 814; People v. Lee Kong, 95 Cal. 666, 30 Pac. 800, 17 L. R. A. 626, 29 Am. St. Rep. 165. Similar objection is made by appellant to the admission of the testimony of Mrs. Northfield as to the discharge of the pistol after the alleged assault upon McCartney. But this evidence was also admitted for the purpose of showing that when this alleged assault was made on McCartney the pistol was loaded, and, for the reasons already stated, it was material for that purpose, and a part of the res gestæ.

It appears that the arresting officer, immediately after the commission of the offense charged, found upon the person of the defendant the revolver in question, and also brass knuckles, and it is contended upon the part of the appellant that the court erred in allowing the officer to give testimony with reference thereto. Though we do not deem this irregularity of such importance as to justify a reversal, still it would have been much better, as well as safer in practice, not to have allowed the officer to be examined in reference to the brass knuckles or any other articles found upon the defendant at the time of his arrest excepting the pistol in question.

The defendant testified as a witness in his own behalf, and on the subject of his testimony the court gave three instructions, which should perhaps be considered together as a single instruction. They are as follows: "(22) The defendant has been examined as a witness in his own behalf. This it is his right to be, and the jury will consider his testimony as they would that of any other witness examined before you. (23) It is proper for the jury, however, to bear in mind the situation of the defendant, the manner in which he may be affected by the verdict, and the very grave interest he must feel in it; and it is proper for the jury to consider whether this position and interest may not affect his credibility or color his testimony. (24) But it is your duty to consider it fairly, and give it such credit and weight as you think it is entitled to receive." Appellant's counsel objects to the above instruction No. 23 on the ground that it is unfair to the defendant and that it invades the province of the jury. He admits that it is substantially the same as the one approved in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 204, but he thinks that case is not good law and should be modified. In the recent case of People v. Tibbs, 76 Pac. 904, however, this court said of a similar instruction: "This instruction was in effect the same as an instruction given in the case of People v. Cronin, * * * and there held to be correct. It has since been frequently held that where this instruction, though it may be regarded as erroneous, is kept well within the language considered in the Cronin Case, the judgment will not be reversed on account of it. People v. Van Ewan, 111 Cal. 144, 43 Pac. 520. It only undertakes to lay down for the guidance of the jury a matter that they would be apt to know about and act upon without any such instruction."

One of the defenses was insanity, caused by excessive intoxication, and the court gave the following instruction, No. 9, bearing upon such defense: "As has been said, in criminal cases the guilt of the accused must always be established to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, and while the burden of proof is upon the defendant to establish the fact of his insanity at the time of the commission of the alleged act, when that plea is interposed, yet he does not have to make proof of it to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, but only to your entire and perfect satisfaction." We do not agree with the criticism of the defendant that the language used in this instruction is equivalent to saying that the defense should be established beyond all reasonable doubt, but the last clause of the instruction should have been omitted. Another instruction, No. 26, also bearing on this subject, reads as follows: "Where insanity is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proof is on the defendant. The proof must be such in amount that, if the single issue of the insanity or sanity of the defendant should be submitted to the jury in a civil case, it must find that he was insane. In other words, insanity must be clearly established by satisfactory proof." This last instruction is almost in the exact language of the one condemned in People v. Wreden, 59 Cal. 393. The instruction there was as follows: "I charge you that, where insanity is relied upon as a defense, the burden of proof is on the defendant, and the proof must be such in amount that, if the single issue of sanity or insanity of the defendant should be submitted to the jury in a civil case, they would find that he was insane, or, in other words, that insanity must be clearly established by satisfactory proof. It is not sufficient that you should entertain a reasonable doubt as to his sanity, but the proof must be satisfactory, and the fact of insanity clearly established." This court, in commenting upon that instruction, after stating the rule that such a defense was required to be established by a mere preponderance of evidence, says: "Is not the expression 'clearly established by satisfactory proof' the full equivalent of 'established by satisfactory proof beyond a reasonable doubt'? How can a fact be said to be clearly established, so long as there is a reasonable doubt whether it has been established at all? There can be no 'reasonable doubt' of a fact after it has been clearly established by satisfactory proof." After citing the definitions in Webster with reference to "clearly" and "in a clear manner," and also the charge of Chief Justice Shaw in Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. 320, 52 Am. Dec. 711, bearing upon this point, this court concludes: "Under the instruction given it was the duty of the jury to require that the defense of insanity should at least be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. This was error." And the court reversed the case for that reason. We have not been referred to a case, nor do we know of one in this court, overruling or modifying the decision in People v. Wreden, supra. On the contrary, in People v. Allender, 117 Cal. 81, 48 Pac. 1014, the court instructed the jury that the burden rested upon the defendant of proving his insanity by a preponderance of evidence merely. "The principle of law thus declared is in full accord with the law of this state. For a period of 30 years this court has repeatedly and uniformly so declared the law to be. The cases to that effect are numbered by the score"—referring to a large number of cases.

For the error in giving the instruction in question on the plea of insanity, the judgment and order must be reversed, and the cause remanded; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. STROMBECK. (Cr. 1,170.)

ANIMALS—MARKING TO PREVENT IDENTIFICATION—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—INTENT—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 357, making any one guilty of a criminal offense who marks or brands, or alters or defaces the mark or brand of, horses or cattle, with intent thereby to steal the same "or to prevent identification thereof by the true owner," slitting the ears of a colt owned by another, if done with intent to prevent its identification by the owner, constitutes the offense, although the mark so placed upon the animal may not be a conventional one, indicative of ownership.

2. Where it was admitted by defendant that he took from the range a colt of which he was not the owner, and branded it and slit its ears, and that he afterward obliterated the brand and turned the colt loose, and there was evidence tending to show that he knew who was the owner of the colt, a finding by the jury that the marking of the colt was with intent to prevent its identification by the owner is sufficiently supported by the evidence and the surrounding circumstances, and will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Under a statute making it an offense to mark an animal with intent to prevent its identification by the true owner, it is immaterial whether or not the mark placed on an animal with such intent is one calculated to accomplish the purpose intended.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Defendant, Johnny Strombeck, appeals from a judgment convicting him of a criminal offense, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

W. H. Larew and G. G. Goucher, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, J. An information was presented against defendant, wherein it was charged that he "did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously mark a certain domestic animal, to wit, a stud colt, belonging to one Thomas Beasore, by then and there slitting the ears of said animal, with intent thereby to prevent identification thereof by the true owner, to wit, the said Thomas Beasore." Having been found guilty by a jury, and adjudged to suffer imprisonment in the state prison for two years, he has appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The information states a public offense under the provisions of section 357 of the Penal Code. That section is as follows: "Every person who marks or brands, alters, or defaces the mark or brand of any horse, mare, colt, jack, jennet, mule, bull, ox, steer, cow, or calf belonging to another, with intent thereby to steal the same, or to prevent identification thereof by the true owner, is punishable by imprisonment in the state's prison for not less than one nor more than five years." Under its terms, one who in any way marks any animal therein named, belonging to another, with intent thereby to prevent identification thereof by the true owner, is guilty of a felony. It can make no difference that the mark placed on the animal is not of a character usually adopted for the purpose of indicating ownership, or that it may not accomplish the purpose of preventing identification. These are matters that may properly weigh with the jury in determining as to the intent with which the marking was done. It is the placing of any mark on such an animal, with the intent thereby to prevent identification by the true owner, that constitutes the crime. That one who slits the ears of a horse or colt thereby "marks" the same, within the ordinary meaning of that word, is clear. He thereby places some visible sign or impression on the animal, which to some extent changes its natural appearance, attracts the attention, and conveys some information or intimation. That such a mark might tend to impede the owner of the animal in the identification thereof is likewise clear. The statutes recognize that such a mark might be legally adopted as a mark to indicate ownership, for they expressly provide that no person must use a mark "by cutting off the ear or by cutting the ear on both sides to a point." Section 3171, Pol. Code. But it is immaterial, in this connection, whether the mark in fact used is such that it might be legally adopted as a mark under the provisions of the Political Code. It is sufficient that it is a mark, placed on the animal with the unlawful intent.

Counsel for defendant seeks to limit the meaning of the word "marks," as used in this section, to the placing on the animal of some "conventional artificial indication of ownership"; but we find no warrant for such limitation in the plain language of the statutory provision. The portion of the section here involved was designed to protect the owners of animals, by making it a crime for one to in any way mark the animal of another with the intent thereby to prevent identification by the owner, and we do not see how any mark made with such unlawful intent can be excluded from the operation of the section.

We have considered the other points made in support of the demurrer to the information, and are satisfied that the demurrer was properly overruled.

2. It is contended that the verdict was contrary to the evidence; the particular contention being that there was no evidence to show the specific criminal intent necessary to complete the crime. The defendant testified substantially as follows: Having gone out "upon the range" to find one of his three colts, he found his colt and also the stud colt mentioned in the information, with several others, and, never having seen this animal before, he concluded that it was an estray, and that he would claim it. He told his companion, Wagner, that it was his colt, and, having driven the horses into Wagner's corral, lassoed this animal, threw it down, branded it with "F. N.," a brand of Wagner, and split its ears. After this had been done and the animal was released, it followed the defendant around the corral, and he saw that it had been theretofore handled. The defendant then concluded that it was not an estray, and that he should not have branded him, and the next morning took the colt about two miles from the place, burned out the brand, and turned the animal loose upon the range. He testified that he split the ears simply because he intended to use the horse as a saddle horse, and liked the looks of a saddle horse with split ears; that, although he had been the owner of horses before, this was the first time that he had ever slit the ears of a horse; that he had always understood that when a horse's ears were split it was to signify that the animal was mean or vicious; and that he had never heard of such a thing being done for the purpose of identifying an animal, or as a mark of ownership. There was evidence that the defendant had admitted that at the time he slit the ears of the animal he knew that it belonged to Thomas Beasore. It was admitted that the defendant branded the colt and slit its ears, and afterwards burned out the brand and turned the colt loose. The testimony was without conflict to the effect that it has been a custom for many years to split the ears of vicious or unmanageable horses, that a split in a horse's ear was intended to signify that the horse was vicious, and that such splits are never used as marks of ownership.

The foregoing is substantially all the evidence shown by the record. The defendant acknowledging that he slit the ears of the colt, and there being evidence sufficient to sustain a finding by the jury that at the time he so did he knew that the animal belonged to and was the property of Thomas Beasore, the question remained as to whether the slitting was done for the purpose of preventing identification of the animal by Beasore. Upon this question we cannot say that the finding of the jury is not sustained by the evidence. Where some particular intent is a necessary element to constitute an act a crime, such intent may be sufficiently shown by the circumstances surrounding the commission of the act. Here, in support of the verdict, it must be assumed that the defendant knew that the colt was the property of Beasore, and that he did not think it was an estray. Under these circumstances he, having taken the animal from the range where it was grazing, placed a brand upon it and slit its ears. The evidence as to the placing of the brand on the animal was, of course, material and competent upon the question as to what the intention of the defendant was in the slitting of the ears. Both things were done by the defendant at the same time, and apparently, despite defendant's statement to the contrary, for the same purpose. The nature of the act, the thus double marking of the animal by brand and mark, and the circumstances attending the doing thereof, including statements made by defendant which the jury found to be untrue, were sufficient to sustain the finding that the slitting was done for the purpose of preventing identification of the animal. That it might reasonably assist in accomplishing that purpose is very clear, even if such slits are not ordinarily used as marks of ownership, and are generally used simply to indicate a vicious animal. The statement of the defendant as to his reason for thus marking the animal was, of course, not conclusive upon the jury. The most that can be said for defendant is that there was a conflict in the evidence as to the intent with which the act was done, and the well-settled rule that the appellate court will not, under such circumstances, disturb the finding of the jury, prohibits us from interfering therewith.

The case of Fossett v. State, 11 Tex. App. 40, 45, relied on by defendant, fully recognizes the rule that "the surrounding facts—the facts and circumstances which hover around and give character to the act"—are to be taken into consideration in determining as to the intent with which such an act as is here involved is done.

3. Complaint is made that the court refused to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. We have examined these requested instructions, and find no error in the action of the court. The court did instruct the jury that, before they could convict the defendant, they must be convinced by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the slitting of the horse's ears was such a marking of an animal as might prevent the identification thereof by the true owner; and this was certainly as liberal an instruction in regard to the character of the mark as the defendant was entitled to. As has been said before, it is the placing of any mark upon the animal, with the intent thereby to prevent identification by the owner, that is denounced by the statute here involved. Whether the mark adopted by the offender for that purpose is such that it will accomplish the result desired is not material. What the statute really makes an offense is an attempt to prevent the identification of the animal by the true owner, by the placing of a mark thereon. As in the case of an attempt to commit a crime, it is not essential that the means used should in fact be capable of accomplishing the result designed. The jury were very fully instructed that they could not convict the defendant unless they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant slit the animal's ears for the purpose of preventing its identification by the true owner.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

MAZOR v. SPRINGER et al. (S. F. 3,054.)

NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—TIME OF DISCOVERY.

1. In an action against two defendants for work and labor, one defendant admitted that the work was performed at his request, and plaintiff and another witness testified that the other defendant also requested the performance of the work. On motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence it was claimed that the defendant last mentioned was not at the place where this request was claimed to have been made on the date at which it was claimed to have been made; but no witnesses other than those present at the trial were mentioned as able to testify to this effect. No excuse for not calling these witnesses was produced, except the statement in the affidavit of the defendant who requested the services that the fact of the other defendant's absence at the time of the alleged interview had not occurred to defendants until after the trial. Held, that as the new evidence would not affect the liability of affiant and as he was not qualified to speak for the other defendant, a new trial was properly refused.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Action by Stanislaus Mazor against Mary Springer and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. H. Campbell, for appellants. B. A. Herrington, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover wages for labor performed. Defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

There was sufficient evidence to prove the allegation that the plaintiff performed the work in question at the request of the defendant Mary Springer. The plaintiff testifies positively to that effect, and he was corroborated by the witness Gilman. The answer does not deny the request so far as the defendant Sage is concerned. The plaintiff also testified, in effect, that the agreement was that he was to receive $15 for the first month and $25 per month thereafter, and that he worked the entire time for which he claims, except 17 days. This was sufficient to support the verdict. We cannot say, from the evidence, that the jury did not deduct the wages for the time he was absent, nor can we disturb the verdict, where the evidence is conflicting, although the preponderance may now seem to be for the defendants.

The court did not err in denying the motion for a new trial on the ground of surprise at the testimony of Gilman concerning the contract made in his presence between the plaintiff and the defendant Springer, and of the discovery of new evidence relating thereto. The new evidence was to the effect that on the afternoon on which Gilman said the conversation took place at the house of Mary Springer she was "many miles distant" from the house. It is not alleged that there was any witness, other than those present at the trial, by whom her absence at that time could have been proven; nor is her whereabouts at that time stated. The only excuse for not calling the witnesses present at the trial to testify to her absence was that contained in the affidavit of the defendant Sage, that the "fact of the absence of Mary Springer from the said Springer farm did not occur to their (defendants') minds until several days after the trial was concluded." Her absence, if proven, would not affect the liability of Sage, who admits making the request. He was not qualified to speak concerning the mind and memory of Mrs. Springer, and she made no affidavit. Under these circumstances the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing a new trial upon these grounds.

The judgment and the order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial are affirmed.

HARRISON v. ROBERTS et al. (S. F. 4,090.)*

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CHARTER AMENDMENTS—APPROVAL BY MAYOR—SUBMISSION TO POPULAR VOTE.

1. Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a freeholders' charter may be amended "at intervals of not less than two years" by proposals therefor submitted to the qualified electors of the city at a general or special election, and ratified by a majority of such electors and approved by the Legislature, refers, in so far as it prohibits amendments at intervals of less than two years, solely to the time of the general or special election at which a proposed amendment is submitted for ratification, so that proposals for amendments may be submitted at elections only at intervals of two years.

2. Const. art. 11, § 8, provides for the amendment of freeholders' charters by proposals submitted to the qualified electors by the "legislative authority of the city." San Francisco Charter (St. 1899, p. 244, art. 2, c. 1, § 1) provides that the legislative power of the city shall be vested in a legislative body, which shall be designated as the board of supervisors. Article 4, c. 1, § 1 (page 268), of the same chapter, declares the mayor to be the chief executive officer of the city; but article 2, c. 1, § 16 (page 246), requires certain bills and resolutions (which do not, however, include proposals for amendments to the charter) to be presented to the mayor for his approval. Held, that the mayor of the city is not a part of its legislative authority, nor does chapter 1, art. 2, § 5, of the charter (page 244), making him the presiding officer of the board of supervisors, render him such, and proposals for charter amendments need not be concurred in by him, or presented to him for approval, as prerequisites to their submission to the electors.

In Bank. Application for a writ of mandate by Joseph N. Harrison against Robert W. Roberts and others. Denied.

Lane, Ledeman & Lane and Cameron H. King, for petitioner. Percy V. Long and Devoto & Richardson, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. An application was made to this court for a writ of mandate requiring defendants, who are the board of election commissioners and the registrar of voters of the city and county of San Francisco, to prepare and cause to be printed upon the ballots to be used at the general election to be held on November 8, 1904, a column, with voting squares, whereby the electors may indicate their votes upon certain proposals to amend the charter of said city and county, which, it is claimed, should be voted on at such election. As it was necessary to immediately act upon the application, the matter was decided by this court on October 21, 1904, without the filing of any written opinion. By that decision the application for a writ of mandate was denied. This opinion is now filed to indicate the views of the court upon the questions presented by the application.

*Petition for modification of decision denied November 19, 1904.

The main question presented by the application is as to the proper construction of the provisions of the Constitution relative to the time when proposed amendments of a municipal freeholders' charter may be ratified by the electors of the municipality. The provision of the constitution under which a Freeholders' charter may be amended is as follows: "The charter, so ratified, may be amended at intervals of not less than two yeads by proposals therefor, submitted by the legislative authority of the city to the qualified electors thereof at a general or special election, held at least forty days after the publication of such proposals for twenty days in a daily newspaper of general circulation in such city, and ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon, and approved by the Legislature as herein provided for the approval of the charter." Article 11, § 8. It will thus be seen that it is essential to any amendment that a proposal therefor be submitted to the qualified electors of the municipality at a general or special election, and that such proposal be ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon. This proposal must emanate from the legislative authority of the municipality, and, by reason of another provision of the Constitution, such legislative authority must submit to the electors any proposed amendments petitioned for by 15 per cent. "of the qualified voters of the city." Amendments ratified by the electors, like the original charter, may be approved or rejected, as a whole, by the Legislature of the state, which body, however, has no power of alteration or amendment thereof. Such approval may be made by concurrent resolution, and the amendments take effect only upon such approval being given. The Constitution explicitly provides, as appears from the portion hereinbefore quoted, that the charter may be amended only at intervals of not less than two years.

It appears that on December 4, 1902, a special election was held in the city and county of San Francisco, at which election there were submitted to the electors thereof, for ratification, certain proposed amendments to the charter. These amendments had been proposed by the legislative authority by resolutions adopted at different dates between July 12 and August 10, 1902. At this election certain of the amendments so proposed were ratified by the necessary majority of the electors, and said amendments were on February 5, 1903, approved by the Legislature, by concurrent resolution. St. 1903, p. 583, c. 11. It thus appears that two years will not have expired on November 8, 1904, since certain proposed charter amendments subsequently approved by the Legislature were ratified by the electors of the city and county of San Francisco. If the constitutional provision quoted above, in so far as it declares that the charter "may be amended" only "at intervals of not less than two years," has reference solely to the time of the general or special election at which a proposed amendment is submitted for ratification, it must be admitted that any ratification by the electors of the amendments here proposed, had within two years of December 4, 1902, would be in violation of such constitutional provision, and therefore invalid. That such is the proper construction of that provision, we entertain no doubt. The correctness thereof is more clearly perceived on a consideration of the only other constructions possible. If the provision does not have reference solely to the date of election by the people, it must mean either that none of the steps essential to the taking effect of an amendment, viz., proposal, ratification by the people, and approval by the Legislature, can be taken within two years after the approval by the Legislature of a prior amendment, or simply that no charter amendment must be approved by the Legislature within two years after a prior approval by the Legislature of an amendment of the same charter.

It will be observed that the first of these constructions could not assist plaintiff in this proceeding, it being sought by him to have the proposals for certain amendments submitted to the electors within less than two years from the approval by the Legislature of prior amendments; but we deem it proper to indicate our views thereon, as the question is one of importance to all municipal corporations existing under freeholders' charters. The effect of this construction would be that while the Constitution, in terms, declares, that "the charter * * * may be amended" at intervals of two years, amendments could, in fact, in the absence of a special session of the Legislature, be fully accomplished and put into effect only at intervals of nearly four years. Two years would be required to elapse after the approval of the amendment by the Legislature before another proposal could be made by the legislative authority of a municipality, which, with the time required for notice of the election, would carry the matter beyond reach of the Legislature at the succeeding regular session, and defer proceedings for practically another two years. It seems very clear that it was the intention that whatever is here authorized by the constitutional provision, might be fully accomplished at intervals of two years.

The second construction suggested, viz., that the provision simply means that no charter amendment may be approved by the Legislature within two years after a prior approval by the Legislature of an amendment of the same charter, is the only one that could avail plaintiff in this proceeding. This construction would make the provision as to time referable solely to the approval by the state of an amendment theretofore ratified by the people of a municipality, and render it a prohibition on the Legislature of the state, rather than a prohibition on the municipality. Although the electors of the city had ratified the amendment, and the municipality had completed every act within its power to perform in a matter relating solely to its municipal affairs, the approval of the state could not be given until the lapse of precisely two years from a prior approval by the state of any amendment to the same charter. The effect of this construction would be that proposed amendments might be submitted to the people of the municipality for ratification as often as the legislative authority of the city, or 15 per cent. of the electors thereof, expressed, in proper form, their desire for such submission. Special elections on amendments, with all the attendant disturbances and cost, could be as frequent as a few officers or a small minority of the electors might determine; and the prohibition as to time, undoubtedly inserted for some good purpose, would simply defer the ordinarily formal action by the state Legislature, and the consequent taking effect of an amendment. It is impossible to conceive of any good object to be attained by thus expressly deferring for a specified time simply the action of the Legislature upon an amendment which has been ratified by the people of a municipality. Such a provision would not, in any substantial degree, tend to permanency of charter provisions. Under our system of biennial sessions of the Legislature, the approval of amendments can, in the nature of things, be had only at intervals of approximately two years, in the absence of the very exceptional case of a special session, and therefore no provision as to the time of approval was necessary to insure practically all that could have been contemplated in the way of permanency by the provision under consideration. A mere delay for a few days by the Legislature in the matter of the approval of amendments ratified by the electors, could not have been the object sought to be attained. The real essential to an amendment is, after all, the ratification by the people at an election. The submission of the proposal to amend is, of course, essential as a preliminary, for in no other way could an opportunity for the electors to formally express their desires be had; but, as already noted, a small minority of the electors may compel such submission. The approval by the Legislature subsequent to the ratification has also been made essential to the taking effect of the amendment, but, under our well-settled policy of municipal self-government in municipal affairs, this approval is practically only a formal matter, where the subject-matter of the amendment is within the proper scope of the municipal charter. No instance of the rejection by the Legislature of a proposed municipal charter or any amendment thereto has yet been recorded, so far as we have been able to find. When amendments to a charter have once been ratified by the necessary number of electors, it is practically settled that they will, in due course, be approved and take effect. The Legislature, it is true, has the power to reject them; but it could never have been contemplated that this power would be exercised, except so far as might be necessary in the protection of the interests of the state and the citizens of the state, as contradistinguished from the interests of the municipalities. Practically, it is the ratification of the proposal for amendment by the electors of the municipality that determines the change in charter provisions, and any provision of law designed to obtain more or less permanency in the terms of the charter, to be effectual, would naturally be addressed to the time of such ratification, i. e., to the general or special election at which the amendment is voted upon. That this was one of the objects of the provision under discussion is very clear. This court has already said thereof in Blanchard v. Hartwell, 131 Cal. 263, 265, 63 Pac. 349, 350, "Here is a clear and positive constitutional policy, calculated to insure some degree of permanency and to prevent frequent changes."

Another apparent object of the limitation as to time was to protect the municipality against the expense and disturbance of frequent elections. Economy and a certain degree of permanency in charter provisions are the only objects of such a limitation that can reasonably be suggested, and these objects can be substantially subserved by no other reasonable construction of the constitutional provision before us than the one to the effect that the limitation as to time has reference solely to the general or special election at which proposed amendments are submitted for ratification by the electors of the municipality. Our conclusion upon this question is that the only effect of the limitation as to time is to prohibit a submission for ratification by the electors of any proposed amendment within two years from the submission for ratification of any prior amendment; in other words, that proposals for amendments may be submitted at elections only at intervals of two years.

It is suggested that the practical effect of this decision will be, in this instance, to put the city and county of San Francisco to the expense of a special election on the proposed amendments, if such amendments are to be acted upon at the next session of the Legislature. This is, of course, true, but we are unable to see how it affects the question as to the proper construction of the constitutional provision. The practical effect of our construction of the constitutional provision will also be that a municipality can be put to such expense only once in every two years, while the construction contended for would give the municipality as many special elections on such questions as the legislative authority of the city, or 15 per cent. of the electors thereof, desired.

It was contended by respondents that said proposals were not legally adopted by the board of supervisors, in that the resolutions therefor were not signed by the mayor of the city, or presented to him for his signature or approval. The Constitution declares that the proposals are to be submitted by the "legislative authority of the city." The charter of San Francisco declares (section 1, c. 1, art. 2, St. 1899, p. 244): "The legislative power of the city and county of San Francisco shall be vested in a legislative body, which shall be designated the board of supervisors." And section 1 of chapter 1, art. 4 (page 268), declares that the mayor is the chief executive officer of the city and county. The "legislative authority" of the city and county is therefore vested in the board of supervisors. The requirement in section 16, c. 1, art. 2 (page 246), that certain bills and resolutions which shall have been passed by the board of supervisors shall be presented to the mayor for his approval, gives him a qualified veto upon the action of the board, but does not make him a constituent part of the legislative authority of the city and county. The provision in this section is, moreover, limited to the bills and resolutions "hereinbefore provided," and does not include proposals for amendments to the charter. The provision in section 5 of chapter 1, art. 2, that he shall be presiding officer of the board of supervisors, confers upon him no more legislative authority than is given to the Lieutenant Governor by being president of the Senate. Under the provision of section 34 of the street improvement act (St. 1883, p. 45, c. 24) that the term "city council" includes a body or board which under the law is the legislative department of the government of any city, it was held in McDonald v. Dodge, 97 Cal. 112, 31 Pac. 909, that the board of supervisors of San Francisco is the body which forms the legislative department of the government of the city; the court saying: "It is true that the mayor, by virtue of his right of veto in certain cases, has some of the lawmaking power of the municipality; but the charter of the city does not make him a part of the legislative department, in the sense that no independent power is or can be given to the latter." In Jacobs v. Board of Supervisors, 100 Cal. 121, 34 Pac. 630, it was held that the constitutional provision for the fixing of water rates by the board of supervisors, or other governing body of the city and county, did not require the ordinance fixing such rates to be presented to the mayor of San Francisco for his approval. See, also, Brooks v. Fischer, 79 Cal. 173, 42 Pac. 570; Truman v. Supervisors, 110 Cal. 128, 42 Pac. 421.

It must be held, therefore, that it was not necessary that the proposals for amendment should be concurred in by the mayor, or presented to him for approval.

The application for the writ of mandate having been already denied, no further order is necessary.

GAY v. TORRANCE, Judge. (S. F. 3,980.)

MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—IRREGULARITY IN TRIAL COURT—STRIKING OUT AFFIDAVITS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MANDAMUS.

1. A motion for a new trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1, for irregularities "in the proceedings of the court" must be made on affidavits.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 939, subd. 3, an appeal lies from a special order striking from the files affidavits on a motion for a new trial.

3. On appeal from an order striking from the files affidavits on motion for a new trial appellant is entitled to a bill of exceptions.

4. Personal misconduct of the judge having a case under advisement may be an "irregularity in the proceedings of the court" for which a new trial may be granted under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 1.

5. On a petition for a mandate requiring a trial judge to settle and certify his bill of exceptions on appeal from an order striking from the files affidavits on motion for a new trial because of irregularities of the trial judge, the court will not determine any conflict in the evidence as to such irregularities.

6. An affidavit on a motion for a new trial for irregularities in the proceedings of the court cannot be considered when made merely on information and belief.

7. A writ of mandate does not lie to require a trial judge to include in a bill of exceptions to review an order on a motion for a new trial an affidavit made on information and belief.

In Bank. Petition by Lucile D. Gay for mandate to the superior court of San Diego county. Denied.

Victor E. Shaw and Valentine & Newby, for petitioner. Oscar A. Trippet and L. L. Boone (W. C. Van Fleet, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The petitioner, Lucile D. Gay, is the plaintiff in an action for divorce pending in the superior court of the county of San Diego. The defendant therein, John H. Gay, having filed an answer and cross-complaint, the action was tried, and an interlocutory judgment was rendered declaring that the defendant, John H. Gay, was entitled to a divorce on his cross-complaint.

Subsequently petitioner served and filed her notice of intention to move for a new trial upon various grounds, including "irregularities in the proceedings of the court which prevented plaintiff from having a fair trial." The notice stated that the motion would be made upon affidavits and upon a bill of exceptions. Subsequently petitioner served her proposed bill of exceptions and affidavits, and filed the affidavits with the clerk of the court. Among the affidavits so served and filed were two devoted to the attempt to show irregularities in the proceedings of the court, viz., those of Willia Hosmon and Nathan Newby. The defendant in the action in due time served and filed counter affidavits upon the question as to irregularities of the court, and subsequently petitioner served and left with the clerk for filing certain reply affidavits. Subsequently the trial court, upon the motion of defendant in said action, upon the grounds, among others, that one of the affidavits was made solely on information and belief, and that the matters contained in all said affidavits were useless, immaterial, impertinent, and scandalous, consisting of offensive personalities and scandalous charges against the judge who tried the cause, made an order striking from the files the affidavits of Nathan Newby and Willia Hosmon and the reply affidavits of Sallie Jones and Willia Hosmon. On motion of defendant a further order was made striking from the files the counter affidavits upon the ground that it would be improper to permit the same to remain on file after the affidavits to which they relate had been stricken out.

The petitioner proposed a bill of exceptions to be used on appeals from the orders striking out the affidavits, and amendments were proposed thereto, and thereafter an engrossed bill was presented to respondent for authentication, whereupon respondent refused to allow or to certify said bill of exceptions. Subsequently petitioner perfected her appeal to this court from the orders striking out the affidavits.

The foregoing facts appear from the petition, which, for the purposes of the demurrer thereto, must be taken as true. Petitioner asks for a writ of mandate commanding respondent to forthwith settle and certify the bill of exceptions containing the affidavits stricken out, to be used upon the appeals from the orders striking out said affidavits, and for a writ of prohibition restraining respondent from hearing her motion for a new trial pending the hearing in this court of such appeals. An alternative writ was issued requiring respondent to settle and certify said bill of exceptions containing said affidavits, or show cause why he had not so done.

The sufficiency of the petition to justify the relief sought is challenged by a motion to strike out the petition and by a demurrer. The alleged irregularities in the proceedings of the court to which the affidavits in question referred were alleged acts and conduct of the judge between the time of the submission of the case for decision on October 7, 1903, and the time of the rendition of the decision, October 29, 1903, constituting, it is claimed, misconduct of such a nature and to such an extent as to render the granting of a new trial necessary or proper, under subdivision 1 of section 657, Code Civ. Proc. That section provides that a new trial may be granted "for any of the following causes, materially affecting the substantial rights of such party: (1) Irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury, or adverse party. * * *" So far as a motion for a new trial is based upon such a ground, it must be made upon affidavits (section 658, Code. Civ. Proc.), and the moving party is, of course, entitled to have such competent affidavits as are material to the motion, and are seasonably served and filed, considered upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. A trial court would not be justified in striking any such affidavits from the files of the court, and an order purporting to so do, being a special order made after final judgment, would be appealable under subdivision 3, § 939, Code Civ. Proc. Gay v. Torrance (Cal.) 76 Pac. 973. Upon an appeal from such an order the aggrieved party is entitled to a bill of exceptions presenting the proceedings and rulings of the lower court in such shape that the action of such court may be reviewed by the appellate tribunal. Ordinarily, upon such an appeal, the affidavits stricken out would necessarily constitute the most material part of such a bill of exceptions. So far as the strict letter of the law is concerned, there can be no doubt that the petitioner is entitled, upon her appeal from the orders striking out certain affidavits, to a bill of exceptions containing such affidavits.

It is true, as contended by learned counsel for respondent, that the granting of the writ of mandamus is not a matter of right, but is a matter largely within the discretion of the court. By this, however, it is not meant that the court may arbitrarily grant or refuse the writ. The discretion is to be exercised in accordance with the established rules of law, in order to prevent a failure of justice. As a court will not do a vain or fruitless thing, or, as was said by Chancellor Kent in Trustees, etc., v. Nicoll, 3 Johns. 598, "a court will not undertake to exercise power but when they exercise it to some purpose" (see Boyne v. Ryan, 100 Cal. 265, 267, 34 Pac. 707), it is laid down as a rule of law that the writ of mandate will not issue where it would be of no benefit to the applicant (Merrill on Mandamus, § 75; High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, §§ 9, 10); that a mere abstract right, unattended by any substantial benefit to the relator, will not be enforced by mandamus (19 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 758); and that, where the relator has no right to the relief which it is his ultimate object to obtain, the writ should not be issued (Id. p. 754). This rule has been applied by this court on several occasions. See People v. Kahl, 18 Cal. 432; People v. Dickson, 46 Cal. 53; Clarke v. Crane, 57 Cal. 629. But where one has a substantial right to protect or enforce, and this may be accomplished by such a writ, and there is no other plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, he is entitled, as a matter of right, to the writ; or, in other words, it would be an abuse of discretion to refuse it.

A party aggrieved is entitled to move for a new trial upon the ground of irregularity in the proceedings of the court materially affecting his substantial rights; he is entitled to present and file affidavits in support of such ground; he is entitled to have such affidavits, so far as they may be competent and material, considered upon the hearing of the motion by the trial court; and he is entitled to the judgment of such trial court as to the truth of the material allegations contained in the affidavits, and the effect thereof upon his rights. His right to have his affidavits, so far as they are competent and material, considered by the trial court, and his right to have the judgment of the trial court upon all material questions of fact concerning which there is any conflict in the affidavits, cannot be said to be mere abstract rights, unattended by any substantial benefit. They are rights guarantied by the law to every party prosecuting a motion for a new trial, and no court can say in advance of the action of the trial court on such motion that the ultimate decision thereon will not be in favor of the moving party. So far, therefore, as the affidavits presented by petitioner on the motion for a new trial were competent and material upon the question as to whether a new trial should be granted for irregularities in the proceedings of the court, it could not properly be said, in response to an application for a writ of mandate having for its ultimate object the consideration by the trial court of such affidavits upon the motion for a new trial, that the writ could be refused upon the ground that the granting of such a writ is a matter largely within the discretion of the court to which the application is made.

We are not prepared to assent to the contention of learned counsel for respondent to the effect that personal misconduct on the part of the judge of a court having under advisement a case tried in his court cannot be an "irregularity in the proceedings of the court" for which a new trial may be granted under subdivision 1 of section 657, Code Civ. Proc. It must be acknowledged that the misconduct of a judge under such circumstances may be of such a nature as to make it apparent that the substantial rights of a party have been materially affected thereby, as, for instance, where it is made to appear that he has received a bribe from one of the parties to the cause, or has so conducted himself with reference to a party to the cause as to show that he cannot well act toward such party without favoritism, or has so impaired his mental powers by the use of intoxicants that, while engaged in the actual disposition of the cause, he was incapable of properly exercising his judgment thereon. As has been said, it would shock the judicial instinct and be a reproach to our system, if a decision rendered under such circumstances could not, for that reason, be set aside, and yet, if the contention of respondent in this behalf be well founded, there would be no substantial remedy for the aggrieved party. There is no other ground for a new trial which could, by the utmost liberality of construction, be held to cover such a case. But we are of the opinion that it would be an exceedingly narrow and technical construction that would exclude such a case from the operation of subdivision 1 of section 657, Code Civ. Proc. It was said by Mr. Hayne in his work on New Trial and Appeal that it is impossible to answer with precision the question, "What is an irregularity of the court?" except that by that term is meant some conduct of the court other than orders and rulings; and that no accurate classification of things which are irregular is possible. Mr. Spelling, in his recent work on New Trial and Appeal, regards any overt act of the trial court violative of the right of a party to a fair and impartial trial, amounting to misconduct, as an irregularity, and says, "Courts of review treat misconduct of trial courts as irregularity." Section 32. In Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 200, 205, 62 Pac. 473, it was said by this court that this ground for a new trial is intended to refer to matters which appellant cannot fully present by exceptions taken during the progress of the trial, and which must, therefore, appear by affidavits. The language of the statute is sufficiently broad to include any departure by the court from the due and orderly method of disposition of an action by which the substantial rights of a party have been materially affected, where such departure is not evidenced by a ruling or order that may be made the subject of an exception. It may, of course, be freely conceded that the "personal habits, conduct, deportment, or statements of the judge" having no relation to or effect on the disposition of the cause are not the proper subject of complaint upon a motion for a new trial. The question always is as to whether the acts were of such a nature and done under such circumstances as to afford reasonable grounds for the conclusion that by reason thereof the defeated party has not had a fair and impartial trial. Where they are of this kind, we are satisfied that they afford the basis for a motion for new trial under subdivision 1 of section 657, Code Civ. Proc. The opinion of the Supreme Court of Montana in the case of Finlen v. Heinze, 28 Mont. 548, 571, 73 Pac. 123, is instructive upon this subject, and is in full accord with our views. Most of the cases cited by counsel for respondent upon the definition of an irregularity are cases in which the term "irregularity" was used in contradistinction to jurisdictional defects.

It would serve no useful purpose to here enter into an analysis of the affidavit made by Willia Hosmon, presented on behalf of petitioner. It is sufficient to say that after a careful consideration thereof we are not prepared to say that if the trial court, after a full consideration thereof and of the counter affidavits presented in reply thereto, and the subsequent reply affidavits presented on behalf of petitioner, should grant a new trial on the ground of irregularities in the proceedings of the court, we should feel warranted in disturbing the order. (In saying this we do not wish to be understood as intimating that the trial court should grant a new trial on this ground upon the showing made.) We cannot, however, upon this application, determine any conflict in the evidence upon the question of irregularities in the proceedings of the court. That is a matter upon which petitioner is entitled to a determination by the trial court.

As to the affidavit of Mr. Newby, one of petitioner's attorneys, presented in support of the motion, a different question is presented. So far as it can possibly be claimed to be material, it was entirely made on "information and belief," nothing material to the question of irregularities being therein stated as a fact within the knowledge of the deponent. Unless this affidavit constituted competent evidence upon the question of irregularities, it was purely scandalous matter assailing the judge of the court, and serving no useful purpose; and it was not only the right, but the duty, of the court to strike the same from its records. If, therefore, it is clear to us upon this proceeding that the affidavit cannot be considered upon the motion for a new trial, and consequently that petitioner cannot ultimately have any substantial benefit therefrom, we undoubtedly would be justified in refusing to compel the respondent to make such purely scandalous and immaterial matter a permanent record of his court by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions. Such a situation would not only present a case for the application of the rule already alluded to as to the discretion of the court in the matter of an application for a writ of mandate, but would imperatively require the application of such rule, for it certainly is not consistent with the efficient administration of the law by the courts that scandalous charges against a judge of a court, not materially affecting an issue before such court, should be allowed to be made a permanent record thereof. Such a practice should be tolerated, as was said in effect in People v. Albany & S. R. R. Co., 39 How. Prac. 60, only where absolutely necessary for the proper protection of a party to a cause.

If it should be assumed that the matters set forth on information and belief in the affidavit of Mr. Newby constituted irregularities in the proceedings of the court which would warrant the granting of a new trial by the trial court (which we do not concede), we are satisfied that such affidavit cannot be considered competent evidence as to these matters. Ordinarily, an affidavit made solely on information and belief is unavailing for any purpose. The statutes allow such affidavits for certain prescribed purposes (as, for instance, in the verification of pleadings), but there is no statutory provision authorizing such an affidavit in a case like the one at bar. The subject-matter of certain applications (as, for instance, an application for a continuance upon the ground of the absence of witnesses) is of such a nature that from the necessities of the case the showing as to what the absent witness will testify to must ordinarily be made by the moving party upon information and belief, and the statute upon the subject so recognizes. Section 595, Code Civ. Proc. But where one is testifying as to something that has transpired he can ordinarily testify only as to those facts which he knows of his own knowledge (section 1845, Code Civ. Proc.), and it is immaterial in this connection whether his testimony is taken by affidavit, deposition, or oral examination. Where a statute provides that the evidence upon a certain question must be presented by affidavit, it simply means that the competent and material testimony must be presented by the affidavits of the witnesses. If the statute authorized the taking of the testimony on a motion for new trial by oral examination, we apprehend that it would not be contended that Mr. Newby could have given purely hearsay testimony. Information and belief affidavits in cases where misconduct of the jury has been urged as ground for a new trial have been held by this court to be insufficient. In People v. Findley, 132 Cal. 301, 303, 64 Pac. 472, it was said: "It is equally clear that defendant's affidavit as to the misconduct of the jury, based as it is solely on information and belief, is entitled to no weight. There was no competent or proper evidence of misconduct of the jury laid before the court." See, also, People v. Tarm Poi, 86 Cal. 225, 231, 24 Pac. 998; People v. Williams, 24 Cal. 31, 40. We cannot see that the reasons stated in the affidavit for the making of the same on information and belief, viz., that the persons who knew the facts had refused to make affidavit, can alter the situation. It still remains that there is "no competent or proper evidence" contained therein, and, if petitioner is unable to procure competent evidence as to the alleged irregularities, she cannot establish the same. It follows that this court will not require the respondent to make such affidavit a permanent record of his court.

So far as the counter affidavits are applicable to the issues raised by the affidavit of Willia Hosmon, they are undoubtedly competent and material evidence to which both parties are entitled on the motion for new trial, and we are satisfied that a party moving for a new trial upon affidavits is entitled to present reply affidavits as to new matters set up in the counter affidavits. The petitioner not being entitled to a bill of exceptions containing the affidavit of Mr. Newby, she must necessarily fail upon this application.

The demand made upon respondent by petitioner was that he should allow and certify a certain proposed bill of exceptions containing all of the affidavits stricken out, the application to this court is for a writ requiring respondent to forthwith settle and certify "the bill of exceptions containing said affidavits," and the alternative writ required him to "settle and certify said bill of exceptions containing said affidavits," or show cause why he has not so done. It is well settled that a petitioner for a writ of mandate is concluded by the terms of the alternative writ, and that, where the alternative writ is awarded for a purpose partly proper and partly improper, the court will not enforce it by a peremptory mandamus as to that which is proper, but will give judgment for the respondent. It is incumbent upon the petitioner in such a proceeding to establish his right to the performance of the very act or acts commanded by the alternative writ, and, unless he so does, he must fail entirely. High, Extraordinary Legal Rem. §§ 539, 548.

Petitioner is entitled to a bill of exceptions to be used upon her appeal from the orders striking out the affidavits, containing such affidavits as may be competent and material upon the question as to whether a new trial should be granted on the ground of irregularities in the proceedings of the court.

We have herein given our views as to what affidavits should receive the consideration of the trial court upon the motion for a new trial. Such affidavits should, of course, remain on the files of the court, and an order striking them from the files would necessarily, upon an appeal duly taken and regularly prosecuted, be reversed. The restoration of such affidavits to the files of the court would make unnecessary the further prosecution of the appeals taken by the petitioner. If such restoration be not so made, doubtless the trial court will, upon demand, settle and certify a bill of exceptions containing such material and competent affidavits as may be necessary for the proper disposition of such appeals. Those suggestions herein made which are not necessary to a disposition of the present application for a writ of mandate are made with a view to facilitate the disposition of the motion for a new trial in the court below, and to obviate the necessity of applications and appeals to this court, having for their object the making of a proper record for the consideration of the trial court upon the motion for a new trial.

The alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued is discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, and in what is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice ANGELLOTTI, to the point that a court will not grant a writ of mandate where it would be doing a vain thing of no benefit to the applicant, and also in what is said about the affidavit of Newby. But in my opinion there is nothing in the affidavits of Willia Hosmon and other affidavits filed by petitioner that by any proper construction can be considered as constituting, or tending in any way to show, an "irregularity in the proceedings of the court," within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

2. Where a trust deed provided that the trustees shall at all times keep the premises free from any and all incumbrances other than a mortgage referred to in the deed, the execution by the trustees of another mortgage was in contravention of the trust and void, under Civ. Code, § 870.

May 23, 1889, William Gardiner (the plaintiff herein), Adeline Jonson (now Adeline Cord), Annie Allen, James Allen (defendants herein), Benjamin Allen, and Catherine Allen were the owners in fee, as tenants in common, of the said real property, each being the owner of an undivided sixth thereof, and on that day entered into and executed an agreement with each other, wherein, as a means of facilitating the accomplishment of the purpose of said agreement, the said William Gardiner, Annie Allen, Catherine Allen, and Benjamin Allen, as the parties of the first part thereto, conveyed the said property to James Allen and Adeline Jonson, as the parties of the second part thereto, in trust for certain purposes therein declared and hereinafter mentioned. After reciting in the agreement their respective ownership of the property, they recite that they are severally and individually indebted in certain amounts, aggregating about $24,000 (giving the amount of the indebtedness of each and the name of the respective creditors), and that said indebtedness is secured by mortgage and other liens upon the above property, and that they had agreed to consolidate the said indebtedness in a single loan, and were about to execute a joint and several mortgage of said property to secure the same, irrespective of their proportionate individual indebtedness, and that for the purpose of liquidating said mortgage indebtedness they had leased the said property for a term expiring January 1, 1892, and had agreed that the monthly rent therein provided, or a portion thereof, should be applied each month in payment of said mortgage indebtedness, and that "inasmuch as it would greatly facilitate the management and control of the said property, and the transaction of business in connection with the same, to vest the same in trust," they had mutually agreed to appoint the parties of the second part thereto as trustees for the uses and purposes thereinafter declared. The agreement thereupon declares that "for and in consideration of the premises the parties of the first part do hereby grant the said real property unto the parties of the second part, to the survivor of them and their successors, upon trust to enter into and upon the same and take possession thereof. * * * And the said real property shall be managed and controlled by the said trustees until the full payment of the said mortgage so executed as aforesaid, and they are at all times to keep the same free from any and all incumbrances other than the mortgage hereinbefore referred to; and to at all times keep the premises fully insured. Thirty days before the expiration of the term of said lease they are to advertise said premises to let in two daily papers for four weeks and to let the same to the highest and best bidder for a term not to exceed the term of this trust. At the expiration of this trust the said trustees shall reconvey the said premises to the said parties of the first part in the proportion of one-sixth each, and during the continuance of said trust they are to render them monthly accounts of the moneys received and disbursed by them."

In addition to this transfer of the real property, the said parties of the first part authorized the parties of the second part to receive the moneys to be procured under the joint mortgage, whose execution had been agreed upon, and to dispose of the same by paying the said specified indebtedness and liabilities of the several parties to the agreement. They also provided in said agreement for the liquidation of the said mortgage indebtedness by applying in payment thereon from time to time a portion of the rents that might accrue upon the aforesaid lease of the property; and for this purpose the parties of the first part assigned and set over the said lease to the parties of the second part, and directed that they should collect the rents reserved in said lease as they should fall due from time to time, and out of the money so collected should pay the quarterly installments of interest upon said mortgage, and, after paying in each month a portion thereof to the several parties to the agreement, should apply the balance then remaining in their hands toward the payment of the principal of said mortgage debt. The agreement also provided that, as between the parties thereto, the amounts paid in discharge of their respective liabilities and indebtedness should be severally charged to their respective accounts, and, to the extent of the payments made for the benefit or account of each, within the limits specified in the instrument, should constitute a lien upon his share or interest in the aforesaid real property, and that the said accounts of the several parties should each be credited with an aliquot part of the rents paid in liquidation of the mortgage debt, until the credits so given to any of the several parties should have paid his proportionate liability for said mortgage debt, and that thereafter his share of the rents, when collected, should be paid directly to him. By the same instrument the parties of the second part granted to the parties of the first part all their interest in the aforesaid real property as security for the faithful performance by them of the duties imposed upon them by virtue of said instrument, and agreed that after such performance they would reconvey to each of said first parties an equal undivided sixth of the fee of said premises.

Adeline Jonson, one of the parties to said agreement, subsequently married William S. Cord, and before the commencement of this action succeeded to the interest of Catherine

Allen in said real estate. Subsequent to the execution of the agreement, Griffin Johnston succeeded to the interest of Benjamin Allen in said real property, and died intestate in 1895, leaving as heirs at law, his widow, the defendant Maud W. Johnston, who afterwards was appointed and qualified as the administratrix of his estate, and an infant daughter, the defendant Grace Margaret Johnston. In June, 1899, James Allen assumed to resign the duties and powers conferred upon him by virtue of said agreement, and since that date the defendant Adeline Cord has had possession and control of said real property.

Immediately upon the execution of the instrument the parties thereto executed their joint note to the German Savings & Loan Society for the sum of $24,000, and a mortgage upon the aforesaid real property to secure its payment; and the said parties of the second part received the said $24,000 from the said mortgagee, and out of the same paid and discharged the indebtedness and obligations which they were authorized by the said agreement to pay, and entered into possession of said real property, and thereafter collected the rents thereof and made payments out of the same upon the said mortgage debt until May 17, 1898, at which time there remained due and unpaid thereon the sum of $8,000. At that time, also, the proportionate shares of said mortgage indebtedness of Annie Allen and of Maud W. Johnston and Grace Margaret Johnston, who had succeeded to the interest of Benjamin Allen in said real property, had been fully paid, and, as between the parties to the agreement of May, 1889, they were not indebted in any sum whatever to said mortgagee. On that day the plaintiff herein, together with Annie Allen, James Allen, Adeline Jonson, and Maud W. Johnston (defendants herein), and Catherine Stare (formerly Catherine Allen), borrowed from W. H. Purcell the sum of $8,000, and executed to him their promissory note therefor, and also a mortgage upon the aforesaid real property as security for its payment. The said James Allen and Adeline Jonson also joined in the execution of the said mortgage as trustees. The court finds that the mortgage was made under an agreement between them for the purpose of paying off the aforesaid mortgage debt, and more effectually carrying out the provisions of the agreement of May 23, 1889. The moneys received upon the said note and mortgage were obtained for, and were paid to, the German Savings & Loan Society, the mortgagee in the former mortgage, on said 17th day of May, 1898, and the said mortgage debt was on said date fully released and satisfied of record. This mortgage to Purcell is still unsatisfied and outstanding. Prior to its execution the plaintiff herein executed to the defendant Annie Allen an instrument of indemnity by which he agreed to hold her harmless from any liability by virtue thereof, and agreed that, as between them, in case of any foreclosure his interest in the properterty should be applied in satisfaction of the mortgage prior to any sale of her interest therein. Other mortgages upon certain of the individual interests in said real property have since said date been executed by the owners thereof, and are still unsatisfied and outstanding.

In February, 1899, in an action brought by the plaintiff herein for that purpose, the superior court rendered a judgment settling the accounts of the defendants Adeline Cord and James Allen for their receipts and disbursements as trustees under the aforesaid agreement of May, 1889, from the time of its execution until September 1, 1898; and in December, 1900, in another action between said trustees, a judgment was rendered settling their accounts as between themselves. By the judgment of February, 1899, it was determined that of the mortgage indebtedness existing against said real property on September 1, 1898, there was due from the plaintiff herein the sum of $5,920.08, and from the defendant Adeline Cord $1,394.50, and from James Allen $933.61; and by the judgment of December, 1900, it was determined that, as between the said Adeline Cord and James Allen, the amount due by the latter on account of the mortgage of May, 1898, was on the 21st of October, 1899, the sum of $274.70. The defendant Adeline Cord has in her hands, of said James Allen's share of the revenues of said property, enough to pay his portion of said mortgage indebtedness, and also of her own share of said revenues enough to pay her portion of said indebtedness as determined by the aforesaid judgment. The plaintiff herein has not paid or offered to pay his share of the said mortgage indebtedness, and, after applying thereon all moneys in the hands of said Adeline Cord applicable thereto, his share of said indebtedness exceeds $4,600.

The superior court held that the agreement of May, 1889, is a valid, subsisting agreement, and that, inasmuch as the indebtedness for whose payment it was entered into has not been fully paid, and as the trustees therein named have not in their hands sufficient moneys with which to pay the same, the agreement has not been fully performed, and that for this reason the plaintiff is not entitled to have a partition of the property or a sale thereof for the purpose of a division of the interests of the several co-tenants therein; that before he can have such relief he must first discharge his portion of the mortgage indebtedness thereon for which the said agreement was entered into.

It is not necessary for the disposition of the present appeal to determine whether a valid trust in the aforesaid real property was created by the instrument of May 23, 1889, as was held by the superior court, or whether, as contended on behalf of the appellant, the provisions therefor in the instrument were in contravention of provisions of the Civil Code, and therefore ineffective to create a trust in said property, as, in our opinion, the rights of the parties which are involved in this action do not depend upon the validity of such trust. By the terms of the instrument, the trust in reference to the real property was to continue only during the life of the mortgage to the German Savings & Loan Society therein provided for, and therefore terminated with its satisfaction, and the payment and extinguishment of the indebtedness secured thereby. The power given to the trustees to manage and control the property was to continue only "until the full payment of the said mortgage debt," and their authority to lease the property upon the expiration of the term then outstanding was only "for a term not to exceed the term of this trust." The mortgage debt to the German Savings & Loan Society was fully paid, and the mortgage itself satisfied, May 17, 1898; and at that date the purpose of the said trust ceased, and the trust itself thereby terminated. For the purpose of the present action it is therefore immaterial whether the said trust, as is contended by the appellant, is to be regarded as having been invalid from the beginning, by reason of an attempted suspension of the power of alienation, or whether the provision therein for a reconveyance upon its termination to the creators of the trust is within the principles declared in Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379, 53 Pac. 813, or is to receive the same construction as would a direction to convey the property to a beneficiary (Estate of Fair, 132 Cal. 523, 60 Pac. 442, 64 Pac. 1000, 84 Am. St. Rep. 70), or whether it be held that by the termination of the trust the estate of the trustees has ceased (Civ. Code, § 871). If the trust was invalid from the beginning, the title and estate of the owners of the land was not affected thereby; and, if it was valid, it has terminated, and the estate of the trustees has ceased, and the rights of the owners of the land can be adjudicated in a court of equity, or in a proceeding like the present one, without the necessity of an actual reconveyance thereof from the trustees. The finding of the court that the moneys received upon the mortgage of May 17, 1898, were obtained for the purpose of paying off the mortgage indebtedness to the German Savings & Loan Society and that said mortgage was made "pursuant to the agreement of May 23, 1889," and for the purpose of a more effectual carrying out of the provisions of said agreement, is not to be construed as a finding that the mortgage to Purcell was impressed with any of the trusts declared in the instrument of 1889, and that by uniting in the execution of the mortgage the trustees were acting under the said trust, or that their act was attended with any validity. The instrument of 1889 declared that the trustees therein named should "at all times keep the premises free from any and all incumbrances other than the mortgage hereinbefore referred to"—the mortgage to the German Savings & Loan Society. The execution of the mortgage to Purcell in 1898 by them "as trustees" was in contravention of the terms of this trust, and therefore void. Civ. Code, § 870. The finding that the mortgage was made pursuant to the agreement of May, 1889, receives full effect by construing it in connection with the provision in the agreement by which the amount of the indebtedness of each of the parties to the instrument was to constitute a lien upon his share of the real property, and be secured by the mortgage to that extent. The mortgage to Purcell is to be regarded, as between the mortgagors therein, merely as creating a lien upon land to the extent of their respective liability for the debt secured thereby. By the instrument of 1889 they had agreed, as between themselves, that the portion of the $24,000 received upon the mortgage then contemplated, which should be paid in satisfaction of their respective liabilities, should to that extent be a lien upon their respective interests in the land, and at the time of the execution of the mortgage to Purcell this lien had been extinguished as to some of the co-tenants, and by the judgments thereafter rendered in the superior court the amount of the indebtedness of the plaintiff, for which his interest in the real estate was secured by the mortgage to Purcell, was ascertained and determined.

The right of the plaintiff to the relief sought by him is therefore not affected by the provision in the agreement of May, 1889, but is to be determined upon the consideration of other principles. Section 752, Code Civ. Proc., gives to any one or more of several co-tenants of real property a right of action for its partition according to the respective rights of the persons interested therein, and for a sale of said property if partition cannot be had, and in the succeeding sections provision is made for ascertaining the respective rights of the parties to the action, and for the satisfaction or other disposition of any liens thereon; and, although a party may by some act or agreement on his part estop himself from enforcing his right to a partition, the mere fact that his interest in the land is subject to a lien or incumbrance will not of itself operate as such estoppel. The fact that the interest of the plaintiff in the land in question is subject to a lien for certain indebtedness, which can be at any time discharged by the payment of said debt, and for whose payment the court is authorized to provide in its judgment of partition or sale, does not deprive him of the right to maintain the action.

The superior court therefore erred in holding that the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain the present action. It should have determined the respective interests of the owners of the land, and the amount of the liens and incumbrances upon the same, or upon the interest of any of them; and if, as between the said owners, any portion of said incumbrances ought, under the rules of equity, or by virtue of any contract, to be borne by one or more of the owners, it should make proper provision for satisfying the same out of the share or shares against which it is chargeable.

The judgment ought therefore to be reversed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is reversed: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

GAYLORD v. CURRY, Secretary of State.
(L. A. 1,694.)

ELECTIONS—PARTIES—RIGHT TO PLACE ON BALLOT.

1. Pol. Code, § 1186, provides that a party represented by a convention in a political division in which sections 1357 to 1375, relative to primary elections, are not mandatory, must have polled, at the last election before the holding of the convention, at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote of the state or other political division for which nominations are to be made. Section 1361 provides that political parties which shall have polled at the last election at least 3 per cent. of the entire vote of the state or other political division for which a primary election is to be held shall be entitled to a place on the official ballot to be used in all primary elections for delegates. Held, that a party which at the last state election polled over 3 per cent. of the total vote of the state is entitled to a place on the congressional ballot in a district where sections 1357 to 1375 are not mandatory, although it failed to cast 3 per cent. of the votes within such district.

In Bank. Application for a peremptory writ of mandate by A. J. Gaylord against Charles F. Curry, Secretary of State. Writ awarded.

Cameron H. King and James Taylor Rogers (Emil Liess, of counsel), for petitioner. Atty. Gen. U. S. Webb, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application by petitioner for a peremptory writ of mandate directed against the Secretary of State to compel that officer to certify petitioner's name as a candidate of the Socialist Party for member of the House of Representatives in Congress of the United States for the First Congressional District of California to each county clerk within the said First Congressional District. It is made to appear that the Socialist Party of California cast 3 per cent. of the votes at the next preceding state election, but did not cast 3 per cent. of the votes in the congressional district above mentioned. It is further made to appear that in no portion of this congressional district are the provisions of sections 1357 to 1375 of the Political Code relative to mandatory primary elections in force or effect. Under this state of facts the Secretary of State justifies his refusal under the provisions of section 1361 of the Political Code, to the following effect: "All political parties which, at the last election prior to any ensuing primary election herein provided for, polled at least three per cent. of the entire vote of the state, county, district, city and county, city or town, or other political division for which a primary election is to be held under the provisions of this chapter, or which, in the case of any county, city and county, township, city or district wherein no general election shall have been held after its organization, shall have polled at least three per cent. of the votes cast in the precincts composing such county, city and county, township, city or district, shall be entitled to a designation and place upon the official ballot to be used in all elections for delegates under this chapter, upon complying with the provisions of this section." Under this it is contended that, as the Socialist Party failed to cast 3 per cent. of the votes in this particular district, it is not entitled to designation and place upon the congressional ballot. The Supreme Court of the state of Illinois was called upon to construe a section of the Revised Statutes of that state similar in language and identical in effect to our own, and it held that, if a political party had cast the requisite number of votes in a general state election, it was entitled by virtue of that fact to have its nominees for local and district officers placed upon the ballot, even if it had not cast the requisite percentage of votes in the particular county or district for which the nomination was made. People ex rel. Dickerson v. Williamson (Ill.) 56 N. E. 1127. The conclusion that such is the correct interpretation of the statute is, so far as our law is concerned, strengthened by the language of section 1186 of the Political Code, where it is provided: "If such convention be assembled to present candidates for public office to be elected within territory or a political division in no portion of which said sections of this Code are mandatory or in force and effect, then and in such event the political party which such organized assemblage of delegates represents, must have at the last election before the holding of such convention polled at least three per cent. of the entire vote of the state, or of the county, city and county, district or other political division for which nominations are to be made." Here is an unmistakable declaration that in a congressional district such as this, where the provisions of the primary law are not mandatory, if a political party shall have cast 3 per cent. of the entire vote of the state, it shall be entitled to nominate officers from such district, and to have their names placed upon the official ballot.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue commanding the respondent, Charles F. Curry, Secretary of State of the state of California, to certify the name of petitioner, A. J. Gaylord, as a candidate of the Socialist Party for member of the House of Representatives in Congress of the United States for the First Congressional District of California to each county clerk within the said First Congressional District, as required by the provisions of section 1193 of the Political Code of California.

DEGREES OF HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Pen. Code, § 189, provides that murder committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate arson, robbery, rape, burglary, or mayhem is murder in the first degree. Held, that it is immaterial on a trial for such a murder whether the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated, or absolutely accidental.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. P. Lawlor, Judge.

Henry C. Dibble, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

HENSHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder of the first degree, and sentenced to death. Upon his appeal he presents but one alleged error of the trial court upon which he seeks a reversal of the judgment. This alleged error lay in the court's refusal to give the following instruction: "The court instructs you that before you can convict the defendant of murder in the first degree you must find to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant as a fact intended to take the life of the deceased. Accidental killing, even in an attempt to commit one of the felonies mentioned in section 189 of the Penal Code, is not murder in the first degree." While none of the evidence is presented to us with this appeal, it will be assumed from the general tenor of the instructions actually given by the court that the charge against the defendant was for a murder committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem. Pen. Code, § 189. The court properly refused to give the proposed instruction. Defendant insists that in every crime of murder in the first degree there must be shown to be present the elements of willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation bearing upon the actual intent to take human life. But such is not our law of murder. The only indispensable elements of murder under our Code are, first, the unlawful killing of a human being, and, second, that this killing be done with malice aforethought. Pen. Code, § 187. This malice is present and express when a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature is shown, and it is also present (though implied) when the circumstances attending the killing disclose an abandoned and malignant heart. Pen. Code, § 188. In section 189 of the Penal Code three kinds or classes of murder in the first degree are specifically enumerated: (1) All murder which is perpetrated by means of poison, or lying in wait, or torture is murder in the first degree. (2) All murder which is perpetrated by any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing is murder in the first degree. (3) All murder which is committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem is murder of the first degree.

Of the first of these classes it is sufficient to note that the means adopted for the unlawful killing furnish evidence of willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation, and this is made perfectly plain by the context of the section, which declares to be murder in the first degree all murder which is perpetrated by these means, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing. As to such a killing when perpetrated by means of poison, it has been held under the language of a statute similar to ours (and held in consonance with common sense and natural justice) that it was necesasry to establish the unlawful intent or purpose in the administration of the poison. Bechtelheimer v. The State, 54 Ind. 128. The decision was based more upon the nature of the case than the language of the statute, as is said by the same court in reviewing that case in the later one of Moynihan v. The State, 70 Ind. 126, 36 Am. Rep. 178, where it is pointed out that, unless the unlawful intent in administering the poison is made to appear, the most innocent act of one's life might turn out to be a murder, and that, too, a murder subjecting him to the gallows; so that one who innocently administered what he supposed to be a proper dose of medicine, would be compelled to endure this ultimate indignity and disgrace, notwithstanding the fact that in such administration of the poison no penal law was violated and no moral turpitude shown. In such an exceptional case, however, it is to be noted that neither element of our crime of murder is present. The killing being the result of inevitable casualty is not violative of the law, and in that sense, therefore, is not unlawful, and, of course, there is a complete absence of malice, express or implied.

The second class of cases which are designated murder in the first degree embrace all other nonspecified instances where the unlawful killing is shown to have been committed with willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation. The extreme penalty of the law is imposed for such offenses by reason of the manner in which they are committed. There is no occasion to mitigate the punishment because of the known weaknesses, frailties, and passions of mankind, since proof of the deliberation and premeditation precludes the idea that the slayer was dominated by such passions.

¶ 1. See Homicide, vol. 26, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40.

But when we come to the third kind of murder in the first degree it will be seen that in its nature it is wholly distinct from the two preceding classes. In this the law has said to the malefactor, "If in your perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate, arson, rape, robbery, burglary, or mayhem you shall take the life of a fellow being, intentionally or unintentionally, your crime is murder of the first degree. The killing may be willful, deliberate, and premeditated, or it may be absolutely accidental. In either case you are equally guilty. The elements of willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation are not indispensable to your crime. The murder, under section 187 of the Penal Code, is established, in that the killing is unlawful, it having been perpetrated in the performance or attempt to perform one of these felonies, and the malice of the abandoned and malignant heart is shown from the very nature of the crime you are attempting to commit. Therefore, if in perpetrating arson, although in the belief that the building is unoccupied, some person within the building, unknown to you, shall lose his life, you are guilty of murder in the first degree. Or if, in burglariously entering premises which you believe to be unoccupied, you shall accidentally take the life of one whose presence is unsuspected by you, still your crime is murder in the first degree." That such is the true meaning and construction of our statute there can be no doubt. Commonwealth v. Green, 1 Ashm. 289, and Keenan v. Commonwealth, 44 Pa. 55, 84 Am. Dec. 414—the only cases which the appellant presents for consideration—both have to do with deliberate and premeditated homicide, and the discussion of the court was in reference to this form of murder. In the first a soldier, with his musket, shot his drill sergeant, after having threatened to do so. In the second the conductor of a street car, after admonishing a noisy and boisterous passenger to be quiet, attempted to eject him, and was stabbed to death. Neither of these, it will be observed, has any bearing upon the crime here under consideration.

It will be noted that at common law murder was carried into the unlawful killing of a human being in the perpetration of any misdemeanor, and death was the penalty which followed. The rigor of the common law has been modified by our Code section, which is drawn from the laws of New York as they stood in 1860. In Buel v. The People, 78 N. Y. 492, 34 Am. Rep. 555, will be found an exposition and consideration of the changes made in the New York statutes relative to the crime of murder. The court there quotes the first statute, which was to the effect that the killing shall constitute murder "when perpetrated without any design to effect death, by a person engaged in the commission of a felony." 2 Rev. St. (1st Ed.) part 4, c. 1, tit. 1, § 5. "The killing," says the court, "while engaged in the perpetration of any felony which caused death, even if unintentionally, is here expressly declared to be murder." The court proceeds: "The statute of 1873 [Laws 1873, p. 1014, c. 644] was then passed, which is precisely like the statute of 1876 [Laws 1876, p. 317, c. 333], already cited, except that the words 'without any design to effect death' are omitted in the latter statute. The evident purpose of omitting these words was to make any killing, while engaged in the perpetration of a felony, murder in the first degree, no matter what the design was, or whether it was intentional or casual. So that a person engaged in the commission of the crime of arson, burglary, rape, or any other felony, who killed another, was chargeable with murder in the first degree. Under all of these various provisions where the killing was perpetrated it was of no consequence what the intention was. The statute was aimed against any killing by a criminal while committing any of the felonies enumerated, and the last amendment while engaged in the commission of any of the numerous felonies known to the law. The striking out of the words 'without any design to effect death' was no doubt designed to avoid any necessity of showing that there was no such intention, and to make the law more explicit and clear."

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 11, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS — POWERS OF OFFICERS — CONTRACTS WITH THEMSELVES INDIVIDUALLY— VALIDITY — RATIFICATION — EXPRESS — IMPLIED.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 2230, providing that no trustee or his agent may take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he or his agent has an interest adverse to the beneficiary; section 2234, providing that a violation of this provision is a fraud against the beneficiary; and section 2322, declaring that no general authority shall authorize an agent to do any act which a trustee is forbidden from doing—the president of a corporation is prohibited from purchasing notes payable to the corporation and indorsing them to himself individually.

2. The court will not permit any inquiry into the question of the honesty or fairness of a transaction whereby the president of a corporation purchases notes payable to the corporation and indorses them to himself.

3. The by-laws of a corporation providing that the president thereof "shall sign, as president, all certificates of stocks, checks, notes, * * * and other instruments in writing, and shall have full power to act in all respects as the general agent and manager of the company, subject to the advice of the board of directors," does not authorize the president to purchase notes payable to the corporation and indorse them to himself individually.

On Rehearing.

4. A maker executed notes to a corporation. The president indorsed the notes to himself individually, making the corporation liable as indorser. Renewal notes were given, indorsed in the same manner. The directors of the corporation had no knowledge of the transaction, and did not know of the existence of the renewal notes. At directors' meetings they asked the president if the notes were being paid at maturity, and they received an affirmative answer. The vice president testified that while he acted as president he indorsed some of these notes to raise money, but knew nothing of the renewal notes. Held not to show an express ratification on the part of the corporation of the unauthorized acts of the president.

5. On the issue whether a corporation impliedly ratified the unauthorized act of its president in indorsing to himself individually notes belonging to the corporation, it was shown that the secretary joined with the president in indorsing the name of the corporation on the notes. Knowledge of the transaction was concealed from the directors by the president and secretary, who made false statements on being asked whether the notes were being paid at maturity. Held not to show an implied ratification by the corporation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Consolidated actions by the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works against Sidney M. Smith, by Sidney M. Smith against the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works, and by Elizabeth E. Smith and another against the same defendant. From adverse judgments in each action, the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works appeals. Reversed.

J. C. Campbell (W. H. Metson, Campbell, Metson & Campbell, J. J. Kennedy, W. H. Metson, and John Garber, of counsel), for appellant. Carter P. Pomeroy, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. These cases are both presented on a consolidated transcript on appeal, and, as the same general principles of law are applicable to both, they will be considered together.

The first action is brought by the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works (which for brevity will hereafter be referred to as the "Pickle Works" or corporation) to enjoin the said Sidney M. Smith from selling or transferring certain promissory notes not yet due, given by a corporation known as the California Packing Company to said pickle works, and indorsed by said Smith, as president of the latter, to himself; also for the cancellation of such indorsements. The second action is brought by said Sidney M. Smith against the pickle works to obtain judgment on notes executed by the same packing company to the pickle works, and similarly indorsed and held by him. The pleadings in both cases fully raise the legal question to be disposed of, and the facts under which it is presented are as follows:

Said Sidney M. Smith was, at all the times herein mentioned, a director and president of the pickle works, and the by-laws thereof provided that "he shall sign as president all certificates of stock, checks, notes, bills payable, acceptances, bills of exchange, contracts, and other instruments in writing, and shall have full power to act in all respects as the general agent and manager of the company, subject to the advice of the board of directors"; that said pickle works was doing business with a corporation known as the California Packing Company, under a contract which provided that the pickle works should supply the packing company with material, and binding the latter not to contract with any other parties for such material; that the pickle works sold goods to the packing company under such contract, and, upon monthly statements rendered, notes were given by the latter in favor of the former, indorsed by one A. B. Patrick; that some of said notes so delivered were retained by the pickle works, some respondent Smith had discounted by the Bank of British Columbia for the benefit of the pickle works, and others were purchased by said Smith, in which latter case, as when discounting them to the bank, he transferred the same by an indorsement of the name of the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works thereon, by himself as president; that when he purchased said notes from the pickle works he paid over for its benefit the face of the principal and accrued interest thereon, and that no better terms could have been obtained at a bank. On December 13, 1899, said Smith held notes of said packing company so indorsed, and maturing on that date, amounting to the sum of $16,992.28, which on that day he surrendered, and took from said packing company a series of notes, each for about $1,500, maturing monthly. These renewal notes were also indorsed by A. B. Patrick, and when delivered to said Smith by the packing company he indorsed them to himself as before, with the name of the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works, by himself as president; that said renewal notes were so taken at the request of the packing company, and were drawn in such series of small amounts so that said company could meet them monthly, and were renewed so that the time of payment might be extended. Aside from the renewal notes, Smith held other notes of the packing company, purchased by him from the pickle works, and similarly indorsed. Of these, three, for upwards of $1,500 each, were paid by the packing company to respondent Smith in September, October, and December, 1899, and of the renewal notes of December 16, 1899, three, for $1,500 each, were likewise paid him in January, February, and March, 1900. No payments were paid during these periods of any of the notes executed by the packing company to the pickle works and retained by it, although at these times the secretary of the latter had in its safe unpaid notes of said packing company, which in March, 1900, amounted to from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars, besides which there were outstanding, on that date, notes of said company, indorsed by the pickle works, by said Smith as president, and held by the Bank of British Columbia, amounting to about $20,000. That none of the other four members of the board of directors of the pickle works had any knowledge of these transactions. It further appears that the pickle works is solvent. As to the actual condition, in that respect, of the packing company, or A. B. Patrick, the prior indorser of its paper, the record is silent, although it appears from the evidence that the packing company had stated to Smith that it could not pay its bills monthly and pay the full amount of the notes, and it was for that reason that he had put them in such a shape as to mature in the neighborhood of $1,500 per month. These are some of the principal facts in the case, and are all that are necessary here to be stated in order to fully present and consider the main proposition of law involved.

Judgments were rendered in favor of Sidney M. Smith in both actions; in the first for his costs; in the second for the amount of the notes therein sued on—$7,654.96; and from both judgments the pickle works appeals.

Several points are made by appellant for a reversal, but we will consider only the main one, which we deem controlling and decisive of the case. The others are merely subsidiary and unimportant. Broadly stated, the legal proposition insisted on by appellant is that one occupying a fiduciary or trust relation to a corporation cannot, while such relation exists, enter into any express contract with himself individually relative to the trust property which will be binding on the corporation; that such a contract is a breach of trust, and voidable at the mere election of the corporation, if not absolutely void; and that, when such a contract is sought to be enforced, the court will not permit any investigation as to the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, nor will it permit the trustee to show that it was not detrimental, or that it was even advantageous to the beneficiary. Such an inquiry cannot be entered into. And, specially applying the rule to the facts in the case at bar, it it claimed that as the respondent Smith, at the time he acquired ownership of said notes, occupied a fiduciary and trust relation to appellant corporation, both as president and director, and that as the contracts of indorsement guarantying the payment of said notes by said corporation were made by himself as president to himself individually, without the authority, knowledge, or approval of the corporation, they cannot be enforced by him against it. We are satisfied that this contention of appellant is sound, and sustained, not only by the Code provisions of this state, but by an unbroken line of authorities.

It will be observed that no question is involved in this action of the right of a director, who has advanced or loaned money to a corporation, to recover it back on a quantum meruit, and decisions which sustain such a right have no application. The action at bar is one brought by a director who, as president of the corporation, purchased its notes outright, and caused the corporation, by himself as president, to become indorser of the notes to himself individually, as indorsee, and is now seeking to enforce such contract of indorsement against his corporation. His suit is brought upon an express contract, the making of which and its enforcement are equally prohibited by law. In this regard the general principle is clearly stated in Bensiek v. Thomas, 66 Fed. 104, 13 C. C. A. 457: "It is an elementary law that an agent authorized to act for a principal in a given negotiation cannot deal with himself. He cannot, when authorized to buy property or borrow money, sell his own property or loan his own funds, without communicating the fact to his principal. An agent cannot unite his personal and representative characters in the same transaction. The doctrine applies to all persons who occupy a fiduciary relation, and it is especially applicable to the officers of a corporation when acting for and in behalf of the company. They cannot use their official position to benefit themselves individually. In short, an officer of a corporation is not qualified to act for his company in any transaction wherein the corporation is dealing with the officer." Wardell v. R. R. Co., 103 U. S. 651, 26 L. Ed. 509; Mallory v. Mallory-Wheeler Co. (Conn.) 23 Atl. 708; Bigelow on Fraud, 217; Perry on Trusts, § 207. And in Morawetz Priv. Corp. § 517, it is said: "The directors of a corporation have no authority to bind the company to any contract made with themselves personally. * * * Thus a president, cashier, or managing agent, having authority to sign the name of a corporation to negotiable instruments, cannot execute or indorse a note to himself, or certify a check for his own benefit." This rule is based on sound public policy, and there also enters into it the legal principle that, in order to make an express contract, there must be the assent of two separate independent minds; that no man can effectually make a contract with himself. In the case at bar, the respondent Smith assumed to constitute himself both the contracting parties. There is no pretense that he was dealing with the corporation represented by other members of the board of directors, or with other agents thereof. He was dealing with himself, contracting as president with himself as an individual, and was the contracting party on both sides. The corporation made no sale of these notes to, or contract of indorsement thereof, with him. He adjusted the whole matter, dictated the terms of the transfer by himself with himself, completed the transaction in this unilateral capacity, and it was the result solely of his own discretion and volition. To this situation the language of the court in Mercantile Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hope Ins. Co., 8 Mo. App. 411, may pertinently be applied: "A contrivance which reduces the two parties to one, and admits an agent representing antagonistic interests to make a bargain by himself, is so far against the policy of the law that the contract is held to be void, unless the principal chooses afterwards, and with knowledge of all the circumstances that affect his possession, to ratify the act of his agent." In Clark & Marshall's Private Cor. vol. 3, § 759, the rule is concisely summed up in this language: "A person cannot, as director or other officer of a corporation, enter into a valid contract on behalf of the corporation with himself in his individual capacity, or be both vendor and purchaser, for two persons are necessary elements to the formation of a contract. The fact that he acts as an officer of the corporation on one side, and for himself on the other, can make no difference."

Recurring now to the main legal proposition under discussion, it is provided by section 2230 of the Civil Code that "neither a trustee, nor any of his agents, may take part in any transaction concerning the trust in which he, or any one for whom he acts as agent, has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to that of his beneficiary, except when the beneficiary, having capacity to contract with the full knowledge of the motive of the trustee, and of all other facts concerning the transaction which might affect his own decision, and without the use of any influence on the part of the trustee, permits him to do so." And by section 2234 of the same Code it is provided that "every violation of the previous preceding sections of this article is a fraud against the beneficiary of a trust." These Code provisions apply to directors of a corporation in their relation to it as trustees, and by section 2322 of that Code they are made to apply to the respondent, as the agent of such corporation, in the case at bar. This last section declares that "an authority [of an agent] expressed in general terms, however broad, does not authorize an agent * * * (3) to do any act which a trustee is forbidden to do by article 2, chapter 1, of the last title," which chapter includes the sections above quoted. As it does not appear in this case that the respondent had any special authority from the corporation to enter into the transaction in question here, he necessarily must claim to have been empowered to make it under an authority expressed in general terms, and hence the sections—2230, 2234, Civ. Code—in regard to trustees must apply to him, as a mere agent of the corporation. So applied, the law is inflexible that one acting in such fiduciary capacity will not be permitted to deal with himself in his individual capacity relative to the trust property.

Upon this point, as we have said, the current of authority in this state is unbroken, and it will only be necessary to refer at length to a few of the cases which clearly and uncompromisingly announce the rule, with general citations to such others from our own court as affirm the doctrine. In the case of Davis v. Rock Creek Co., 55 Cal. 364, 36 Am. Rep. 40; where the facts are stated, as well as the law declared, it is said: "But apart from this consideration, the transaction in question cannot be upheld. The law, for wise reasons, will not permit one who acts in a fiduciary capacity thus to deal with himself in his individual capacity. The position of A. Wolff as a member of the firm of A. Wolff & Co., and his position as trustee and president of the corporation defendant, were inconsistent and conflicting. In purchasing the debts of the corporation in his individual capacity, it was to his interest to buy them at as great a discount as possible. The greater the discount the greater his gain. If he succeeded in purchasing the debts at any discount, to that extent he assumed to himself an advantage not common to all of the stockholders. To permit this to be done would be to permit the violation of one of the plainest principles of equity applicable to trustees. In this particular case it does not appear that Wolff assumed the demands against the corporation at any discount. Neither does it appear that he did not. Nor does the policy of the law permit an inquiry into that question. Occupying, as he did, the position of trustee, he should not have put himself in a position adverse to his cestui que trust. One cannot faithfully serve two masters whose interests are diverse." In the still later case of Sims v. Petaluma Gaslight Co., 131 Cal. 659, 63 Pac. 1012, it is said: "The court was clearly correct in holding that, for the reasons stated, the contract introduced in evidence on the part of the plaintiff was invalid. Being president of the defendant corporation, Van Syckel necessarily was one of the directors thereof (Civ. Code, § 308); and, as such, he occupied a fiduciary relation to the corporation and its stockholders. 'A trustee may not use or deal with the trust property for his own profit, or for any other purpose unconnected with the trust, in any manner.' Civ. Code, § 2229. He cannot take part in any transaction in which he, or any one for whom he acts, has an interest, present or contingent, adverse to that of his beneficiary. Civ. Code, § 2230. In fact, this rule did not have its origin with the Codes, but it is much older. It is against public policy to permit any person occupying fiduciary relations to be placed in such a position that he may be tempted to betray his duty as a trustee. 'Hence the rule is unyielding that a trustee shall not, under any circumstances, be allowed to have any dealings with the trust property, with himself, or acquire any interest therein. Courts will not permit any investigation into the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, or allow the trustee to show that the dealing was for the best interest of the beneficiary.' Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 29, 28 Pac. 788. In Aberdeen Ry. Co. v. Blaikie, 1 M. A. C. Q. 461, it is said: 'So strictly is this principle adhered to, that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of the contract so entered into. It obviously is or may be impossible to demonstrate how far, in any particular case, the terms of such a contract have been the best for the interests of the cestui que trust which it was possible to obtain. It may sometimes happen that the terms on which a trustee has dealt or attempted to deal with the estate or interests of those for whom he is a trustee have been as good as could be obtained from any other person; they may even at the time have been better; but still, so inflexible is the rule, that no inquiry on that subject is permitted.'"

These authorities lay down two propositions: First, that an expressed contract cannot be entered into by a director with himself relative to the trust property; and, second, that the court will not permit any inquiry into the question of the honesty or fairness of the transaction. The philosophy of this rule is quite apparent, and its inflexibility is the strongest safeguard which the law can offer for the protection of the interests of the beneficiary. The great purpose of the law is to secure fidelity in the agent. When one undertakes to deal with himself in different capacities—individual and representative—there is a manifest hostility in the position he occupies. His duty calls upon him to act for the best interests of his principal. His self-interest prompts him to make the best bargain for himself. Humanity is so constituted that, when these conflicting interests arise, the temptation is usually too great to be overcome, and duty is sacrificed to interest. In order that this temptation may be avoided, or, if indulged in, must be at the peril of the trustee, it has been wisely provided that the trustee shall not be permitted to make or enforce any contract arising between himself as trustee and individually with reference to any matter of the trust, nor will the court enter into any examination of the honesty of the transaction. As said by the Supreme Court of New York in Munson et al. v. S. G. & C. R. Co. et al., 103 N. Y. 74, 8 N. E. 358: "The law permits no one to act in such inconsistent relations. It does not stop to inquire whether the contract or transaction was fair or unfair. It stops the inquiry when the relation is disclosed, and sets aside the transaction, or refuses to enforce it, at the instance of the party whom the fiduciary undertook to represent, without undertaking to deal with the question of abstract justice in the particular case. It prevents frauds by making them, as far as may be, impossible, knowing that real motives often elude the most searching inquiry; and it leaves neither to judge nor jury the right to determine, upon a consideration of its advantages or disadvantages, whether a contract made under such circumstances shall stand or fall. * * * The value of the rule of equity to which we have adverted lies to a great extent in its stubbornness and inflexibility. Its rigidity gives it one of its chief uses as a preventive or discouraging influence, because it weakens the temptation to dishonesty or unfair dealing on the part of trustees, by vitiating, without attempted discrimination, all transactions in which they assume the dual character of principal and representative."

So harmonious is the law on this subject that authorities might be cited indefinitely, but reference is made only to those in this state where the principles have been discussed, reiterated, and approved: San Diego v. S. D. & L. A. R. Co., 44 Cal. 112; Andrews v. Pratt, Id. 317; Wilbur v. Lynde, 49 Cal. 292, 19 Am. Rep. 645; Chamberlain v. Wool Growing Company, 54 Cal. 106; Shakespear v. Smith, 77 Cal. 638, 20 Pac. 294, 11 Am. St. Rep. 327; Smith v. Immigration Association, 78 Cal. 292, 20 Pac. 677, 12 Am. St. Rep. 53; Graves v. Mining Co., 81 Cal. 319, 22 Pac. 665; San Francisco Water Co. v. Pattee, 86 Cal. 629, 25 Pac. 135; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 31, 28 Pac. 788; Gas Co. v. Young, 109 Cal. 143, 41 Pac. 869, 29 L. R. A. 463; Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., 130 Cal. 345, 62 Pac. 552, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132.

We have examined the cases cited by counsel for respondent to support the validity of this contract and the right of respondent to recover upon it, but they have no relevancy to the real point involved. We will not discuss at all the authorities cited from other jurisdictions, and, as to the cases in this state, will mention them briefly, and then only to point out their special inapplicability. All the cases cited by counsel are cases where either the director of the corporation whose dealings were questioned dealt directly, but illegally, with the board of directors of a solvent corporation, assuming to act for it, or dealt with such board with the knowledge or approval of the stockholders, or they are cases where the illegal action of the director was subsequently ratified and approved by the corporate authorities. In none of these cases is it held that he could deal with himself, or that a contract made with himself without the knowledge of the other directors or the stockholders, or without the subsequent ratification or approval of the corporation, could be sustained or enforced against the corporation. This marked distinction is plainly declared in a line from one of the cases cited by respondent (Lick Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 590, 23 L. Ed. 328) where the court says, "The defendant was not here both seller and buyer." In the case at bar he was both seller and buyer, with the additional relation created by himself, with himself, of indorser and indorsee.

Referring now briefly to the authorities cited by respondent from this court: In the case of Santa Cruz R. Co. v. Spreckles, 65 Cal. 193, 3 Pac. 661, 802, no question of a director dealing with himself was involved. The plain point decided there was that, the corporation having borrowed money from the director Hihn, the latter was entitled to be repaid. But this is practically declared to be the rule in Davis v. Rock Creek, Graves v. Mining Co., and Sims v. Petaluma Gaslight Co.—that, where the corporation has dealt with the director, he can recover upon a quantum meruit; not, however, that a director can recover upon an express contract made with himself without the knowledge or sanction of the corporation. In the cases of Sutter St. Ry. Co. v. Baum, 66 Cal. 44, 4 Pac. 916, and Bonney v. Tilley, 109 Cal. 346, 42 Pac. 439, the note and mortgage involved there were given by the corporation to a director. In Seeley v. San Jose, etc., 59 Cal. 25, the plaintiff paid off a note of the corporation at the request of its president and superintendent, and thereupon the corporation gave a note to plaintiff to secure repayment. At an annual meeting of the board of directors and stockholders, this note was recognized, sanctioned, and approved by them. There was nothing in the case calling for the application of the rule declared in Davis v. Rock Creek, or cases affirming a similar principle. In fact, the court in Seeley v. San Jose, etc., recognized the distinction, and particularly stated in its opinion that the case then in hand was not "at all like unto Davis v. Rock Creek, or like the cases of San Diego v. S. D. & L. A. R. Co. and Wilbur v. Lynde," previously referred to by us in this opinion. Neither is Phillips v. Sanger Lumber Co., 130 Cal. 431, 62 Pac. 749, applicable. The only point decided there was that the corporation had ratified the contract claimed to be illegal, and was bound by the ratification. These are all the cases from this court cited by counsel, and none of them run counter to, but clearly recognize the distinction between, cases where the director deals with the corporation, or his act, while illegal, is subsequently ratified by it, and cases where he deals with himself without the knowledge and approval of the corporation, and where there is no ratification. While some claim is made that the corporation in this case ratified the respondent's acts, it is only a claim. There is not only no evidence to support it, but the evidence is that none of the other officers of the corporation were informed by respondent of the matter, or knew of the transaction. It is hardly necessary to say that the general power conferred upon Smith under the by-laws did not give him authority to contract with himself. In every case where the validity of a contract made by a trustee with himself is in question, general authority to act for the corporation must necessarily have existed, in order to apply the principle invoked here. The law assumes that the trustee is invested with general power to contract, but limits its exercise to matters strictly in the interest of the beneficiary, and disqualifies him from exercising it in his own behalf. This disability directly results from the existence of the general authority.

In disposing of this matter, it may be said that, if a director wishes to take security for advances made to the corporation, it is not requiring too much of him to ask for such security, or for whatever contract he would equitably be entitled to, in order to protect his advances. If he fails to do so, and has any equitable claim arising from such advances against the corporation, he may bring an action on a quantum meruit to recover. He cannot, however, make an express contract with himself which can be enforced against the corporation against its will; nor can the fairness of such a contract be inquired into, or affect the rule.

The principles here announced apply to both cases considered on this appeal, and, for the reasons given, the judgments therein appealed from are reversed, and the causes remanded.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment of reversal, and in nearly all that is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice LORIGAN; but I think that some of the quotations to be found in the opinion state the principle of law under discussion rather too broadly. It may be well to say, also, that it is quite likely that the respondent Smith did not intend to do any unlawful act, and that what he did probably inured to the benefit, rather than the injury, of the pickle company; but well-established and just general principles of law can occasionally be invoked so as to work hardship in particular cases.

On Rehearing.

(Nov. 12, 1904.)

HENSHAW, J. From the decision of this court in bank, rendered in the above-entitled cause, a rehearing was granted, to the end that a finding made by the trial court, to the effect that the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works ratified and approved each and every indorsement placed upon the notes of the California Packing Company by Smith as president and King as secretary, should receive further consideration. It was urged in the petition for rehearing that, although the principle of ratification was fully recognized in the opinion, through some oversight the finding declaring a ratification, which finding fully supported the judgment of the trial court, had been overlooked. Our attention, therefore, upon this hearing, is limited to the single question whether or not the finding of ratification is supported by the evidence. Respondent contends that the finding is supported, first, under evidence showing express ratification, and, second, under evidence showing implied ratification.

1. The express ratification, it is contended, finds support in the evidence of Mr. Koster, the vice president of the Pickle Works, who, during a three months' absence of the president, Mr. Smith, performed the latter's duties. During Koster's incumbency as president he indorsed three of the California Packing Company's notes. Respondent in his brief asserts that "Mr. Koster himself testifies that at the time he made this indorsement he knew that at least one of those notes belonged to Mr. Smith, although he denies any personal knowledge of the fact that he was effecting a renewal." The evidence of Mr. Koster, with the inferences and deductions which may legitimately be drawn from it, is the only evidence touching express ratification. Mr. Koster's testimony, however, is at variance with respondent's statement of it. It is brief, and may be set forth in full: "I never knew until March, 1900, that Mr. Smith had assigned or indorsed any of those notes to himself. I never knew that there was any notes of the California Packing Company in existence outside of those which we held in the safe, amounting to $12,000 or $15,000. By reason of what had been told me at the directors' meetings, I believed it was all paid up. I acted as vice president of the company during Mr. Smith's absence. During that time I indorsed three notes, one of which may have belonged to Mr. Smith, but I did not know that any of them were renewal notes. I never knew anything about renewals. I was told that some money was needed from the bank, and I indorsed some California Packing Company paper, which the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works had, for the purpose of getting money to run the business. I knew that the company had paper of the California Packing Company, but did not know any of it was renewed until after Mr. King's defalcation. I did not see any renewal notes brought to me. If there had been any renewal notes brought to me, that would have stopped right there. No notes were brought to me which had already been renewed by the Pacific Vinegar & Pickle Works. In every instance I asked Mr. King if the notes of the California Packing Company were being paid, and he told me 'yes.'" It is to be remembered that the directors, one and all, testified that they had no knowledge of any of these transactions; that they knew nothing of the existence of the California Packing Company notes held by Smith, upon which their company (the Pickle Works) was liable as indorser; and that at every directors' meeting, in the presence and hearing of Mr. Smith, the president, they asked if the California Packing Company's notes were being paid at maturity, and always received an affirmative answer from the secretary. Bearing in mind that an express ratification can only be found against a party when it is shown that he is in possession of all the facts, and has acted after such knowledge, it is at once apparent, without further discussion, that the testimony of Mr. Koster falls far short of establishing such a ratification.

2. The doctrine of implied ratification is invoked to support the finding. The doctrine of implied ratification is thus expressed: "An implied ratification may also arise if the corporation accepts the benefit of the unauthorized act; but a corporation will not be held to have ratified an act impliedly by accepting the benefit of it, unless knowledge of the act was actually possessed by some corporate agent who had authority to act for the corporation in the matter, or whose function it was to report it to the proper authorities, or unless knowledge of the act would have been possessed by some such agent, had there not been neglect of duty on his part, the consequences of which are to be borne by the corporation, rather than by the party from whose performance it has been benefited. Consequently, in order to constitute an implied ratification on the part of the corporation, arising from acquiescence, or from accepting the benefit of an act, it may not be necessary that the circumstances should be such as to warrant a jury in finding actual knowledge on the part of the corporation, or corporate agents competent to ratify; for the knowledge of one agent may, at least in the absence of proof to the contrary, be imputed to other agents, who have authority to do the acts in question, or even to the corporation." Taylor on Private Corp. (2d Ed.) §§ 214, 215.

It is urged that the facts in this case show that the corporation received the benefit of the money paid by its president, Smith, in discounting the notes of the packing company, and that as the secretary King joined with Smith in indorsing the name of the pickle company upon the notes, and as it was King's duty to inform the corporation of these facts, the negligence upon his part in not doing so is not negligence of which the corporation can avail itself while retaining the proceeds of the notes, and that, therefore, by conclusive implication the corporation had knowledge of the transaction and thus ratified it. This whole structure, it is to be observed, is built upon the somewhat flimsy foundation of a mere disputable presumption—a presumption which, while in strictness evidence, has been characterized as evidence "the weakest and least satisfactory." The case here presented is not at all parallel with those where the directors themselves are in fault for not knowing the things with knowledge of which they are sought to be charged. Here it affirmatively appears that knowledge of these transactions was concealed from the board of directors, not by the secretary, King, alone, but by the president of the company, who was drawing a salary for his services, who attended the directors' meetings, and who never—such is the record—informed his board as to any of these matters, but sat silent when his directors asked as to the payment of the notes of the California Packing Company, and when the secretary answered with the false statement that they were being promptly met. It appears, therefore, that the directors did what in reason they might have been expected to do—made inquiries in open board, and were deceived, not alone by the answers of the secretary, but by the silence of their president, whose duty, equally with the secretary, it was to tell them the truth. So telling them, the directors would have known that their corporation stood liable upon the paper of the California Packing Company as indorser for thousands of dollars which they knew not of; that their liabilities were to this extent increased; and they would have been in a position to take steps to reduce that liability and enforce the obligations of the California Packing Company. By the method which Smith adopted, however, they were kept in ignorance of these things, their corporate name was affixed to renewal notes, thus continuing their liability, and not that alone, but continuing a corporate liability which they did not know existed. Under these circumstances it cannot be successfully argued that the president of the corporation is entitled to invoke the doctrine of implied ratification, and thus reap the fruits of his own concealment.

For the foregoing reasons, in addition to those given in the opinion above cited, which opinion is hereby adopted and affirmed, the judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—SALES OF PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF EXECUTION PURCHASER—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. In 1850 the city of San Francisco passed an ordinance conveying certain property to the commissioners of the sinking fund, who were given power to sell, etc. St. 1851, p. 387, c. 88, created the commissioners of the funded debt, and directed the commissioners of the sinking fund to convey the property held by them to the commissioners of the funded debt, which was done. Prior to the passage of this act, a creditor of the city had recovered a judgment against it, and the property in question, which was held by the city as a private proprietor, was sold under execution. Held, that the ordinance transferring the property to the commissioners of the sinking fund was invalid for want of authority in the common council, so that a deed from such commissioners to the commissioners of the funded debt was inoperative, but the title passed under the execution sale, and could not be affected by the act of 1851.

2. The admission in evidence of the record of a case which is controlling on the case at bar as an authority, although not as an estoppel, is harmless.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by John H. Dunham against James S. Angus and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. G. Knapp, for appellant. Wm. M. Pierson, Geo. E. Crothers, Garret W. McEnerney, and W. S. Goodfellow, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action is to quiet title to a lot of land which is a part of what is known as the "beach and water lots" of the city of San Francisco. The appellant claims title through a sale of the property in contest by the commissioners of the funded debt created by an act of the Legislature approved May 1, 1851. St. 1851, p. 387, c. 88. Respondents claim under what is known as the "Peter Smith title," which, as against the alleged title of the said commissioners of the funded debt, was a prominent subject of litigation during the first years of the history of California as an American state. The various statutes, ordinances, and other facts touching the controversy are fully set forth in the report of the case of Smith v. Morse, 2 Cal. 524, and need not be here stated in detail. For the purpose of this decision, the following brief statement is sufficient: In 1850 the city of San Francisco passed an ordinance under which certain of its property, including the lot involved in this action, was conveyed to certain trustees, styled the "Commissioners of the Sinking Fund," who were given power to sell, etc. On May 1, 1851, the act of the Legislature above referred to, creating the commissioners of the funded debt, was passed, and by that act the said commissioners of the sinking fund were directed to convey all of the property held by them under said ordinance to the commissioners of the funded debt, which was done. The commissioners of the funded debt were authorized to sell the property, and they did, on September 20, 1852, sell and convey the lot here in question to Joseph Hetherington, from whom the appellant has a clear deraignment of title. But in 1850 and 1851 Peter Smith was a creditor of the city in large amounts, and on January 14, 1851—which was before the passage of said act of May 1, 1851—he commenced an action on a part of the indebtedness of the city to him, and on September 6, 1851, he recovered a judgment against the city for the sum of about $14,000, and execution was regularly issued on said judgment, under which the property here in contest was sold on January 30, 1852, to David S. Douglass, who afterwards received the sheriff's deed to the same; and whatever interest in the property Douglass thus obtained passed by mesne conveyances, and vested in the defendants in this present action. Peter Smith had also, in 1851, commenced two other actions for other parts of this indebtedness, in which judgments had been rendered prior to May 1, 1851. The question in the case at bar, therefore, is which is the better title—the one claimed by appellant under the sale from the commissioners of the funded debt, or the other claimed by respondents under the execution sale on the Peter Smith judgment of September 6, 1851? And we think that this question was definitely settled against the contentions of the appellant by the case of Smith v. Morse, above noticed—2 Cal. 524.

Smith v. Morse was an action brought by Peter Smith against Morse and others, constituting the said commissioners of the funded debt, in which plaintiff sought to have it adjudged that, as against him as a creditor of the city, the commissioners had no title to the water property which had been levied upon and sold under his judgments, and to enjoin them from asserting any such title and thus injuriously affecting the value of his interest therein. The judgment was in favor of Smith in the trial court, and upon appeal it was affirmed. It is contended by appellant in the case at bar that the case of Smith v. Morse reached and determined only the rights of Smith under his first two judgments, which had been rendered prior to May 1, 1851, when the act creating the commissioners of the funded debt was passed. But in his amended and supplementary complaint he expressly set up his rights under the third judgment, of September 6, 1851, and asked a similar remedy as to those rights. The court clearly dealt with all three of the judgments, and, indeed, Smith's rights under the last judgment seemed to be those principally involved, for it seems from the statement of the case in the record that the two prior judgments had been satisfied, and the trial court stated in its finding that "a part of the judgment aforesaid rendered on the 6th day of September, 1851, remains unsatisfied." The preliminary injunction restraining the commissioners from selling, etc., was by the final judgment made perpetual. The judgment was affirmed on appeal, and in an elaborate opinion the Appellate Court held, first, that the ordinance above mentioned, by which it was attempted to transfer the property to the commissioners of the sinking fund, was invalid for want of authority in the common council to do so, and consequently the deed from the said commissioners to the commissioners of the funded debt conveyed nothing. But as it was contended that the act of May 1, 1851, itself, had the effect of a conveyance to the commissioners of the funded debt, the court took up that branch of the subject, and held that, assuming such to be the effect of that act, the act, as against Smith, was unconstitutional and void, because impairing the obligation of a contract. It was declared that the city held that water lot property as a private proprietor, and it was therefore liable for the city's debt, and that "such property as was subject to execution at the time the debt was contracted must remain subject to execution until the debt is paid." The facts as stipulated in the case at bar seem to bring it entirely within the decision in Smith v. Morse, and as, during the long time since the rendition of that decision, many titles have no doubt been taken upon the faith of it, we have no disposition to now question it. The respondents, over the objection of appellant, were allowed to introduce the record in the case of Smith v. Morse as it appears in the report of the case in 2 Cal., and appellant contends that this ruling of the court was erroneous; but that ruling was immaterial, for the case is controlling as an authority, even if appellant is not technically estopped by it.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HOME SECURITY BLDG. & LOAN ASS'N OF ALAMEDA COUNTY v. WESTERN LAND & TITLE CO. et al. (S. F. 2,029.)

PARTITION—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

1. The description in the complaint of land sought to be partitioned as the "westerly one-half of" a specified lot and block, according to a certain recorded plat, giving the township, county, and state, is sufficient.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action for partition by the Home Security Building & Loan Association of Alameda County, a corporation, against the Western Land & Title Company, B. Kelsey, and others. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant Kelsey appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Smith, for appellant. J. B. Richardson, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Defendants filed a demurrer to the complaint, which was for partition, upon the ground, among others, that it "is uncertain, in this: that it cannot be determined from the complaint where the property sought to be described in the complaint is situate." The demurrer was overruled, and an interlocutory judgment entered. Defendant Kelsey prosecutes this appeal from the judgment, and claims that the court erred in overruling the demurrer; his sole point being that the complaint does not contain a sufficient description of the property sought to be partitioned.

The description is as follows: "Situate in Oakland Township, County of Alameda, State of California, and described as follows, to wit: The westerly one-half of lot nine (9) in Block D as the same is delineated and so designated on a certain plat entitled 'Map of Klinkerville Tract,' filed March 21, 1899, in the office of the County Recorder of Alameda County, California." The description is sufficient under the rule in all jurisdictions, and long settled in this state.

The judgment should be affirmed, with $100 damages against appellant for a frivolous appeal.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed, with $100 damages against appellant for a frivolous appeal: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

145 Cal. 320

HUSTON v. ANDERSON. (Sac. 1,206.)

ELECTIONS—VALIDITY OF BALLOTS—IDENTIFYING MARK—QUALIFICATION OF ELECTORS—RESIDENCE—REGISTRATION—DE FACTO OFFICER—CUSTODY OF BALLOTS—PREPARATION OF BALLOTS.

1. On an election contest, an objection to certain ballots on the ground that the returns were not properly and safely kept by their legal custodian, the county clerk, was of no avail, where it appeared that, while the clerk might have kept the ballots in a more secure manner, the envelopes containing the ballots were in the same condition as when received by the clerk, and unopened, and there was no evidence tending to show that they were disturbed or tampered with.

2. Under Pol. Code, § 1205, which provides that at elections a cross should be stamped after the name of a candidate on the ballot, and against the answer that the voter desired to give as to a constitutional amendment, the fact that voters had stamped a cross on the parallelogram containing the candidate's name, after the name, but not in the square, and had stamped a cross under or on the word "Yes" or "No," in voting on constitutional amendments, and not in the square, did not render the ballots illegal.

3. On an election contest, the finding of the trial court as to the intention of a party relative to the place of his residence will not be disturbed on appeal unless it appears that there is no evidence whatever to support the finding.

4. After certain voters had registered, it was ascertained that the affidavits of registration contained incorrect designations of their voting precincts, and the county clerk corrected them by inserting the proper precinct names. All the voters in fact actually resided, when they registered, in the precincts represented by the correction. Held, that the correction did not affect the validity of the registration.

5. Where, on an election contest, it appeared that the formal affidavit for registration signed by an elector was in the precinct register, but there was no jurat of the county clerk showing that he had been sworn, but it appeared that he went to the clerk's office, and that the clerk prepared his affidavit, and that he understood he was making an affidavit, and the clerk testified that it was usual to swear the voters when they were registered, it being the duty of the clerk to administer such an oath, it was proper to presume that the clerk discharged his duty and administered the necessary oath.

On Rehearing.

6. Pol. Code, § 1083, as amended in 1899, provides that only those who have "conformed to the law governing the registration of voters are qualified electors"; but the section, as it originally stood, made those qualified whose names were "enrolled on the great register." By the act amending section 1083, and providing for the use of affidavits as a register in the various precincts (St. 1899, p. 59, c. 53), sections 1094, 1095, 1096, 1097, 1103, and 1105 were also amended (pages 60–62) so as to require the one charged with the registration of voters to keep in his office a register giving the names of qualified electors, the entries in which register shall be made on affidavit showing the facts required to be stated in the entry; and such person is required to preserve all affidavits used before him or his deputies in procuring registration, and to arrange the same in a book, which shall be delivered to the boards of election, and "constitute the register to be used at such election." During the absence of a deputy registration clerk, electors visited his store to be registered, and their registrations were made out by a person employed in the store, who was not a deputy, but what purported to be the affidavits of such persons were contained in the book of affidavits delivered to the board of election. Held, that such persons were qualified electors; the affidavits merely constituting an official list of voters who have been enrolled by the registration officer on the great register, and the phrase in section 1083, "conformed to the law governing registration," merely meaning those who have caused themselves to be enrolled on the authentic list.

7. Where, on an election contest, it appeared from the affidavits of certain voters that each of them had sworn to a statement that he could read the Constitution in English, write his name, and mark his ballot, and, apart from the undisputed fact that they were not able to mark their ballot, and that some of the affidavits were signed by mark, and some by another person at the request of the deponent, there was nothing to indicate that the registration officer did not fully question them or correctly enter their statements, such facts were not sufficient to support a conclusion that the registration officer did not fully perform his duty.

8. Pol. Code, § 1208, provides that when it appears from the register that any elector has declared under oath, when he registered, that he cannot read, or that by reason of physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot, he shall, on request, receive assistance in preparing his ballot; and section 1096, subd. 11, provides that the entry on the great register must show the fact whether or not the elector desiring to be registered is able to read the Constitution and to write his name, and whether or not the elector has any physical disability by reason of which he cannot mark his ballot, and, if he cannot mark his ballot by reason of physical disability, the nature of the disability must be entered. Held, that the question whether an elector cannot read, or cannot mark his ballot because of physical disability, is to be ascertained from the entry on the great register.

9. Under Pol. Code, § 1096, subd. 11, and section 1208, and section 1097, providing that the affidavit for registration of the voter must show all the facts required to be stated in the entry on the register, except the date of entry, the fact that the register showed that an elector had declared on oath that he could not write his name did not entitle him to assistance.

10. Where the blank form of affidavit used by a voter was so filled in as to show that he declared under oath at the time of registration, as required by Pol. Code, § 1208, that he could not read the Constitution in English, he was entitled to assistance, irrespective of whether he also stated he could not mark his ballot.

11. Where election officers assisted the voter in preparing his ballot, the fact that they did not take the oath prescribed, to the effect that they would not give any information regarding the manner in which it was marked, until after they had assisted him, did not invalidate his vote.

12. Pol. Code, § 52, subd. 3, provides that every person has, in law, a residence, which cannot be lost until another is gained. By section 1239, subd. 4, it is declared that a person must not be considered to have gained a residence in any precinct into which he comes for temporary purposes merely; and subdivision 9 provides that the mere intention to acquire a new residence, without the fact of removal, avails nothing, "neither does the fact of removal without the intention." Held, that where a voter had no intention of making the precinct into which he moved his home, but went there for temporary purposes, he did not lose his legal residence in the precinct from which he moved, although he did not have a place in such precinct that he could call his home.

13. Where there was a plain and distinct impression of a cross in the blank space on a ballot under the column of Socialist candidates, the ballot was invalid.

14. Where a ballot bore on the back thereof the initials "W. H." and "R. L. O.," in different handwriting, in the upper left-hand corner, and on an election contest there was no pretense that the initials were not those of some of the election officers, placed on the ballot by them at some time during the canvass by the board of election, a finding that they were not placed thereon by the voter was warranted.

McFarland, Henshaw, and Lorigan, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Election contest by H. L. Huston against W. A. Anderson for the office of district attorney of Yolo county. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed on rehearing.

Clark & Clark, G. Clark, and E. R. Bush, for appellant. A. C. Huston, C. W. Thomas, and B. A. Martin (William S. Wall, of counsel), for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an election contest, the parties thereto having been rival candidates for the office of district attorney of Yolo county at the last general election. The defendant, upon the official canvass, was declared elected, and in due time plaintiff inaugurated this contest, based upon various grounds, which, upon the trial and upon this appeal, narrowed down to three points—the admission of the ballots in evidence, and rulings upon alleged illegal ballots and as to illegal voters. Upon the face of the returns, defendant had received 1,575 and the plaintiff 1,567 votes; the plurality of defendant being 8 votes. After counting the ballots in this contest, and rejecting the ballots of several illegal voters, the court below found that plaintiff had received 1,468 and defendant 1,457 votes, giving to plaintiff a plurality of 11 votes; hence this appeal. Disposing now of the questions as they are presented:

1. Appellant insists that the court erred in admitting the ballots in evidence. This applies to the returns of every precinct in the county; the claim being that these returns were not properly and safely kept by their legal custodian, the county clerk. It is unnecessary to comment at length on the evidence introduced upon this point. While it is true that the county clerk might have kept the ballots in a more secure manner than he did, yet it cannot be said that the evidence shows anything more than that fact, or that it raises any stronger inference than that, by reason of this lesser measure of security, the ballots might have been more easily tampered with than if greater precautions for their safety had been taken. It appears from the evidence that the envelopes containing the ballots were in the same condition as received by the clerk—intact and unopened—and there is no evidence even raising a suspicion that they were disturbed or tampered with. The lower court found that they were kept in substantial compliance with the law, and admitted them. As said in Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 107, 41 Pac. 455, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68: "So, too, when a substantial compliance with the provisions of the statute has been shown, the burden of proof shifts to the contestee of establishing that, notwithstanding this compliance, the ballots have in fact been tampered with, or that they have been exposed under such circumstances that a violation of them might have taken place. But this proof is not made by a naked showing that it was possible for one to have molested them. The law cannot guard against a mere possibility, and no judgment of any of its courts is ever rendered upon one. When all this has been said, it remains to be added that the question is one of fact to be determined in the first instance by the jury or trial judge; and, while the ballots should be admitted only after clear and satisfactory evidence of their integrity, yet, when they have been admitted, this court will not disturb the ruling, unless we, in turn, are as well satisfied that the evidence does not warrant it. In this case we do not think the ruling was erroneous." We think, too, that within this rule the evidence sufficiently warranted the court in admitting the vote of Woodland precinct, No. 1, specially objected to by defendant.

2. As to illegal ballots: Upon the contest the plaintiff objected to 495 ballots, and the defendant to 328, and the validity of the rulings of the court upon these objections is next presented for consideration. The original ballots (excepting some few instances where counsel apparently abandoned their objections and omitted them) by stipulation were transmitted to this court for examination under the objections. The number so transmitted exceeds 700, and the objections urged embrace, on one side or the other, every conceivable objection which could be raised. We have examined the ballots thoroughly, and considered the objections carefully, and, stating the result of such consideration generally, we find that the court erred in sustaining objections made by plaintiff to 19 ballots voted for defendant, Anderson, and in overruling 31 objections of plaintiff to ballots likewise voted for defendant; and it erred likewise in sustaining objections of defendant to 28 ballots cast for plaintiff, Huston, and in overruling 30 objections of defendant to ballots likewise voted for plaintiff. As a result of these errors in sustaining or overruling objections, the plaintiff loses 30 votes and gains 28; the defendant loses 31 votes and gains 19 votes; giving the plaintiff a gain upon this appeal of 10 votes, which, with the 11 majority found in his favor by the lower court, makes his present majority 21. It can be of no benefit to the legal profession to set forth the particular objections urged to the ballots on either side. They involve no novel questions, and, under the amendment to the election law by the last Legislature, may never arise again. It may be mentioned, however, that the court sustained objections upon both sides against counting ballots where the voter had stamped a cross on the parallelogram containing the candidate's name after the name, but not in the square, and had stamped a cross either under or on the word "Yes" or "No," in voting on constitutional amendments, and not in the square. As the law stood (Pol. Code, § 1205) when this election took place, the law did not require the cross to be stamped in the square, but only after the name of the candidate (Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 109, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68), and, as to constitutional amendments, against the answer he desired to give. So in neither case was the stamp a distinguishing mark. The ballots were therefore valid, and should have been counted. While we do not consider that any practical purpose can be subserved by calling further particular attention to any of the objections urged, yet, for the benefit of counsel in the case, we will mention those objections, by number, which the court should have sustained or overruled on account of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the objections. The court should have sustained plaintiff's objections Nos. 3, 59, 64, 74, 75, 77, 104, 117, 120, 121, 123, 124, 157, 158, 167, 176, 184, 185, 194, 215, 225, 237, 241, 251, 252, 258, 275, 278, 281, 290. It should have also sustained those of defendant numbered 33, 63, 125, 142, 144, 153, 160, 172, 207, 214, 216, 235, 247, 259, 271, 282, 287, 293, 298, 312, 345, 360, 372, 409, 415, 434, 453, 468, 471, 475. The following objections of plaintiff should have been overruled: Nos. 21, 92, 115, 119, 160, 161, 179, 198, 203, 207, 208, 214, 234, 248, 249, 268, 269, 272, 289. Likewise those of defendant numbered 10, 19, 20, 29, 50, 80, 89, 92, 159, 163, 165, 174, 185, 186, 213, 266, 290, 291, 303, 316, 317, 321, 368, 381, 435, 447, 467, 485. The ballot numbered "Deft. 6," which is sent up here to point defendant's objection of the same number, is obviously not the ballot to which he objected, or which should have been marked as his exhibit. It contains a vote in his own favor, and has nothing upon it rendering it in the slightest degree open to the objection he made to it, or to any other objection. It is so apparent that the wrong exhibit was marked and sent up that we pay no attention to the objection. Defendant's objection No. 399, made in the lower court, was against a ballot containing a vote in his own favor. It was overruled below, and he has urged on this appeal that the ruling was erroneous. The original objection was doubtless through an oversight of counsel; but as he has not abandoned this assignment of error, and presents it on this appeal, and as it is apparent that the ballot is open to the objection he urged against it—a double cross—we are compelled to pass on it, and find that his objection should have been sustained, and the ballot rejected, though the effect is to lose him a vote.

Although upon this appeal the majority of the plaintiff has been increased, it cannot avail him for the purpose of an affirmance of the judgment, because, in our opinion, the court committed errors which, if not committed, might have had the effect of overcoming this majority in favor of defendant, and for these errors a new trial will have to be ordered. These errors are as follows, and were committed by the court in ruling as to illegal voters:

3. In that regard it is insisted by appellant that the court erred in refusing to permit him to show, by an inquiry of them, how 20 certain persons who had voted at the election cast their votes for the office of district attorney. All these persons had on election day been, at their request, assisted in marking their ballots by members of the election board at various precincts, and none of them had made oath on registering that he was unable to read or was under any physical disability. On the contrary, in addition to the absence of any statement of the existence of physical disability, it appeared from their affidavits of registration that they could all read and mark their ballots, except a voter—Pulze—who in his affidavit swore that he could not read the Constitution in the English language, but could mark his ballot. The law provides (Pol. Code, § 1208) the conditions under which voters who are unable to read, or are suffering from physical disability, may have assistance in marking their ballots. It declares that "when it appears from the register that any elector has declared under oath, when he registered, that he cannot read, or that by reason of physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot, he shall, upon request, receive the assistance of two officers of election of different political parties, in the marking thereof, to be chosen as follows," etc. It will be observed from the reading of this section that it is only when it appears "from the register that the elector declared under oath when he registered that he could not read, or was physically disabled from marking his ballot," that he shall receive assistance. The evidence of those matters which shall entitle a voter to assistance are required to appear in his affidavit of registration (Pol. Code, § 1096), and these affidavits constitute the precinct register to be used by the election board upon election day. It will be found that the test provided for in section 1208 is the only one contained in the election law for determining whether a voter shall be given assistance or not, and it provides the only condition upon which assistance can be extended. No other test is provided for, and no other test is permissible. When the law has designated a condition under which a right may be exercised, it is necessary to a valid exercise of that right that such condition should exist. This conclusion is strengthened when we take into consideration previous legislation upon this subject. When section 1208 of the Political Code was first adopted, it provided that "any elector who declares under oath to the presiding election officer that he cannot read, and that by reason thereof, or by reason of physical disability, he is unable to mark his ballot, shall, upon request, receive the assistance of any one of the election officers he may choose in the marking thereof," etc. St. 1891, p. 175, c. 130. This section was amended in 1893 (St. 1893, p. 307, c. 220), but was not disturbed as to the oral oath. In 1895 (St. 1895, p. 306, c. 216) the section was amended into the present form, which abolished the right theretofore accorded to the voter of making, when he presented himself to vote, an oral oath of his inability to read, or of physical disability which prevented his marking his ballot, and requiring these facts warranting his assistance to appear in his affidavit of registration, which would be in the precinct register, in the hands of the election board, and an examination of which by them would conclusively determine his right, under the law, to assistance when he applied for it. If an examination of the voter's affidavit in the precinct register is not the exclusive method of ascertaining his right to assistance, then the only other way he would be entitled to it would be by a simple request for it, or upon an oral oath establishing his necessity for it, made when he appeared to vote.

Now, it cannot be claimed that either of these methods is provided for in the election law. No one would seriously contend that he would be entitled to it on a simple request, and, if his oral oath was to be accepted (which was not even administered to any of these persons whose votes are here in question), why did the Legislature adopt the idle ceremony of repealing the only provision of law which ever accorded it to him, and substituting his affidavit of registration as sole evidence of it? We are satisfied from the language of the section, and in view of the previous legislation, that the Legislature intended that the test of a voter's right to assistance should appear on, and be determined by, an examination of the register by the election officers (the affidavits of registration which constitute the precinct register), and that, by amending the law which previously extended the right to make oral oath so as to require the necessary facts to appear in the affidavit of registration, this latter method was intended by the Legislature to be exclusive, and that the provision is mandatory. We are mindful that cases may arise where the voter, between the day of final registration and the day of election, may become so physically incapacitated as to be unable to mark his ballot; and, as such fact could not appear on the register, under the view we hold of the section he could not be permitted to vote. What the rights of a voter under such circumstances would be—whether (the law having failed to make provision for such a contingency, and only contemplating that the disabilities existing at the time of registration should appear in the affidavit of registration) the voter would be entitled to assistance upon taking an oath before the board of election—is a matter not here involved, because it appears from the evidence that all the persons whose votes the appellant challenges as illegal suffered from the disabilities, which they claimed on the day of election entitled them to assistance, when they made their affidavits of registration. We think these votes were illegal, and that the court erred in refusing to allow appellant to inquire how the parties depositing them voted. Upon the general proposition of the illegality of these votes, attention is directed to the cases of Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 113, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68; Patterson v. Hanley, 136 Cal. 275, 68 Pac. 821; and Summerson v. Schilling (Md.) 51 Atl. 613.

Evidence was taken upon the trial, over appellant's objection, which showed that these persons whose votes were challenged as illegal were, in fact, on the date of their registration, either unable to read, or, by reason of physical disability, unable to mark their ballots. As the law, however, does not leave the question of the right of the voter to assistance to be determined by the court when the legality of such vote is challenged upon a contest, but requires the voter's right to assistance to appear from his affidavit as set forth in the precinct register, the court erred in refusing to permit appellant to question these parties as to how they voted. In order to avoid any question upon a new trial as to the identity of these illegal voters, we give their names as appearing from the record, omitting their initials. They are Austin, Nickell, Alexander, Jones, Wilger, Pulze, Washabaugh, Hill, Gibson, Brannigan, Olsen, Harrington, Valine, Rose, Peters, Sacramento, La Montagne, Angelo, Thomas Adams, and Hiller.

As to additional illegal voters, the court also erred in refusing to permit the defendant to show how they had voted for district attorney. The evidence concerning these voters was that the county clerk had appointed one F. B. Edson, who was engaged in a mercantile business with his brother, T. W. Edson, at Knight's Landing, as a deputy clerk to attend to the registration of voters in the election precinct of Knight's Landing. During the absence of F. B. Edson, the deputy registration clerk, in the mountains, certain electors came to the store to be registered for the purpose of a party primary. Their registrations were made out by T. W. Edson, who signed the name of his brother thereto as deputy clerk; writing under that signature, as evidence of his action, "per T. W. E." T. W. Edson was not a deputy clerk, and no other registration of these persons was had. These parties were never legally registered, and their votes were illegal. It is contended by plaintiff that their registrations were taken before a de facto officer and were valid. Conceding that, if so taken before a de facto officer, they would be valid, still T. W. Edson was not a de facto officer. A de facto officer is one who, though not authorized by law to act in the official capacity he assumes, yet claims to be so authorized, and in fact does act as an officer. T. W. Edson claimed no right to act as deputy clerk, nor did he pretend to be such; neither was he reputed to be a deputy clerk. In fact, he did not, in these registrations, assume to act as a deputy, but simply as a substitute for his brother, whose name he signed as the deputy, "per T. W. E.," as his representative. Any individual in possession of blank affidavits for registration could have prepared them in the same manner, and the same claim could as well be insisted on to sustain their validity. As section 1083 of the Political Code stood prior to its amendment in 1899, the law required, in order to entitle an elector to vote, only that his "name shall be enrolled upon the great register of the county." The law then, as now, required an affidavit of registration to be made by the voter; but, prior to the amendment, facts contained in the affidavit were enrolled upon the great register, and the entry of the elector's name in the great register was the evidence of his right to vote.

The affidavit was no part of the register. The amendment of this section in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 60, c. 53) changed this. It is no longer provided that the test of the right of an elector to vote shall be determined by his enrollment on the great register, but an entirely different test is provided, which now is that he "shall have conformed to the law governing the registration of voters." And as the law now requires that the affidavits of registration themselves shall constitute the precinct register upon which an elector is entitled to vote, it is essential, in order to so entitle him, that there should be a strict compliance with the law, to the extent, at least, that his affidavit for registration should be made before either a de jure or de facto officer. These illegal voters were Reddington, Faulk, Roberts, Jenkins, and William Adams.

It is insisted by defendant that certain other persons were illegal voters by reason of nonresidence in the precincts in which they voted, and that the court erred in not sustaining his inquiry as to how they voted. Residence is a question of fact, in which the intention of the party enters as an important element; and, when the court has found upon the matter, such finding will not be disturbed, unless it appears that there is an absence of evidence to support it. We find no such condition in the record. There was evidence, including the declared intention of all the parties upon the subject, from which the court was warranted in finding that they all resided in the precincts where they voted, and this finding concludes us from reviewing the matter. This applies to the finding by the court upon all claims of residence or nonresidence in precincts which are urged by either party upon this appeal.

There is nothing in defendant's contention that certain electors were illegally registered. This claim is based on the fact that, after certain voters had registered, it was ascertained that the affidavits of registration contained incorrect designations of their voting precincts, and at their request, or at the suggestion of the outside deputy registration clerks, who had registered them, but were in doubt at the time as to the lines of the various precincts, and in some instances from his own knowledge that the names of the precincts inserted were not correct, the county clerk corrected them by inserting the proper precinct names. All these voters in fact actually resided, when they registered, in the precincts represented by the correction. That the wrong precincts were originally designated was clearly a mistake on the part of the deputy registration officers, or of the voters themselves; and the correction was simply to conform to the fact, and made long before the time for registration expired. Under these circumstances the corrections were properly made, and did not affect the validity of the registration. Nor is there any merit in defendant's claim that one Marston was an illegal voter. His formal affidavit for registration signed by him was in the precinct register, but there was no jurat of the county clerk thereto showing that he had in fact been sworn. The evidence shows that Marston went to the county clerk's office to be registered, and that the county clerk himself prepared his affidavit; and, while Marston does not remember whether he took an oath before making it, or not, he understood that he was making an affidavit. The clerk did not remember whether the oath was administered, or not, but testified that it was usual for himself and deputies to swear the voters when they registered them. As it is made the duty of the clerk and deputies to administer the oath to parties applying for registration, and as the affidavit was inserted by the clerk in the precinct register as that of a person entitled to vote, the court was justified in presuming that the clerk discharged his duty and administered the necessary oath, but neglected certifying the fact. An elector is not required to see that the county clerk certifies his registration affidavit, and, when he has done all that the law requires of him to effect registration, he cannot be deprived of his vote by the failure of the clerk to perform his duty.

We have now disposed of all the points raised on this appeal by either party, and, from what we have said, the judgment of the lower court must be reversed, and a new trial granted. It only remains to determine to what extent the lower court should proceed upon such new trial. As all the exceptions of both parties to the action of the lower court in the reception or rejection of ballots are presented in the record, and this court has passed upon them, and determined upon review that, from the legal ballots cast, the plaintiff has a majority of 21 votes, this determination is final; and upon a new trial the lower court and the parties shall be confined to ascertaining how the persons whom we have determined were illegal voters voted for the office of district attorney, and, upon a basis of 21 majority in favor of plaintiff, ascertained by us from the legal votes cast, determine from the evidence of such illegal voters whether this majority is lessened, equaled, or overcome, and render a judgment accordingly.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, limited to the extent that we have above indicated.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the judgment of reversal. I concur in the opinion, except as to the portions thereof relating to assisted voters, and to the voters whose purported affidavits were taken by T. W. Edson. The first class numbered 20, and the second class 5. I am not prepared to say that the 20 assisted voters were not illegal voters, but, in the view I take of the case, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not they were. By the recount, plaintiff has 21 majority. Assuming all of the assisted voters to have been illegal voters, and that they all voted for him, he would still have a majority of 1 after the deduction of their votes. To reverse the judgment, it is therefore essential to hold, as does the majority opinion, that the 5 voters whose so-called affidavits were taken by T. W. Edson were also illegal voters. I cannot concur in this conclusion. The evidence showed that each of these voters had resided in the precinct for over 20 years, and had voted in that precinct before. There is no claim that they did not possess all of the qualifications of electors as prescribed by the Constitution. Section 1, art. 2. They were electors of the precinct. Bergevin v. Curtz, 127 Cal. 86, 59 Pac. 312. The objection is not that these voters were not electors of the precinct in which they voted, but that they had not "conformed to the law governing the registration of voters," which is by section 1083 of the Political Code, as amended in 1899, made a condition precedent to the right of an elector to exercise the privilege of voting. It is well established that the Legislature may make reasonable regulations for the registration of voters, for the purpose of providing "a means whereby the elector who is entitled to vote may be known by having his name enrolled upon an authentic list," and that it may require electors to comply therewith as a condition precedent to voting. The validity of the provision of section 1083 of the Political Code relied on by defendant is not, therefore, to be doubted; but that provision means no more than that the elector shall have, in good faith, procured his registration as an elector, so that his name appears upon the authentic list provided by law. This had been done in the case at bar. It is not claimed that the names of these five voters were not entered upon the great register of the county kept in the office of the county clerk (sections 1094–1096, Pol. Code), and what purported to be the affidavits used for the purpose of procuring their registration (section 1103, Pol. Code) were contained in the book of affidavits delivered by the county clerk to the board of election of the precinct, to be used as the register at such election (section 1116, Pol. Code). The purported affidavits signed by the voters were on their face without fault, the "per T. W. E." referred to in the majority opinion having been stricken out in the office of the county clerk; and they had been received by that officer as sufficient affidavits for the purpose of registration. The real objection is that the statements of the voters, forwarded by their procurance to the office of the clerk for the purpose of obtaining registration, had not, in fact, been sworn to by them before the county clerk or any of his deputies. The provision that no name shall be entered upon the register of the clerk, except upon an affidavit made before the clerk or one of his deputies, is directed entirely to the county clerk (section 1097, Pol. Code; State v. Lattimore, 120 N. C. 426, 26 S. E. 638); and, while the clerk should not register an applicant without such an affidavit being made, and while, perhaps, a registration made without the prerequisite of a sufficient affidavit might be canceled at the suit of any person, as having been illegally made (section 1109, Pol. Code), the registration is not void. In Davis v. O'Berry, 93 Md. 708, 50 Atl. 273, it was held, in a proceeding to have a name erased from the registration book, that a complete answer to the showing that the voter had not been sworn as required by law would be made by a showing that the voter in fact possessed all of the qualifications which would entitle him to be registered. In State v. Lattimore, supra, it was held that, where an elector's name appeared on the registration book, he had a right to vote, whether he had been sworn prior to registration, as required by law, or not. In Tullos v. Lane, 45 La. Ann. 333, 12 South. 508, it was held that where the registration had been carried on, under verbal authority from the registrar, by persons not having legal authority so to do, voters actually entitled to vote could not, after an election, be deprived of their constitutional right to have participated therein, by the simple fact, of itself, that the person who registered them was not legally authorized so to do. See, also, McCrary on Elections (4th Ed.) § 140. No case has been cited, and I have been unable to find any, where a person who was in fact entitled to vote if registered, and whose name was enrolled on the register, and who was allowed to vote, has been held, after the election, to have been an illegal voter, simply for the reason that there was some irregularity or informality in the method by which he was registered. The majority opinion appears to concede that, under the law as it stood prior to the amendments of 1899, a vote cast by such a person would have been a legal vote. I cannot see that there has been any material change made in this regard by such amendments.

We concur: VAN DYKE, J.; SHAW, J.

On Rehearing.

(Nov. 12, 1904.)

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an election contest, the office in question being that of district attorney of Yolo county. It has once been decided by this court in bank; but upon petition of both parties the decision was vacated, and a rehearing granted, for the purpose of reconsidering some of the questions involved. Most of the material facts are stated in the opinions—majority and dissenting—heretofore filed.

By the former decision it was held that upon the face of the legal ballots the respondent had a majority of 21 votes, but that the trial court had erred in its conclusion that 20 electors who had voted at the election, but who had the assistance of election officers in the marking of their ballots, although it did not appear from the register that they could not read, or by reason of physical disqualification could not mark their ballots, were legal voters. It was also held that there was a similar error in holding that five electors of Knight's Landing precinct, who had not made an affidavit for registration before a proper registration officer, were legal voters. The judgment was therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; such new trial to be confined to the ascertainment of the fact as to how the 25 so-called illegal voters voted on the office of district attorney; and the trial court was directed, "upon a basis of twenty-one majority in favor of plaintiff, ascertained by us from the legal votes cast, to determine from the evidence of such illegal voters whether this majority is lessened, equaled, or overcome, and render a judgment accordingly."

1. Upon a further consideration of the question as to the legality of the five Knight's Landing voters, we are satisfied that they should be held to be legal voters. Our views upon the law applicable to the facts concerning these voters, as the same are set forth in the opinions in this case heretofore filed, are stated in the dissenting opinion filed on the former decision. In addition to the authorities therein cited in support of the proposition that where a person was in fact entitled to vote if registered, and he did in good faith attempt to comply with the law in regard to registration, and his name did in fact appear upon the register furnished by the proper officer to the election officers, and he was allowed to vote, he will not, after the election, be held to have been an illegal voter, simply for the reason that there was some irregularity or informality in the method by which he was registered, the following cases are cited, viz.: State v. Sadler, 25 Nev. 131, 174, 58 Pac. 284, 59 Pac. 546, 63 Pac. 128, 83 Am. St. Rep. 573; Stinson v. Sweeny (Nev.) 30 Pac. 999; and Lane v. Bailey (Mont.) 75 Pac. 192. See, also, note to Patton v. Watkins (Ala.) 31 South. 93, 90 Am. St. Rep. 58.

In addition to what was said in such dissenting opinion, it may be said that it is apparent from an examination of the Code provisions applicable thereto that no material change was made in this regard by the amendment of section 1083, Pol. Code, in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 59, c. 53). Much reliance is placed upon the fact that, under the section as it originally stood, persons otherwise qualified, whose names were "enrolled upon the great register," were declared to be qualified electors, while, under the section as amended in 1899, only those who have "conformed to the law governing the registration of voters" are declared to be such qualified electors. Taken in connection with the other provisions of the Code, these expressions mean practically the same thing, viz., that those who have caused themselves to be enrolled by the proper officer upon the authentic list of electors of the county are qualified electors thereof. We are speaking, of course, of those who were in fact otherwise entitled to vote.

Learned counsel for appellant are mistaken in their contention that there is no such thing as a great register, other than the affidavits made by the electors. By the act amending section 1083, Pol. Code, and providing for the use of affidavits as a register in the various precincts (St. 1899, p. 59, c. 53), sections relative to the keeping of the great register, the entry of names therein, etc. (sections 1094, 1095, 1096, 1097, 1103, 1105, Pol. Code), were also amended (St. 1899, pp. 60–62, c. 53). Under these sections, as so amended, it is the duty of the person charged with the registration of voters to keep in his office "a register in which shall be entered the names of the qualified electors" (section 1094), and therein to enter the names of the qualified electors (section 1095); the entry to show certain facts (section 1096); such entry to be made on affidavit showing the facts required to be stated in the entry (section 1097); and to leave in such register a blank for cancellation, which is to be made by "writing in such blank the word 'Canceled,' and a statement of the reasons therefor, and by writing in red ink across the face of the affidavit used in procuring such registration the same words as are used in making the cancellation in the great register." Section 1105. By the same act the officer is required to "preserve all affidavits used before himself or his deputies for the purpose of procuring registration" (section 1103) within 15 days after the close of registration, arrange such affidavits for each precinct, and bind them into a book (section 1113), which, together with printed indices, shall be delivered by him to the respective boards of election, and this book of affidavits "shall constitute the register to be used at such election" in the precinct. Sections 1115, 1116.

The plain object of this legislation as to the use of the affidavits at the precincts, instead of a printed copy of the great register, which was formerly used by the election officers, was simply to dispense with the necessity of printing copies of the great register. Under it, what purport to be the affidavits used "for the purpose of procuring registration" simply take the place of the printed copy of the great register which was formerly used. They no more constitute the register itself than did such printed copy, and, when the law says that a book of precinct affidavits "shall constitute the register to be used at such election," it simply means that such book shall constitute the list of voters authenticated by the proper officer as qualified electors of the precinct, which is to be used by the election board. It is an official list of the electors who have in fact been enrolled by the registration officer upon the great register, as electors of the precinct. In the official list in use at Knight's Landing precinct appeared the names and purported affidavits of these five electors. It thus appeared that they had in fact been enrolled by the registration officer in the great register of the county. Having been so enrolled by the registration officer, and being in fact electors of the precinct, entitled to vote if registered, they were qualified electors thereof.

2. In regard to the 20 assisted voters, we adhere to the general views expressed in the opinion heretofore filed. There is no question presented by the record in this case as to the effect of the failure of the registration officer to obtain the necessary information from the elector for the entry to be made on the affidavit and register, or, such information having been obtained, to properly record the same. If it appeared that it was the fault of the registration officer that the register failed to show that the electors who were in fact unable to mark their ballots had declared under oath, when registered, that they could not read, or that by reason of physical disability they were unable to mark their ballots, a different question would be presented, which question it is unnecessary for us to consider on this appeal.

It appeared generally from the affidavits that each of these voters had sworn to a statement that he could read the Constitution in the English language, write his name, and mark his ballot. Apart from the undisputed fact that they were not able to mark their ballots, and the fact that some of the affidavits were signed by mark, and some by another person at the request of the deponent, there is nothing to indicate that the registration officer did not fully question them as to these matters at the time of registration, or that he did not correctly enter their statements in regard thereto. These facts are not sufficient to support a conclusion that the registration officer did not fully perform his duty in this matter. To so hold would be to practically abolish the statute as to assisted voters.

By the petition for rehearing presented by respondent, it was specially urged that, as to the assisted voters Hiller, Washabaugh, Hill, Gibson, Alexander, Brannigan, and Pulze, the register sufficiently showed them entitled to assistance. The affidavit of Hiller stated that he could read, write, and mark his ballot. The additional statement contained therein to the effect that he was an invalid did not show him to be entitled to assistance.

The affidavits of Alexander, Washabaugh, Hill, Gibson, and Brannigan stated that they were not able to write their names, but that they could read the Constitution in the English language and mark their ballots. The fact that the registration officer did ascertain and enter the statement that these electors could not write supports the theory that he questioned them as to all the matters required by subdivision 11 of section 1096, Pol. Code, to be shown in the entry in the great register, and correctly set forth their answers thereon. The fact that the register showed that these electors had declared on oath that they could not write their names did not entitle them to assistance. Section 1208, Pol. Code, alone prescribes the conditions upon which such assistance may be given, viz.: "When it appears from the register that any elector has declared under oath, when he registered, that he cannot read, or that by reason of physical disability he is unable to mark his ballot." These facts are to be ascertained, as contended by plaintiff, from the entry made on the great register under section 1096, Pol. Code, which provides that such entry must show (11) "the fact whether or not the elector desiring to be registered is able to read the Constitution in the English language and to write his name, and whether or not the elector has any physical disability by reason of which he cannot mark his ballot; and if he cannot mark his ballot by reason of physical disability, then the nature of such disability must be entered." Under section 1097, Pol. Code, the affidavit for registration of the voter must show all the facts required to be stated in the entry on the register, except the date of entry. But there is nothing in these provisions to detract from the force of the provisions of section 1208, Pol. Code, even though they were enacted subsequent to the enactment of said section 1208, which is not the case. The provisions referred to above constituted portions of sections 1096 and 1097 at the time of the enactment of section 1208 in its present form, and the subsequent amendments of sections 1096 and 1097 made no change in such provisions.

Upon further consideration of the case of the voter Pulze, we are satisfied that the register showed a case in which, under the provisions of section 1208, Pol. Code, the voter was entitled to assistance. The blank form of affidavit used in the case of this voter was so filled in as to show that he declared under oath at the time of registration that he could not read the Constitution in the English language. This presented a case where, under the express provision of the statute, the voter was entitled, on demand. to assistance, regardless of whether or not he had also stated that he could mark his ballot. It further appeared that he was in fact not able to read or write. There was evidence sufficient to justify the court in finding that the election officers assisting him did take the oath prescribed by law, to the effect that they would not give any information regarding the manner in which his ballot was marked, and the mere fact that such oath was not taken until immediately after they assisted him should not be held to invalidate his vote. It follows that Pulze must be taken from the list of illegally assisted voters.

3. It was contended on rehearing by the appellant, and the point was made in his petition for a rehearing, that the voter Walter Grim was an illegal voter, for the reason that he was not on the day of the election a resident of the precinct wherein he voted. He was held by the trial court to have been a legal voter, and the appellant was therefore not allowed to show how he voted. We cannot disturb the finding of the lower court as to this voter. The evidence was sufficient to sustain a conclusion that he had no intention of making the precinct into which he moved his residence. He said that he went there to undertake temporary employment only, intended to return to Woodland when he completed such employment, and did not intend to give up Woodland as his home when he left. When residence is spoken of in connection with the right of a person to vote, "legal residence" is meant. Every person has, in law, a residence, and a residence cannot be lost until another is gained. Pol. Code, § 52, subd. 3. By subdivision 4 of section 1239, Id., it is declared that a person must not be considered to have gained a residence in any precinct into which he comes for temporary purposes merely, without the intention of making such precinct his home; and by subdivision 9 of the same section it is provided that "the mere intention to acquire a new residence, without the fact of removal, avails nothing, neither does the fact of removal, without the intention." If the voter had no intention of making the precinct into which he moved his home, but went there for temporary purposes only, he did not gain a residence there, and consequently did not lose his legal residence in the precinct from which he moved, notwithstanding that he may not have had any certain house, room, or place therein that he could call his home. That precinct continued to be his legal residence until he gained a legal residence elsewhere. The evidence was such that it might have sustained a contrary finding, but not such as to warrant us in disturbing the finding of the court below. See, in this connection, Smith v. Thomas, 121 Cal. 533, 54 Pac. 71; Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 39 Pac. 19.

4. Upon a further examination of defendant's ballot No. 189—a vote for respondent counted over appellant's objection—we are satisfied that the objection made thereto by appellant was good, and that the vote should not have been counted. There was a plain and distinct impression of a cross in the blank space under the column of Socialist candidates. This, under the authorities, must be held to have invalidated the ballot. This error, however, is more than offset by a mistake in the former opinion in regard to defendant's ballot or objection 153. In such opinion it was stated that the court erred in overruling 30 objections of defendant to ballots voted for plaintiff, including No. 153. This ballot was therefore by this court deducted from plaintiff.

It appears from the record of the case that the trial court did in fact sustain defendant's objection to this ballot, and it therefore was not counted for plaintiff in the lower court. It further appears that the only objection to the ballot was one that, as will appear hereinafter, we do not consider to have been a valid objection, viz., that the voter, in expressing his choice as to constitutional amendments, had placed the cross on the word "Yes" or "No," instead of in the voting square to the right thereof. The objection should not, therefore, have been sustained by the trial court. Plaintiff should have been credited by us with another vote, instead of being deprived of a vote.

5. As to the other points made by the parties on rehearing, we adhere to the views announced in the original opinion. We have carefully considered appellant's contention relative to "defendant's ballot No. 1." There was, it is true, a tear extending from the top down through a portion of the ballot, but there was no "piece torn out of the top of the ballot," as urged by the objection. The tear was not the kind of mark that a voter would ordinarily place upon a ballot to serve as a distinguishing mark, and there is nothing in the appearance of this tear to indicate that it was not made accidentally or unconsciously; and conceding, for the purposes of the case, that it was among the ballots that had been rejected by the election board, we cannot say that the evidence was such as to compel the conclusion that the tear had been made by the voter. As to another objection made to the ballot, viz., that the name of "R. L. Ogden" had been written on the back thereof, it appears that the name "R. L. Ogden" was not written thereon, but that the initials "W. H." and "R. L. O.," in different handwriting, had been written on the back in the upper left-hand corner. There was no pretense in the trial court that these were not, as they appeared to be, initials of some of the election officers, placed on the ballot by them at some time during the canvass by the board of election. The trial court was fully justified in concluding that they were not placed thereon by the voter, or prior to the deposit of the ballot in the ballot box.

We have also fully considered appellant's contention as to the ballots where the cross stamped by the elector to indicate his vote as to constitutional amendments was placed upon the word "Yes" or "No," instead of in the voting square immediately to the right thereof. This question affects five ballots cast for respondent and one cast for appellant. Upon this point we adhere to the views expressed in the original opinion, and in the cases of Tout v. Hawkins (Cal.) 76

Pac. 897, and Hannah v. Green (Cal.) 76 Pac. 708.

The rejection of ballot 189, and the rectifying of the error in regard to ballot 153, leaves respondent 22 majority. According to the views of this court, there were only 19 voters who may be held to have been illegal voters, and, if it be conceded that each of those voted for respondent, he would still have 3 majority, which is sufficient to support the judgment in his favor.

It follows that the judgment of the superior court must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment of affirmance, and in the opinion of Justice ANGELLOTTI, except as to the torn ballot (defendant's ballot No. 1). I think the evidence shows it was torn by the voter, and delivered to the officers in that condition. A deduction of this vote and of all the illegally assisted votes from respondent's score would not, however, change the result.

We dissent: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.

LORIGAN, J. I dissent, and adhere to the opinion heretofore delivered.

PEOPLE v. SING LEE. (Cr. 1,178.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONDUCT OF TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY—NEW TRIAL.

1. In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, the district attorney asked defendant, when a witness in his own behalf, whether he had been "offering for sale across the track a roll of silk." The question was ruled out, but, in arguing to the jury, the prosecuting attorney stated that defendant was a "fence keeper," and, after alluding to the "hole in the wall," told the jury, in effect, that defendant was keeping "just that sort of a joint," thereby implying that he was keeping a place for the habitual reception of stolen goods. Held, that the discretion of the court in granting defendant a new trial for misconduct of the district attorney would not be interfered with.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Sing Lee was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and from an order granting him a new trial the people appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., C. H. Hoar, Dist. Atty., and B. F. Fowler, Dep. Dist. Atty., for the People. E. R. Jones and B. Berry, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The defendant was found guilty by a jury of the crime of receiving stolen goods, as defined in the statute. The appeal is by the people from an order granting the defendant a new trial. The grounds of the ruling were: "That there was a misconduct on the part of the district attorney in asking the defendant, when a witness in his own behalf, upon cross-examination of said defendant, the following question: 'Q. During last November, were you offering for sale across the track a roll of silk?' And thereafter arguing to the jury that the defendant was a fence keeper, and that such misconduct was prejudicial to the substantial rights of the defendant, and by reason of such misconduct a fair and impartial trial was not had." Objection was made to the question on various grounds, and upon the statement of the district attorney that he had no evidence that the property referred to was stolen, unless it could be drawn out of the witness, the question was ruled out. In the passages in the argument of the district attorney referred to in the order, the defendant was alluded to as a "fence keeper," or "criminal fence keeper," and, following the use of the expressions "hole in the wall" and "fence," the jury were told that it was believed by the people "that the evidence shows that the defendant in this case is keeping just that sort of a joint." The case, we think, is similar in principle to that of People v. Valliere, 127 Cal. 66, 59 Pac. 295, where the judgment and order denying the defendant a new trial were reversed for language of the district attorney to the jury substantially similar to the language used here. In that case, the defendant being on trial for larceny, the district attorney told the jury, in effect, that there was another theft committed by the defendant, "that [he knew] of his own knowledge." Here the jury was told by the district attorney, in effect, that he believed the evidence showed that the defendant was keeping a place for the habitual reception of stolen goods. This, though the contrary is urged, was something quite different from the charge on which the defendant was tried; and it may be said of it, as was said in the former case, that the statement made "was in the nature of evidence. It was the assertion of a damaging fact not only not proven, but in regard to matters that had been expressly ruled out." We are of the opinion, therefore, that this is not a case in which the discretion of the lower court in granting a new trial should be interfered with. And also, we think, the eighth instruction asked by the defendant should have been given, and especially that that part of it instructing the jury not to consider "any proposed evidence which has been offered and disallowed by the court."

We advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the order appealed from is affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

GERMAN SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. COLLINS et al. (S. F. 3,051.)

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

1. The erroneous admission in evidence of a deposition was harmless, where the testimony of the witness making the deposition related solely to a matter which, if eliminated, would leave the judgment amply supported by other evidence in the case.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the German Savings & Loan Society against Adeline F. Collins and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John H. Durst, J. A. Stephens, and Curtis Hillyer, for appellants. W. S. Goodfellow and Goodfellow & Eells, for respondent.

GRAY, C. The defendants are copartners doing a draying business in San Francisco. H. F. Grinnell has been at all the times herein mentioned the general manager and superintendent of said defendants. William P. Bullard had been their bookkeeper, became a defaulter, and was discharged by them in December, 1896, and, after the deposition hereinafter mentioned was taken, committed suicide. During the year 1896 defendants had an account with plaintiff, standing in the name of H. F. Grinnell, superintendent; and during 1896 Bullard presented to the plaintiff three orders, for $1,500, $500, and $500, respectively, all purporting to be signed by "H. F. Grinnell, Supt." Upon these several orders plaintiff paid to Bullard amounts aggregating $2,500. The defendants subsequently notified the plaintiff that the said orders were forgeries, and repudiated the same. This action is brought, under the provisions of section 1050, Code Civ. Proc., by plaintiff, and is in the nature of an action of quia timet to determine the claim and liabilities of the parties as to the $2,500 drawn out by the bookkeeper. The court found, among other things, "that each of the said checks or written orders was valid and executed, made and signed by H. F. Grinnell, superintendent, and by and with the authority of defendants." The court further finds that $1,500 paid by plaintiffs on one of said checks was on the same day deposited to the credit of defendants with the Crocker-Woolworth Bank, and was received by defendants and retained to their own use. The court also finds that the amounts as paid were entered in defendants' passbook, and thereafter said passbook was returned to defendants and retained by them so as to constitute an account stated between the parties, etc. Upon these findings, judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and the defendants appeal from said judgment. No motion for a new trial was made, and the appeal is taken more than 60 days after the entry of judgment.

The appellants urge as their sole ground for reversal that the court erred in admitting in evidence the deposition of Bullard, for the reason that the taking of said deposition was not in all respects fair. The unfairness complained of consisted in the refusal of the witness, on advice of counsel, to answer certain questions on cross-examination. It is needless, however, to enter upon any inquiry as to this matter of unfairness. The testimony of the witness in the deposition related only to the disposition of the moneys obtained by him upon the three orders in question. It contained no evidence whatever upon the subject of the genuineness of the orders or checks. If the deposition, together with the findings in regard to what disposition Bullard made of the money that he obtained on the orders, were eliminated from the case altogether, the judgment would still find ample support in the finding that the checks were genuine. This finding is not, and cannot be, questioned on the record before us. It is plainly apparent, therefore, that the appellants were not injured by the alleged error.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; SMITH, C.

DE LEONIS v. WALSH. (L. A. 1,504.)

DEEDS—DESCRIPTION—INTERESTS CONVEYED.

1. Plaintiff conveyed one-half of her interest in an estate, the deed reciting an intention to convey such interest in the portion of the estate as should finally be distributed and allotted to plaintiff. In an accompanying contract the grantee agreed to use his best endeavors to secure a proper monthly allowance to be made to plaintiff out of the estate for her support during the administration thereof. Held, that such allowance was not within the description of the deed.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge.

Action by M. E. C. De Leonis against E. E. Walsh, administrator of Laurent Etchepare, deceased. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for appellant. H. H. Apel and Horace Bell, for respondent.

SMITH, C. This suit was brought to set aside a conveyance of lands from the plaintiff, Mrs. Leonis, to the deceased, Etchepare, of date January 31, 1894, and also for the recovery of money alleged to be due from him, as the general manager of her estate, under her power of attorney of date January 15, 1890. The court found, in effect, that the conveyance in question was made as a mortgage to secure indebtedness due and to become due from Mrs. Leonis to Etchepare, and that the latter had expended on her account the sum of $13,865.43 and received the sum of $11,421.34, leaving due to him a balance of $2,444.09. The judgment is that, on payment of that amount to the defendant, the land be reconveyed. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and she now appeals from the order. There is no brief on behalf of respondent.

The only questions in the case that need be considered relate to the findings of the court as to several items of the account, which it is claimed by appellant are not justified by the evidence; and, of these, there are at least two as to which, I think, her contention should be sustained. These relate to the credit of $1,000 allowed Etchepare for money paid to Bell and White, and the disallowance of a debit to Etchepare of the sum of $900, which Mrs. Leonis claims she paid to him. The item of $1,000 paid to Bell and White was half of $2,000 of the family allowance received by Etchepare, and was allowed by the referee on the ground that it was due to them under contracts between plaintiff and S. M. White, and White and Bell, by the former of which White was to receive one-half the plaintiff's estate, and, by the latter, Bell one-fourth of White's interest. The former contract, consisting of the deed of Mrs. Leonis and the executory contract of White, is set out in the findings, and it is clear that under its terms White was not entitled to any part of the family allowance, nor does it appear he ever claimed to be. The description in the deed is: "The undivided one-half of [her] interest * * * in the estate of Miguel Leonis, and of the property of which he died seized or possessed, the intention being to convey to the party of the second part said interest in that portion of said estate which shall be finally distributed and allotted to the said party of the first part whether such interest be set apart to [her] as community property or otherwise." And in the accompanying contract White agrees "to use [his] best endeavors to procure a proper monthly allowance to be made to [Mrs. Leonis] out of said estate for her support or maintenance during the administration thereof." The family allowance can hardly be regarded as coming within the description of the deed, and, were such construction otherwise admissible, it would be negatived by the terms of the contract. It is worthy of note that this was all of the family allowance ($6,595) that was paid to or claimed by Bell and White.

As to the remaining item of $900, it is expressly alleged in the complaint that this was paid by Mrs. Leonis to Etchepare for purposes specified; that is to say, in part to pay outstanding indebtedness against her, and the balance to be credited on her supposed indebtedness to him. But this allegation is not denied by the defendant in his amended answer, except as to the number of dollars received; and, indeed—except as to the precise amount—the allegation is in effect admitted in the defendant's allegation "that he did not use or receive for his own use any of said moneys," etc. It is also said by the appellant's counsel, and in the absence of contradiction from the respondent it must be taken as true, that Mrs. Leonis' testimony on this point is uncontradicted by that of the defendant or otherwise. Nor have I been able to discover any such contradictory evidence in the record.

Other objections urged by the appellant to the account may be well taken, but, as we cannot anticipate that on a new trial the evidence will be the same, it will be as well to leave them undetermined.

I advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 551 v. VAN LOBEN SELS et al. (Sac. 1,265.)

DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION—FORFEITURES—CONVEYANCES ON CONDITION—REVERTER—PLEADINGS—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. A deed to a reclamation district created to reclaim land in the district and construct and maintain works for the reclamation of such land, which provided that the district is to hold the premises, for reclamation only, and that, if the land shall cease to be so used, it shall revert to the grantor, gave the grantee no right to use the land for different purposes than that of reclamation, and on its use for such purposes it would revert to the grantor.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 1442, providing that a condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created, every presumption, on conveyance of land for certain purposes and providing for a reverter to the grantor in case of its use for other purposes, is against such reverter, and the party claiming the same must clearly show that the land has ceased to be used for the purpose for which it was granted.

3. In an action by a reclamation district to quiet title to land conveyed to it for reclamation purposes only, and which was to revert to the grantor in case of its use for any other purposes, evidence held to support a finding that the land was used for reclamation purposes, and had never ceased to be so used.

4. A purchaser of land, who took her conveyance with full knowledge of a prior conveyance for the construction and maintenance of reclamation works to be used in the reclamation of lands, could not be heard to say that it was not necessary for the grantee in the prior deed to use the pumping house or ditch for reclamation purposes.

5. The conveyance of land by a reclamation district, in which the right is reserved to use a part of the building on the premises for tools, does not show that the premises have ceased to be used for the purposes of reclamation, in violation of a clause of the deed restricting the conveyance to one for reclamation purposes only.

6. A deed by a reclamation district purporting to convey lands granted to it for reclamation purposes only, if void because of want of power in the district to make the conveyance, still left the title to the property in the reclamation district, and did not operate to put it in the owner of the reversion, which was dependent on the cessation of the use of the land for reclamation purposes.

7. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, providing that an objection not taken by demurrer or answer is deemed to be waived, an objection that plaintiff was a married woman, and that her husband was not made a party to the action, when not taken by demurrer or answer, was waived.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

White & Miller, for appellant. A. L. Shinn, for respondent Reclamation Dist. No. 551. Olney & Olney, for respondent P. J. Van Loben Sels.

COOPER, C. Action to quiet title. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and defendant Van Loben Sels and against defendant McCullough, who has appealed therefrom on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The controversy is about a small lot of 2.6 acres, described in the complaint by metes and bounds. Plaintiff is a reclamation district, organized under the laws of California for the purpose of reclaiming swamp and overflowed lands. In September, 1895, one Olsen was the owner of the lot, and in consideration of $924.88 conveyed the same to plaintiff by grant, bargain, and sale deed. The deed contained the following concluding clause: "To have and to hold the same unto the said Reclamation District No. 551, its successors and assigns for the purpose of reclamation only; that is, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining thereon reclamation works consisting of levies, pump and pump-house, drains, ditches and other reclamation works used in and about the reclamation of the lands of said Reclamation District No. 551, and if said land shall cease to be used for such purposes, the same shall thereupon revert to the said party of the first part, and all right, title and interest of said party of the second part therein shall be terminated and ended." After the deed was delivered, the plaintiff entered into possession of the lot, and constructed reclamation works thereon, and said land has ever since been used for reclamation purposes, and has never ceased to be so used. In April, 1902, the plaintiff conveyed the land by deed to defendant Van Loben Sels, "reserving to plaintiff the right to use a convenient and necessary part of the building on said premises as a storehouse for its tools and appliances used for the purposes of reclamation." In October, 1898, Olsen conveyed to defendant McCullough all his title and interest in the land, and she is still the owner of whatever title remained in Olsen after the conveyance to plaintiff. Appellant, in her answer, alleged that she was the owner in fee of the land through her deed from Olsen; that she was in possession thereof; that plaintiff has ceased to use the same for reclamation purposes, and had abandoned and lost all its right in and to the premises; and, finally, prayed judgment that she was the owner of the premises free of any easement or right of any kind in plaintiff. The judgment, while against defendant, contained the clause "that, in case said real property shall cease to be used for reclamation purposes, the same shall thereupon revert to the defendant Sophia McCullough, and all the right, title, and interest of the said plaintiff and the defendant T. J. Van Loben Sels therein shall be terminated and ended."

While the discussion in the briefs has covered considerable ground and a variety of questions, we think the case on its merits involves only two propositions—the construction of the deed made by Olsen to plaintiff, and the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court that the land has never ceased to be used for reclamation purposes. Without discussing the many cases cited by counsel, we think the construction of the deed by its own language is easy of solution. The plaintiff is a reclamation district, created and organized for the purpose of reclaiming lands in the district, and constructing, maintaining, and keeping in repair all works necessary for the reclamation of the land embraced in the district. The deed was for the purpose of reclamation only. When the land should cease to be used for such purpose it was to revert to the grantor. The title passed out of the grantor for the purposes therein specified, and when it shall cease to be used for such purposes the estate of the grantee ceases. The grantee has no right to use the land principally for other or different purposes. If it or its assigns should cease to use the land for the purpose therein specified, and use it for farming or other different purposes, it would revert to the grantor or his assigns. In such case every presumption is against a forfeiture, and the party claiming that the land has reverted to the original grantor must clearly show that the land has ceased to be used for the purpose for which it was granted. If the grantee or his assigns continue to use the land for the prescribed purpose, the estate continues in such grantee. Conditions providing for the forfeiture of an estate are to be construed liberally in favor of the holder of the estate, and strictly against the enforcement of the forfeiture. Civ. Code, § 1442; Washburn on Real Property, 447; Behlow v. Southern Pacific R. R.

Co., 130 Cal. 19, 62 Pac. 295; French v. Inhabitants of Quincy, 3 Allen (Mass.) 9.

The finding of the court that the land is used for reclamation purposes, and has never ceased to be so used, is supported by the evidence. The evidence shows that immediately upon acquiring the property the plaintiff built a pumping plant upon it on the west end thereof near the river, and excavated a ditch along the southern portion of it. It is true that the plaintiff afterwards ceased to use the pumping plant, but the ditch has remained open, and drains the seepage water from the river to the main drainage canal in the center of the district. Plaintiff has continued to use the pumphouse for the purpose of storing its coal, sacks, and tools, and some of its employés have used the rooms in the upper story. It does not lie in the mouth of appellant to say that it is not necessary for plaintiff to use the pumping house or the ditch for reclamation purposes. When she took her conveyance it was with full knowledge of, and subject to, plaintiff's rights. Her grantor had previously conveyed the premises for a consideration, which he received.

It appears that the plaintiff conveyed the premises to defendant Van Loben Sels in April, 1903, reserving the right "to use a convenient and necessary part of the building on said premises for its tools and appliances used for the purposes of reclamation." This deed does not, of itself, show that the premises had ceased to be used for the purposes of reclamation. The deed made by Olsen was to hold to plaintiff "its successors and assigns." If the deed to defendant Van Loben Sels was beyond the power of plaintiff to make, and void, as argued by appellant at great length, the result would be that the plaintiff is still the owner of the property. The fact that the judgment defines the right of plaintiff and defendant Van Loben Sels as between themselves is no concern of appellant. Plaintiff was certainly entitled to judgment on the findings, and, if the premises are still being used for reclamation purposes, appellant is entitled to no relief. The judgment protects her rights. It expressly declares that when the "property shall cease to be used for reclamation purposes the same shall revert to the defendant Sophia McCullough." It is true that no cross-complaint or answer of Van Loben Sels appears to have been served on appellant, but in her answer she directly alleges "that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant P. J. Van Loben Sels has any right, title, interest, or claim of any kind in or upon the said real property, or any part thereof." She prayed for a decree adjudging her to be the owner in fee of the property. She does not appear to have served her answer upon defendant Van Loben Sels. She did not object to the evidence offered by defendant Van Loben Sels upon the ground that there was no issue made between her and Van Loben Sels by the pleadings, nor did she object upon any ground or at all. In fact, the record shows that all the parties agreed on certain facts, and no separate trial was had as between plaintiff and appellant.

Finally, appellant claims that she is a married woman, and her husband was not made a party to the action. As she did not raise the objection in the lower court by demurrer or answer, it was waived. Code Civ. Proc. § 434.

The judgment should be affirmed.

W. W. MONTAGUE & CO. v. FURNESS et al. (S. F. 2,938.)

BUILDING CONTRACTORS' BONDS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—RESTRICTING CONTRACTS —COMMON-LAW OBLIGATIONS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1203, requiring those who contract about erecting buildings to secure their contracts by bonds, which shall inure to the benefit of all persons furnishing materials to be used in the building, is unconstitutional, as being an unreasonable restriction on the power to make contracts.

2. A bond given by a contractor pursuant to an unconstitutional statute cannot be upheld as a valid common-law obligation.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by W. W. Montague & Co., a corporation, against John Furness and others on a bond. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Alex. G. Eells, for appellants. W. H. Linforth, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This action is brought against a building contractor and his sureties upon a bond alleged in the complaint to have been "given under and in pursuance of the provisions of section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state." Plainitff seeks to recover the amount due it from the contractor, Furness, for certain materials furnished by plaintiff for use in constructing the building to which the bond relates. The plaintiff had judgment against all the defendants, and the sureties on the bond appeal from said judgment.

The said section 1203, Code Civ. Proc., is unconstitutional, and the bond having been given in pursuance of it cannot be upheld even as a common-law obligation, and is void. Therefore the sureties on it were not liable. It was so held in the two recent cases of San Francisco Lumber Company v. Bibb et al., 139 Cal. 193, 72 Pac. 964, and a case of the same title, 139 Cal. 325, 73 Pac. 864. In both of these cases the action was upon the identical bond sued on here by parties furnishing material, just as in this case. The decisions in those cases dispose of the only question that need be decided on this appeal, to wit, the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of said section 1203, Code Civ. Proc. Nothing need be here added to what is said in those cases.

RISDON v. YATES. (S. F. 3,049.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—CIVIL ACTION—PLEA IN CRIMINAL CASE — ADMISSION — CROSS-EXAMINATION—RENEWING OFFER OF EVIDENCE —INSTRUCTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Any error in striking an amended answer from the files on the ground that it had been filed without permission is harmless, it having thereafter been filed by permission, and the issue thereby raised having been tried; and this though defendant had to ask for such permission in the presence of the jury.

2. One's plea of guilty on a prosecution for assault and battery can be received in a civil action therefor only as an admission; and, the justice of the peace before whom the prosecution was had having testified thereto for plaintiff, though as he had written it down in his docket, defendant may cross-examine him to prove the entire statement made in connection therewith, to show that it was not an unqualified admission.

3. Where objection to a question on the ground that it is irrelevant, incompetent, and not admissible under the answer, is sustained, and defendant then, on leave, amends the answer to make the evidence admissible under the views of the judge, but does not renew his offer, the ruling will not be reviewed.

4. An instruction in an action for assault and battery as to what a party must do before he can use force to eject a trespasser is apt to mislead, and should not be given, where there is no evidence to which it is applicable; the defense being placed entirely on the theory of self-defense.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; S. R. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by Stephen H. Risdon against Enoch Yates. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. E. Johnson, H. L. Johnson, and L. E. Johnson, for appellant. T. B. Hutchinson, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to recover damages for an assault and battery committed upon plaintiff by defendant. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, upon which judgment was duly entered. Defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions shows that the evidence was conflicting, and it is conceded that there is sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict. Several errors are claimed as to rulings of the court and in giving instructions. This discussion will be confined only to the matters deemed material.

More than 10 days after the defendant had served his original answer, and on the day set for trial, the defendant filed with the clerk and served upon plaintiff's attorney an amended answer, in which he set forth affirmatively an additional defense, that the alleged assault and battery was committed in self-defense. After the case was called for trial and the jury impaneled, the court, on motion of plaintiff's attorney, made an order striking the amended answer from the files upon the ground that it had been filed without permission of the court. Defendant contends that he had the right, under section 472, Code Civ. Proc., to amend his answer once, of course, without permission of the court. It is not necessary to decide the question as to the ruling in striking out the answer. If any error was committed, it was cured by the court, upon defendant's request, making an order permitting the amended answer to be filed. It was filed, the case was tried upon the issues raised by it, and it is now in the record. We cannot hold, as contended by defendant, that the fact of defendant having to ask the court, in the presence of the jury, for leave to file his amended answer, injured his case in the eyes of the jury. The jury is not supposed to know or interest itself with questions of law raised before the court during the trial. If every ruling made by the court in the presence and hearing of the jury could be investigated, as to whether or not it might possibly have injured the rights of one of the parties, and thus be made the ground for reversing a case, there would be few verdicts that would stand. We must presume that the jury did its duty, and decided the question of fact under the instructions of the court upon the pleadings as they are. Verdicts are not to be set aside for light, trivial, or imaginary errors.

The plaintiff called one Palmer, a justice of the peace, for the purpose of identifying the record in a criminal case of the People v. defendant herein, and introduced the complaint in the criminal action, and the docket of the justice showing that defendant had pleaded guilty and suffered a fine for the same assault and battery for which damages were recovered in this action. Defendant sought, by cross-examination of the justice and by his own testimony, to prove the entire statement made to the justice at the time defendant pleaded guilty concerning such plea, and the reasons why defendant made it. In other words, defendant sought by several questions to prove the entire statement in connection with the oral plea, as made to the justice at the time, and entered in his docket. The court sustained the objections of plaintiff to each of the questions by which it was sought to elicit the full statement. In this the court erred. The evidence was sharply conflicting, the defendant introducing evidence which, if true, shows that plaintiff was the aggressor and struck the first blow, while the plaintiff introduced evidence, which if true, shows that the defendant, without provocation, willfully assaulted and beat him. It was thus for the jury to determine where the truth lay, and they were to do this from seeing and hearing the witnesses, and from all the competent facts and circumstances in the case. Now, the record of the plea of guilty and judgment of conviction in the justice court was not conclusive, and did not estop the defendant in the civil case. If defendant had been acquitted in the justice court on a plea of not guilty, he would not have been permitted to introduce the record or prove such fact in this case as a bar—this for the reason that the criminal proceeding was by the state, and this plaintiff was not a party to it. Therefore the judgment in a criminal suit cannot be used in a civil action to establish the facts on which such judgment rests. But where a defendant has pleaded guilty in a criminal case, the plea and judgment are received in evidence as an admission, but not as conclusive. "It is therefore to be treated according to the principles governing admissions, to which class of evidence it properly belongs." 1 Greenleaf on Evid. (16th Ed.) § 527a. If an admission is testified to by a witness against a party, such party has the right, in cross-examination, to bring out the whole of what was said in direct connection with, and pertaining to, the admission. In this case the plaintiff was, in effect, allowed to prove that defendant said or admitted that he was guilty of an assault and battery upon plaintiff. This admission may have turned the scale, and caused the jury to disregard all the defendant's testimony. The plaintiff was allowed to put in evidence the part of the conversation or declaration to the justice which in law amounted to an admission. The defendant was not allowed to show that he stated other facts at the time which showed that it was not an unqualified admission. The statement of defendant in the form of an admission to the justice was allowed for the purpose of corroborating the evidence of plaintiff. The statement of defendant, if such statement was made, that plaintiff struck the first blow, was not allowed to get to the jury. It is certainly evident that this was receiving evidence only on one side of the controversy. The plaintiff was not bound to offer in evidence the admission made before the justice, but, having done so, the defendant was entitled to the whole of the declaration or admission. The fact that the justice wrote down part of it in his docket makes no difference. It was, after being written in the docket by the justice, but an oral admission of defendant. The entry by the justice was only the conclusion or opinion of the justice as to the effect of what defendant said. The question is, did the defendant, in words, admit his guilt before the justice? If he did, what were the words, and what did he say? When a part of a declaration or conversation is given in evidence by one party, the whole on the same subject may be inquired into by the other. Code Civ. Proc. § 1854.

It is said in Greenleaf on Evidence (volume 1, § 201): "We are next to consider the effect of admissions when proved. And here it is to be first observed that the whole admission is to be taken together, for, though some part of it may contain matter favorable to the party, and the object is only to ascertain that which he has conceded against himself, for it is to this only that the reason for admitting his own declaration applies, namely, the great probability that they are true; yet, unless the whole is received and considered, the true meaning and import of the part which is good evidence against him cannot be ascertained. * * * But though the whole of what he said at the time and relating to the same subject may be given in evidence, yet it does not follow that all the parts of the statement are to be regarded as equally worthy of credit; but it is for the jury to consider, under all the circumstances, how much of the whole statement they deem worthy of belief, including as well the facts asserted by the party in his own favor as those making against him." The importance of having all that was said with reference to the subject-matter is well illustrated in Erskine's celebrated argument in Stocksdale's Trial, 22 Howard St. Tr. 257, where he employs Algernon Sidney's famous illustration of what might be a criminal charge against the publisher of the Bible for printing, "(The fool hath said in his heart) there is no God." The words "there is no God," without the context, might be selected, and the publisher indicted for blasphemy. In the Queen's Case, 2 B. & B. 287, it was held by the House of Lords that, where a few lines of a letter were exhibited to a witness, the cross-examination might bring out the whole of the letter. It was there said that, if the whole letter could not be put in evidence "thus, the court may never be in possession of the whole, though it may happen that the whole, if produced, may have an effect very different from that which might be produced by a statement of a part." In Johnson v. Powers, 40 Vt. 612, it is said: "The object of the party using such declarations or admissions against the party who made them is only to ascertain that which he conceded against himself, yet, unless the whole is received and considered, the true meaning and import of the part which is in evidence against him cannot be ascertained. It is therefore a rule of evidence that the whole declaration or admission of the party made at one time shall be taken together, but the jury are at liberty to believe a portion and disbelieve the other, as they are of all evidence." It was said by Abbott, C. J., in 2 Dowl. & R. 361: "It is at all times a dangerous thing to admit a portion only of a conversation in evidence, because one part taken by itself may bear a very different construction and may have a very different tendency to what would be produced if the whole were heard, for one part of a conversation will frequently serve to qualify and explain the other." The same rule was applied by this court where one party read an extract from testimony of the witness given by him in a previous judicial proceeding, and the court held that the other party might introduce in evidence the whole of such testimony. Hobart v. Tyrrell, 68 Cal. 12, 8 Pac. 525. In the later case of Granite Gold Mine Co. v. Maginness, 118 Cal. 134, 50 Pac. 269, the rule is thus stated: "We think the general rule is well established that an entire admission must be taken together. This is essential to enable the court or jury to judge of the true extent of the admission, which, when taken entire, will often have a different import from that which a partial account may convey." Our attention is called to the cases of Root v. Sturdivant, 70 Iowa, 55, 29 N. W. 802, and Hauser v. Griffiths (Iowa) 71 N. W. 223, which hold the other way, but the reasoning of these cases does not commend them to us. We think they are not in accord with the best-considered cases. Nor can we say the rulings in this case were not prejudicial. It may have been that the admission as shown by the justice's docket was deemed by the jury to be of great weight, and of more force than all the testimony of defendant on the trial.

The defendant was a witness in his own behalf, and he claimed and testified that plaintiff was the aggressor and struck the first blow. He was asked in direct examination what had been the relations between himself and plaintiff up to the time of the alleged assault and battery. Counsel stated that the question was asked for the purpose of showing who was the aggressor. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the question upon the ground that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and not within the pleadings, as no justification had been pleaded. The court sustained the objection, and the ruling is claimed to be erroneous. The record shows that immediately after the ruling the defendant asked permission of the court "to amend his answer so as to permit the evidence offered to be introduced." Defendant was granted leave to amend his answer. He did amend it by setting up affirmatively that plaintiff was the aggressor, and first assaulted the defendant. He does not appear to have renewed his attempt to get the evidence before the court. The question was not again asked of the witness. Under such circumstances, we would not hold the ruling erroneous, conceding the evidence to be competent and material. If the defendant, after obtaining leave to amend his answer so as to make the evidence admissible under the views of the trial judge, did not take the trouble to renew his offer, he cannot be permitted to ask this court to review the case on the ruling. He took the trouble to place his pleadings in shape to obviate the objection, but does not appear to have deemed the matter of sufficient importance to renew his offer.

Objection is made to several instructions, the effect of which was to tell the jury that, before a party can use force to eject a trespasser from his lands, he must direct the trespasser to remove, give him sufficient time to do so, and then, if he does not remove, no more force can be used than is reasonably necessary to remove him. These instructions are not objected to as propositions of law, but defendant claims that there is no evidence tending to show that the injuries received by plaintiff were received by him by reason of any attempt on the part of defendant to eject him as a trespasser from the premises. We find no evidence in the record to which the instructions are applicable. The defendant placed his defense entirely upon the theory that the assault and battery upon plaintiff was done by defendant in self-defense. The instructions may have misled the jury, and should not have been given. While it is not necessary to hold that the instructions, of themselves, would be sufficient error to justify a reversal of the case, it would be safer not to give them upon a retrial, unless there should be evidence to which they would be applicable.

We advise that the judgment be reversed.

In re FIRTH'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,700.)

HOMESTEAD—ALLOTMENT TO SURVIVING WIFE—WAIVER OF RIGHT—PROBATE JURISDICTION—DISCRETION.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, providing that if no homestead has been selected, designated, and recorded the court shall set apart a homestead for the surviving wife, the jurisdiction of the probate court to so set aside a homestead is excluded only when the wife has already a legal homestead, and it is immaterial that she has other property, though it be fit to live in.

2. A surviving wife, by qualifying as executrix of her deceased husband, does not waive her right to a homestead.

3. The probate court, in setting aside certain property to the surviving wife as a homestead, cannot be held to have abused its discretion, where the homestead awarded is much less in value than her interest would have been under the dower law.

¶ 2. See Homestead, vol. 25, Cent. Dig. § 268.

4. The probate court, in a proceeding merely to set aside a homestead to the surviving wife, has no jurisdiction to adjudicate the question in whom the remainder vests.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Joseph Bellamy Firth, deceased. From an order Joseph K. Firth and another appeal. Modified.

James G. Maguire, for appellants. Davis Louderback, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. While the estate of Joseph Bellamy Firth was in course of administration the court made an order setting apart to the surviving widow, Evelina L. Firth, a certain part of the real property of the estate as a homestead, and also containing an adjudication about another matter, which will be noticed hereafter. From this order Joseph K. Firth and Fanny Firth, heirs at law of the deceased and devisees under his will, appeal. They are adult children by a former marriage; he left no minor children.

The facts necessary to the determination of this appeal are these: All the property of the deceased was his separate property, and it was of the appraised value of $23,584. He left a will by which he devised to the widow a lot with a house thereon situated on Guy street, in San Francisco, in which he had lived with her for several years immediately prior to his death. It was a suitable place for a residence, and was of the appraised value of $3,500. He also left her $1,000 in money, and directed that during the period of administration she should have $40 per month. The rest of his property he gave to others, the most of it going to the appellants herein. The property which the court set aside as a homestead was a lot 25 feet front, with a house thereon, situated on Tehama street, in said city, and it also was suitable for a residence, and was of the appraised value of $3,500. This lot is a part of the property devised in the will to the appellants. There never had been any recorded homestead by either the deceased or the respondent. The respondent and Joseph K. Firth, one of the appellants, were appointed executors and qualified. The homestead was set apart to respondent for and during her life.

The main contentions of appellants, as to the part of the order setting apart the homestead, are, first, that the court had no power or jurisdiction to make the order because the respondent had another residence at the time the order was made; and, second, that under the condition of the estate and the circumstances presented the making of the order was an abuse of discretion. Neither of these contentions is, in our opinion, maintainable.

The jurisdiction of a probate court to set aside a homestead to the surviving wife is not subject to the condition that she does not have any other property or any other property fit to live it. Such jurisdiction is excluded only when she has already a legal homestead, and a mere place fit to reside in is not a homestead unless it has been impressed with that character by certain acts required by the law to be done for that purpose. The Code provides that if no homestead "has been selected, designated, and recorded * * * the court must select, designate, and set apart, and cause to be recorded, a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife * * * out of the common property, or if there be no common property, then out of the real estate belonging to the decedent." Code Civ. Proc. § 1465. (There is also another provision that if the probate homestead be selected out of the separate property of the deceased it must be only for a limited period, which provision was followed in the case at bar.) This power and duty of the court to set apart the homestead is not, in any part of the statutory law, limited to a case where the widow has no other property; and if she has other property it matters not how she had obtained it—whether under her husband's will or otherwise. Her right to a probate homestead is an independent right, which she has in addition to any other right or property which she may have. A somewhat plausible argument might, perhaps, be made to the point that a very wealthy widow should not be allowed a probate homestead on her deceased husband's separate property (although it would not apply to the case at bar); but such an argument would be properly addressed only to the Legislature in support of an amendment to the law on that subject, for courts must take the law as they find it. And the power of the court to set aside a homestead on property which had been devised to others is well established. In Estate of Huelsman, 127 Cal. 275, 59 Pac. 776, the court say: "Despite the fact that the farm had been specifically devised, one half to the widow, the other half to the two children, it was competent for the probate court to set it aside as a homestead, for the right of a testator to devise is subordinate to the power in the probate court to sequester and set apart the property for the shelter, care, and support of the family." See, also, cases there cited. Nor did the respondent, by qualifying as executrix under the will, waive her right to a homestead. In Sulzberger v. Sulzberger, 50 Cal. 385, the court say: "The acceptance by the petitioner of letters testamentary, and the fact that she was, by the will, constituted one of the residuary legatees, does not tend to show that she waived her right to a homestead as prescribed by the statute."

Whether or not this court would be justified in any case in reversing an order setting apart a homestead merely on the ground that the order was an abuse of discretion need not be here considered, for there was certainly no such abuse in the case at bar.

It must be remembered that while our law is liberal to a wife with respect to community property—that is, property acquired after marriage by the assumed joint efforts of both spouses—yet with regard to the husband's separate property she has scarcely any right at all. He may devise it all to strangers and leave her penniless. The old estate of dower is taken away. The right to have a homestead for a limited period given her by the probate court is about the only interest which she can assert in a deceased husband's property. In the case at bar the homestead awarded her is much less in value than her interest would have been under the law of dower, and there is no warrant for holding that in awarding it the court abused its discretion.

But in the order and decree appealed from, the court, in addition to setting aside the homestead to the respondent for her lifetime, decreed that the fee in remainder vested in certain named persons as heirs at law of the deceased; and, in our opinion, this last part of the order was beyond the jurisdiction of the court to make. It is true that by section 1468, Code Civ. Proc., it is declared as a general rule of property that where a probate homestead is selected for a limited period from the separate property of the deceased "the title vests in the heirs of the deceased subject to such order," but the question as to whom the remainder goes is not before the court on a simple petition for a homestead. No such issue was presented by the petition or the answers thereto, nor could such issue have been legitimately presented. When there is a contest between different persons claiming in hostility to each other to be heirs, that contest must be adjudicated in an appropriate action or proceeding in which the issue of heirship properly arises. This matter is perhaps not very important in the case at bar, as there seems to be no disagreement as to who the heirs are; but in many cases there are sharp contests as to heirship. At all events, in the present proceeding the only question involved was whether or not the respondent should have the homestead, and the adjudication should have been limited to that question. The order must therefore be modified by striking out that part of it which undertakes to adjudicate heirship. In other respects the order must be affirmed.

The order appealed from is modified by striking therefrom the following: "And the title to said lot of land, with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances, is hereby vested in the heirs of said Joseph Bellamy Firth, deceased, subject to this order, judgment, and decree and said homestead, and entirely free from further administration of said estate; that is, is hereby vested in said Evelina L. Firth, the widow of said decedent, said Joseph Kirk Firth, the son of said decedent, and said Fanny Firth, the daughter of said decedent, subject to this order, judgment, and decree and said homestead, to wit, the undivided one-third part of said lot of land, with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances, and the title thereto is hereby vested in said Evelina L. Firth, and the undivided one-third part thereof is hereby vested in said Joseph Kirk Firth, and the undivided one-third part thereof is hereby vested in said Fanny Firth, subject to this order, judgment, and decree and said homestead." As thus modified the order appealed from is affirmed, without costs of this appeal to either party.

SPRAGUE v. WALTON et al. (Sac. 1,269.)

NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—NOTICE—PARTIES TO BE SERVED—GIFTS—DELIVERY—DECLARATIONS — TRUSTS — EXECUTORS — ACTIONS — LIMITATIONS.

1. In an action by an executor against W. to collect money, notice of motion for new trial or of appeal need not be served on another executor made a defendant merely because he would not join as plaintiff, and who was not mentioned in the judgment, which was exclusively in favor of plaintiff and against W.; he not being an adverse party, and it not being possible for him to be adversely affected by a new trial or a reversal.

2. There is a sufficient delivery of possession to make a gift complete, if a gift was intended, where a husband having money, the community property of himself and wife, deposited in a bank in his name, gave her an order on the bank authorizing it to allow her to draw the money, and she drew it, and deposited it in her own name.

3. The declarations of deceased at or about the time he gave an order to his wife on a bank authorizing it to pay his deposit to her, which was done, is admissible, on the question of his intention to make a gift, in an action for the money between his and her executors.

4. If, as indicated by the order of one in whose name money, the community property of him and his wife, was deposited, authorizing the bank to allow her to draw any of it "and to have the right of survivorship," it was his intention that she should take the deposit as survivor after his death, the bank was constituted a trustee for her benefit, and her actual drawing of the money before his death would not defeat his intention to create a trust for her benefit.

5. An action will lie against an executor, without presentation of a claim against the estate, for money which can be identified in specie as belonging to plaintiff.

6. Where decedent's wife, under his order authorizing a bank to allow her to draw any of his deposit, drew it out and deposited it in her own name, she, if the deposit did not pass to her as donee or beneficiary of a trust, held it as trustee for decedent at the time of his death, and, she having been appointed his executrix, the claim of his representatives therefor is protected from the running of the statute in her favor as a claim for a debt from her to him would be protected.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by Frederick D. Sprague, executor of Moses Sprague, deceased, against Hattie S. Walton, executrix of Nancy M. Sprague, deceased, and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Walton appeals. Reversed.

Phipps & Henion and Devlin & Devlin, for appellant. A. M. Seymour and R. Platnauer, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action by one of the executors of the will of Moses Sprague to recover from the executrix of Nancy Sprague (who was the wife of Moses) a sum of about $3,800, the amount of two savings bank deposits, community property of the spouses originally standing in the name of Moses, but drawn out by her under written authority from him, and redeposited in her own name shortly before his death.

B. F. Walton, named as a defendant, is the co-executor of the plaintiff, and is made a defendant only because he refused to be joined as a plaintiff. No relief is sought against him, and by his answer he merely denies that the estate of Moses Sprague has any interest in the deposits. Hattie Walton defends upon the ground that the deposits were a gift from Moses Sprague to her testatrix. The superior court found that there was no gift, and found against other special defenses, based upon statutes of limitations. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the plaintiff and against Hattie S. Walton for the amount remaining of said deposits at the death of her testatrix and received by her as executrix. From this judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial she appeals.

It appears from the evidence in the record that Moses and Nancy Sprague were the owners of community property, real and personal, including the deposits in question. In January, 1900, Moses, being at the time sick and confined to his bed, obtained from the banks the form of an authorization which would enable his wife to draw the deposits standing in his name, and he executed and delivered to her two orders in the form prescribed. They were substantially the same in terms, and the one addressed to the Sacramento Bank read as follows: "January 22, 1900. I hereby authorize the Sacramento Bank to allow my wife, Mrs. N. M. Sprague, to draw any money standing to my credit on Deposit No. 17097, fol. 825, in said bank and to have the right of survivorship." On the 30th of January Mrs. Sprague drew out the whole of the several deposits and immediately redeposited them in the same banks, but in her own name. On the 16th of March following, Moses Sprague died. Letters testamentary were issued to his wife in July, 1900, and she took possession of his estate, but died in June, 1901, leaving the administration unclosed. Upon her death the plaintiff, Frederick D. Sprague, and the defendant B. F. Walton were appointed joint executors in her place. Subsequently her will was proved, and letters testamentary were issued to her daughter, the defendant Hattie S. Walton. As executrix of her deceased husband's will Mrs. Sprague never charged herself with anything on account of said deposits, and what remained of them passed into the hands of her executrix, who claims that they were a gift from her father to her mother, and constituted no part of his estate.

The defendant urges a number of points in support of her appeal from the order denying her motion for a new trial, claiming, among other things, that the court erred in finding that there was no gift of the deposits, and in excluding evidence material to that issue. The respondent makes the preliminary objection that this court is without jurisdiction to review these assignments of error because neither the notice of motion for a new trial nor the notice of appeal was served upon the defendant B. F. Walton. There is a dispute as to the fact of service of these notices upon defendant Walton, but we consider it immaterial whether they were served or not, for Walton is not an adverse party. No interest of his would be adversely affected by the granting of a new trial or by a reversal of the judgment. Though a party to the action, he is not mentioned in the judgment, which was exclusively in favor of the plaintiff and against Hattie S. Walton. If the judgment stands, no part of the amount recovered could be collected by him. He would not be charged with it in his accounts, and would be entitled to no commissions thereon. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1613, 1615; Hope v. Jones, 24 Cal. 89. He neither pays nor recovers costs, and the only possible effect of a reversal and new trial is that he might be benefited by the recovery of his costs in case of an ultimate judgment for the defendants.

Whether or not there was a gift of these deposits by Moses Sprague to his wife depends wholly upon his actual intention. He did everything necessary to the validity of the gift, if he intended a gift. He gave his wife orders in the form prescribed by the banks, which enabled her to cancel his accounts and transfer the deposits to her own account. In effect, he put her in possession of the funds and deprived himself of all control. If he intended to do this, and intended it as a gift, the gift was complete. The evidence that he did intend a gift seems to us very strong. He was sick and confined to his bed. On the 1st of January he had executed an olographic will or codicil to his attested will, by which he had given everything he possessed to his wife. That he intended her to have these deposits is clear, and the only question is whether he intended that she should take them under the will or as a gift free from the burdens of administration. When he made his olographic will on the 1st of January, no doubt he intended her to take under the will, but it would appear that before the 22d of the month he had changed his mind. Why, if he did not intend her to take the deposits as a gift, should he have given her authority to draw both deposits, amounting to nearly $4,000? She needed no such sum to pay current or household expenses, but in case of his death (and he was on his deathbed) it would be extremely convenient for her to have control of this fund of ready money pending administration of his estate. Considering that he intended her to have his whole estate in any event, there were good reasons why he should make her a present gift of a fund which would relieve her of the necessity of applying to the probate court for the means of support prior to distribution. But the burden of proving a gift rested upon the defendant, and it was essential for her to prove, among other things, that Moses Sprague intended a gift of the deposits. The evidence upon this point was, in our opinion, very persuasive, and there was uncontradicted and unquestioned evidence to prove the delivery of the deposits; or, what is the same thing, the furnishing of the means by which they could be reduced to possession by the donee if she was a donee. But this court can neither make a finding nor direct one where the evidence, however persuasive, is opposed to a presumption, as in this case. Nor can it be said in this case that the evidence of a gift is so absolutely convincing that the order denying a new trial could be reversed on the sole ground that the finding of no gift is wholly unsupported. But the superior court erred in excluding evidence of the oral declarations of Moses Sprague at and about the time he signed the orders upon which his wife drew the deposits. It does not appear from the bill of exceptions what was the particular reason for these rulings, but in the brief of respondent they are defended upon the ground that the effect of the declarations would be to contradict or vary the terms of the written orders. The rulings cannot be sustained upon that ground. The orders related solely to a matter between Moses Sprague and the banks. It was not necessary for him to inform the banks of his purpose in putting the deposits under control of his wife. His purpose was a matter between him and her exclusively, and was manifested and could be proved by his contemporaneous declarations, or by his declarations made before or after delivering the orders. There is no better proof of intention than declared intention, and it is often the only means of proof. The question here is not governed by subdivision 4 of section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but by subdivision 2 of that section.

We do not deem it necessary to notice particularly the several cases cited by respondent in support of his contention that there was a failure in this case to make a gift, even if a gift was intended. The case of Zeller v. Jordan, 105 Cal. 147, 38 Pac. 640, is fairly representative of the other cases cited, and clearly exhibits the distinction which makes them one and all inapplicable to this controversy. That was a claim of gift from a deceased wife. All the surviving husband had to show was an undated check on a savings bank for $19,000. He could not have drawn the money without the passbook, and he never had the passbook. And, besides, he testified himself that it was not intended that he should use the check until after his wife's death. And so in all the cases the supposed gift was not delivered or put in the power of the person claiming as donee. Here the means of reducing the deposits to possession were placed in the hands of Mrs. Sprague, and she took possession in her husband's lifetime. If this taking possession was in accordance with the understanding between her and her husband, the gift was complete.

It is necessary, perhaps, in view of the further proceedings in the trial court to notice briefly one or two other points. Even if it should be found that it was not the intention of Moses Sprague that his wife should draw out the deposits, or change them to her own account in his lifetime, the form of the orders ("with right of survivorship") indicates his intention that she should take them as survivor after his death, and, if such was his intention, the transaction would be brought within the doctrine of Booth v. Oakland Bank, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, where it was held that an arrangement substantially the same as in this case constituted the bank a trustee of the deposit for the benefit of the parties to whom the depositor desired the money to be paid in case of her death. The fact that Mrs. Sprague actually drew the money before her husband's death would not defeat the intention to create a trust in her favor. If it shall be found that these deposits did not pass to Nancy Sprague either as donee or beneficiary of a trust, they may be recovered, so far as identifiable, without presentation of a claim against the estate of Nancy Sprague. The right to sue an executor or administrator in cases like this without presentation of a claim against his decedent's estate arises from the fact that the specific thing sued for is not a part of such decedent's estate, and the action will lie whenever the thing demanded can be identified in specie as the property of another.

The superior court did not err in finding that the action was not barred by the statute of limitations. If the money in the hands of Hattie S. Walton was identified as a part of the deposits originally standing in the name of Moses D. Sprague, and if there was no gift to her or trust for her benefit, she held them in trust for him at the time of his death. They were his property, and recoverable in specie, and the claim of his representatives is protected from the running of the statute of limitations in favor of his executrix in the same way and upon the same principle that applies to a debt from an executor or administrator to his decedent. The claim against Nancy Sprague was not discharged by her appointment as executrix. She should have included the deposits in her inventory, and, whether she did or not, the statute did not run in her favor. Code Civ. Proc. § 1447. As to the defendant, she was appointed executrix of Nancy Sprague's will less than two years before the action was commenced, and there is no clause of the statute which could possibly bar the action against her within that period.

We discover no error in the judgment, but the order denying a new trial is reversed for the reasons stated, and the cause remanded.

EVA et al. v. SYMONS et al. (S. F. 2,957.)

EJECTMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS—REVIEW.

1. Where defendants in ejectment claim title, possession, and right of possession under an alleged verbal gift from plaintiff's ancestor, a finding that such ancestor "took title to the land in his own name, and did not promise that he would then or thereafter convey the same to defendants, and that he never did convey to them," and that plaintiff is the owner and seised in fee of the whole property, is sufficient.

2. On appeal on the judgment roll alone, it will not be presumed, against the correctness of the judgment, that there was evidence on a point in respect to which there is no finding.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action in ejectment by Samuel J. Eva and others against John Symons and others. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

David E. Marchus (Chas. C. Boynton, of counsel), for appellants. Chapman & Clift, M. C. Chapman, Frederick C. Clift, and R. H. Latimer, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, C. Ejectment. Plaintiffs are the heirs at law and devisees of James Eva, deceased, whose last will was duly probated, his estate settled, and final distribution made, and the executors discharged. The land in question was distributed to plaintiffs, and they bring the action for possession, for damages for withholding possession, and for rents and profits. Defendants denied specifically the averments of the complaint, and claimed to be the equitable owners of the land by virtue of verbal gift of James Eva in his lifetime, and possession taken thereunder and ever since retained; the alleged facts appearing in the answer and in a cross-complaint. In their answer to the cross-complaint, plaintiffs deny specifically defendants' allegations relating to the alleged gift of the land to them; admit defendants' possession, but deny that such possession was taken under the alleged agreement by defendants with James Eva; and pray that they (defendants) "have judgment as hereinbefore prayed for, and decree that plaintiffs are the owners, seised in fee, of all the said premises in said cross-complaint described," and that defendants have no title to or interest in the land. The findings of fact set forth that the cause came on regularly to be tried "upon the complaint of plaintiffs theretofore filed herein, and upon the answer and cross-complaint of the defendants theretofore filed herein. * * * Said cause was by stipulation of the parties in open court heard upon the equitable defense interposed by the defendants herein by their answer and cross-complaint filed herein, and the jury was impaneled to advise the court upon such questions of fact relating to said equitable defense as might be thereafter submitted to it by the court." The special issue submitted was, "Did James Eva give the land to defendants and place them in possession?" The jury answered "Yes," but the court disregarded the verdict and made findings against defendants. The court also found that James Eva took the title to the land in his own name, but did not promise that he would then or thereafter convey the same to defendants, and that he never did convey the title to them, or either of them; that plaintiffs claim as devisees of said James Eva, deceased, and "plaintiffs are the owners of said real property, and are seised in fee of the legal title thereto, and the whole thereof." As conclusions of law, the court found that defendants are not the owners of the land, nor seised in fee of all or any part thereof, and that plaintiffs are the owners and seised in fee of the whole thereof; that defendants are not entitled to judgment on their equitable defense interposed by their answer and cross-complaint, but that plaintiffs are entitled to judgment thereon. Judgment passed for plaintiffs, adjudging that "plaintiffs are the owners, seised in fee, of said lands and premises, and the whole thereof; that defendants are not entitled to judgment upon their equitable defense interposed in this action, but that plaintiffs are entitled to judgment" thereon. Defendants appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

The points made by appellants are that there is neither finding of fact nor judgment determining the issue of right of possession or of damages, and the court therefore failed to find on a material issue (citing O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 Pac. 225), and that there can be but one final judgment, and a judgment which determines "as to one or a portion of the issues only is premature and contrary to the course of law" (citing Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 112 Cal. 568, 44 Pac. 1022; White

v. White, 130 Cal. 597, 62 Pac. 1062, 80 Am. St. Rep. 150, and other cases).

So far as any right asserted by defendants is concerned, the court made complete findings against defendants. They claimed the title and possession and right of possession upon an alleged verbal gift, and not otherwise. The findings and judgment clearly negative these issues. The court further found, and also adjudged, that plaintiffs are the owners and seised in fee of the land. The findings are sufficient to support the judgment, and contain nothing inconsistent with it. The cause is here on the judgment roll alone. It will not be presumed against the correctness of the judgment that there was evidence upon a point in respect of which there is no finding. In Wise v. Burton, 73 Cal. 175, 14 Pac. 683, the rule was stated as follows: "This court will not reverse for want of a finding on an issue where there is no evidence in relation to such issue." See Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. 1098; Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 52, 36 Pac. 364. In the recent case of Kaiser v. Dalto, 140 Cal. 167, 73 Pac. 828, the court said: "It is also settled that the failure to find upon an issue will not be ground for reversing a judgment otherwise correct unless it appears by statement or bill of exceptions that evidence was given upon such issue."

Whether plaintiffs have by the judgment obtained all the relief to which they are entitled or are seeking, or can in this action have further relief, are questions which do not now concern us. It is clear that, under the rule above stated, appellants are not entitled to have the judgment reversed, and we therefore advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed. McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

WHITE v. BESSE et al. (S. F. 2,996.)[*]

RESTRAINING EXECUTION SALE—INTERVENTION—PLEADINGS—DEED—HUSBAND TO WIFE—CONSIDERATION—REVIEW.

1. Where the judgment creditor intervenes in an action against the sheriff to restrain the sale of the wife's land as that of her husband, claiming merely that the deed from the husband, under which the wife held, was void as to creditors, he cannot, after the filing of findings of fact, claim that the deed was given as security, and thus constituted a mortgage leaving the equitable title in the husband.

2. A husband being neither insolvent nor in contemplation of insolvency, a voluntary deed of his land to his wife is valid.

3. A cross-complaint for affirmative relief by the judgment creditor as intervener in an action by a wife against the sheriff to restrain the sale of her land as that of her husband not being an answer to the complaint in the action, an averment therein that the wife is not, and never was, the owner of the land, cannot be deemed a denial of the averment in plaintiff's complaint that she is such owner.

4. An intervener who files a cross-complaint asking affirmative relief, without connecting himself with the pleadings between the plaintiff and defendant, cannot on appeal obtain any advantage from their pleadings, but must rest his case solely on his complaint in intervention.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Anna R. White against Milton Besse, defendant, and Julius Lee, intervener. Plaintiff had judgment, and intervener appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Wyckoff, for appellant. Chas. M. Cassin and Charles B. Younger, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint states a cause of action against the defendant, Besse, as sheriff of Santa Cruz county, to enjoin him from selling certain land, alleged to be the property of the plaintiff, upon an execution issued on a judgment recovered by Lee, the intervener, against Edward White, the husband of the plaintiff. The judgment creditor, Lee, by leave of court, intervened and filed his complaint in intervention. The court, after a trial, made its decision, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The intervener alone appeals from the judgment, upon the judgment roll.

The plaintiff alleges, among other things, that she was, and ever since February 28, 1898, had been, the owner of the land in question. The intervener's judgment was recovered on September 24, 1898. The defendant, Besse, answered the plaintiff's complaint, specifically denying the allegation of ownership, as well as most of the other allegations thereof. The intervener, however, did not answer the complaint, but contented himself with filing a complaint in intervention, which was answered by the plaintiff. The complaint in intervention alleged the recovery of the judgment against Edward White; set forth that prior thereto Edward White had executed two deeds purporting to convey the property to the plaintiff, dated, respectively, September 25, 1897, and March 1, 1898; that intervener was then a creditor of Edward White for the claim upon which judgment was afterward recovered; and alleged that each of said deeds was without consideration, and was made by Edward White while he was insolvent and in contemplation of insolvency, and for the purpose and with the intent to defraud the intervener and other creditors of Edward White; that there was no other property out of which said judgment could be collected; that the fraudulent deeds obstructed the right of the intervener to have the same sold on execution; that said Anna R. White was not then, and never had been, the owner of or in possession of the property or any part thereof; that she had no right thereto or interest therein as against the intervener as a creditor; and that she had not, and never had, or claimed to have, any interest therein, save such as was conveyed to her by the said deeds of her husband. Upon these allegations, he asked that the deeds mentioned be declared fraudulent and void, as against him, and that they be canceled.

In the findings the court states that the plaintiff was at the time the action was begun, and ever since had been, the owner and in possession of the land in controversy, and that the deeds mentioned were each executed for a valuable consideration, and not with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. The findings then proceed to state the consideration for the deeds. From this statement it appears that the husband was the owner of the land, and desired to obtain a loan; that, in order to do so, he was required to give his note, executed jointly by himself and wife; that he agreed with his wife that, if she would sign the note as surety for him, he would hold her harmless and secure her against all liability by reason thereof; that, in pursuance of this agreement, they executed the note, and also a mortgage on the land in controversy to secure the same, and the loan was obtained thereby; that the note became due, and was not paid by the husband; and that thereafter, for the purpose of fulfilling the agreement aforesaid with his wife, and to secure her against all liability on the note, and also to secure his creditors who had liens on the land, the husband executed the deed of September 25, 1897. The court further finds that "ever since the execution of said last-mentioned deed the said plaintiff has been, and yet is, the owner of all the real estate therein described," and that, in "pursuance of the purposes of said conveyance as aforesaid, said plaintiff paid" the note, and caused the mortgage to be satisfied. The findings with respect to the consideration and effect of the conveyance of March 1, 1898, are precisely similar, except that it involved a different note and mortgage. It is then further found that Edward White has not been the owner of the land, or of any right, title, interest, or estate therein, or claim thereto, at any time since the execution of the first deed to the plaintiff, September 25, 1897.

The appellant now claims that under these findings he is entitled to judgment. The ground for this contention is that the deeds were given as security only, and that, although absolute in form, they constitute in law nothing more than a mortgage. Hence he contends that, although the mortgage is prior to his judgment, the title still remains in Edward White, and he is entitled to have the lands sold on his execution subject to the mortgage. If the intervener had tendered any issue involving the proposition that the deeds were intended merely as mortgages, or had filed any pleading alleging the facts included in the findings tending to that conclusion, and asking relief on that ground, and the court had made its finding squarely upon such issue, perhaps the contention might have been sustained. The complaint in intervention states only a cause of action to set aside the deeds on the ground that they were made to defraud creditors, and it states no facts upon which to found the claim that the deeds were intended merely as mortgages. Upon the cause of action to cancel the deeds the court found, as a fact, that there was no fraudulent intent, and that Edward White was not insolvent, nor in contemplation of insolvency, at the time he executed them. This being the case, it is immaterial whether there was or was not a valuable consideration. There being no intent to defraud, and the grantor being neither insolvent nor in contemplation of insolvency the deeds were valid, although made without consideration. Civ. Code, § 3442; Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873, 13 L. R. A. 576; Threlkel v. Scott, 89 Cal. 353, 26 Pac. 879; Haas v. Whittier, 97 Cal. 420, 32 Pac. 449; Knox v. Moses, 104 Cal. 505, 38 Pac. 318.

The complaint of the intervener is not addressed to the plaintiff's complaint, does not purport to be an answer thereto, and contains no allegations in the form of denials. It states an independent cause of action, and is, in effect, a cross-complaint for affirmative relief. Hence the averment therein that Anna R. White is not, and never was, the owner of the land, cannot be deemed a denial of the allegation of the plaintiff's complaint that she is such owner.

In suits to quiet title and actions in ejectment it has been frequently decided that an allegation of ownership in the complaint, which is denied in the answer, raises an issue upon which the defendant may show that a deed under which plaintiff claims title was given as security for the debt, and was intended as a mortgage. And perhaps this doctrine would be extended to suits to enjoin an execution sale, such as that of the plaintiff herein, so that the defendant, Besse, upon that issue, could have had the judgment reversed if he had appealed. But the defendant does not appeal, and the intervener has not in any manner connected himself with the pleadings between the plaintiff and defendant, and cannot obtain any advantage therefrom. He must rest his case on appeal solely on the cause of action stated in his complaint in intervention.

In actions for relief on the ground of fraud, such as that of the intervener, where, after averments that a deed purporting to convey title was in fact fraudulent and void, the pleader concludes with a statement that the grantee is not the owner of the property described in the conveyance, the latter allegation cannot be allowed to change the cause of action from a suit to declare the deed fraudulent as against creditors to an action to declare that it was, in legal effect, a mortgage, nor to give the complaint the effect of stating two distinct causes of action, nor even to lay the foundation for evidence and findings to the effect that the deed, although not fraudulent, was intended as a mortgage, and did not convey title. The allegation in the intervener's complaint that the plaintiff is not, and never was, the owner of the land, in the connection in which it is found as part of a complaint to set aside deeds as fraudulent, is a mere conclusion from the previous statement that the deeds were made with intent to defraud creditors, and for no valuable consideration. In so far as the findings tend to show that the deeds were, in effect, mortgages, they must, so far as the intervener is concerned, be held to apply, as the findings show they were intended to apply, exclusively to the question of the consideration for the deeds; and they do not justify a judgment for the intervener, which would be in reality a judgment in his favor upon a cause of action not alleged by him, nor involved in the issues between him and the plaintiff.

HUMISTON v. SHAFFER, County Auditor. (L. A. 1,577.)*

COUNTIES—OFFICERS—COMPENSATION—ALLOWANCES FOR ASSISTANTS.

1. Under sections 132 and 133 of the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 488, c. 277), which make it the duty of the district attorney to prosecute all persons charged with crime, and sue for the recovery of penalties and forfeitures accruing to the state or county, and to defend suits against the county, and to give, without fee, his opinion in writing to county officers and the board of supervisors, and prohibiting him from presenting any claim for allowance against the county, except for his own services, and under section 215 of the same act (page 572), which declares that the salaries and fees provided therein shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by the county officers or their deputies, and requiring deputies to be paid by their principals out of their salaries, unless otherwise provided, the district attorney cannot claim any extra compensation for his services, or for the services of any deputy or assistant, such as a stenographer employed in writing letters, pleadings, judgments, opinions, etc.

2. Nor are the services rendered by such a stenographer personal expenses of the district attorney, within the meaning of section 228 of the same act (page 575), which makes the traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney incurred in criminal and civil cases, and other matters in which the county is interested, a county charge.

3. Const. art. 11, § 9, prohibits the increase of the compensation of county or municipal officers after their election, or during their term of office. The county government act of 1897, §§ 132, 133, define the duties of the district attorney, and section 215 of the act declares that the salaries and fees provided therein shall be in full compensation for all services rendered by the officers therein named, or by their deputies, and provides for the payment of deputies by their principals out of their salaries. Held, that the county board of supervisors cannot appoint a salaried stenographer for the district attorney, either directly or indirectly, by allowing a claim against the county for work done by such stenographer.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; N. H. Conklin, Judge.

Application by Mabel I. Humiston for a writ of mandate against Eugene E. Shaffer, auditor of San Diego county. From a judgment awarding the writ, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sam F. Smith and Collier & Smith, for appellant. Eugene Daney, for respondent.

COOPER, C. The plaintiff was employed in the office of the district attorney of the county of San Diego during the month of January, 1904, and did certain typewriting for the district attorney during said month, from the 2d to the 29th day, inclusive. She presented a claim against the county, duly itemized and verified, showing the total amount of the claim to be $49.30. The claim consisted of 100 different items performed by plaintiff for the district attorney as stenographer and typewriter—the work being in connection with the official duties of the district attorney—and consisted in writing letters to various parties, letters advising certain county officers as to the correct performance of their official duties, letters of advice to the county board of supervisors, the writing of pleadings and judgments in civil actions in behalf of the county, and in writing and copying criminal informations. The claim was allowed by the board of supervisors of the county. The defendant, as county auditor, refused to draw his warrant for the amount, and the court below, having heard the facts, ordered judgment for plaintiff, awarding her a writ of mandate against defendant, commanding him, as county auditor, to draw a warrant in favor of plaintiff for the amount. This appeal is from the judgment.

The question presented is as to whether the claim is a legal charge against the county. The duties of the district attorney are defined in sections 132 and 133 of the county government act of 1897 (St. 1897, p. 488, c. 277). He must draw all indictments and informations, attend to the prosecution of all persons charged with crime, defend all suits brought in his county or wherever brought, prosecute all recognizances forfeited in the courts of record, and all actions for the recovery of debt, fines, penalties, and forfeitures accruing to the state or his county. He must give, when required, without fee, his opinion in writing to county, district, and township officers on matters relating to the duties of their respective offices. He is the legal adviser of the board of supervisors, and must attend their meetings when required, and oppose all claims and accounts against the county when he deems them unjust or illegal. Except for his own services, he must not present any claim, account, or demand for allowance against the county. It is provided in section 215 (page 572) of the same act: "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers herein named, either as officers or ex-officio officers, their deputies or assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided, and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries hereinbefore provided, unless in this act otherwise provided." It is evident that the above-quoted provisions do not allow the district attorney to claim any extra compensation for his services, or for the services of any deputy or assistant. If the law allows a deputy or assistant, and fixes the salary, then, and not otherwise, can the deputy or assistant be paid by the county.

Plaintiff relies upon the section 228 (page 575), which makes "the traveling and other personal expenses of the district attorney incurred in criminal cases arising in the county, and in civil actions and proceedings in which the county is interested, and all other expenses necessarily incurred by him in the detection of crime and prosecution of criminal cases, and in civil actions and proceedings and all other matters in which the county is interested," a county charge. The above-quoted language does not include charges of the kind claimed by plaintiff in this case. The district attorney must write his own letters, or pay some one to write them for him, in the absence of any law authorizing the paying of a deputy or assistant. If he could make the cost of copying or writing letters and opinions a personal expense, within the meaning of the section, he could, on the same principle, make the cost of employing an attorney to look up authorities and write briefs a personal expense. He could, on the same principle, incur personal expense by hiring everything done in connection with his office. His food, clothing, cigars, and amusements are personal expenses, but not such as contemplated by the statute. The statute contemplates expenses necessarily incurred in connection with the office of the district attorney outside of the performance of the duties required of him by statute. If money has to be paid for taking a deposition for the services of an expert, or for detective work, the statute makes it a charge against the county. In Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161, it was held that an order of the board of supervisors of Marin county allowing a county clerk a deputy at a salary of $50 a month, to be paid by the county, was an increase of the compensation of the county clerk after his election, and therefore void, as being in conflict with section 9, art. 11, of the Constitution. In the concurring opinion of the Chief Justice it was said: "The sum allowed to any given officer being a lump sum, out of which he must pay for the services of all deputies and assistants necessary for the prompt and faithful discharge of all the duties of the office, it is evident that his own compensation consists of the residue remaining after payment of such deputies and assistants; and it is equally evident that, just so far as the county assumes the payment of such deputies and assistants, such residue is enlarged and the compensation increased." Applying the principles of that case to the case at bar, it is plain that the board of supervisors could not have made an order appointing the plaintiff stenographer and typewriter for the district attorney at a salary. If they could not do it directly, they could not do it indirectly; but, if we allow the plaintiff to recover in this case, the result is the same as though she had been appointed by the board of supervisors, and her salary fixed. She would in such case be paid for her month's work by the county. If it could be done for one month, it could be done for every other month in the year. If such allowance could be made to a typewriter, it could on the same principle be allowed to a clerk or an attorney employed by the district attorney. The case of Dougherty v. Austin has been universally followed by this court. It was applied in County of Orange v. Harris, 97 Cal. 600, 32 Pac. 594, where it was held that the tax collector was not entitled to a portion of the penalties collected on delinquent taxes for preparing the delinquent list. It was applied in County of Kern v. Fay, 131 Cal. 547, 63 Pac. 857, where it was held that the district attorney could not retain in addition to his salary the sum of $10 each in 63 suits recovered as costs, under a statute, as attorney's fees in actions to foreclose certificates of purchase to state school lands; and in County of Humboldt v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 Pac. 324, where it was held that the county clerk of Humboldt county could not receive extra compensation for extra work done by him in preparing data for a claim of the county against the state; and in Matter of Dodge, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973, where it was held that the assessor of the city and county of San Francisco was not entitled to receive for his own use a percentage of poll taxes fixed by section 3862 of the Political Code. It was applied in Agard v. Shaffer, 141 Cal. 725, 75 Pac. 343, where it was held that the county recorder of San Diego county was not entitled to extra pay for a clerical force employed to make abstracts of mortgages, deeds of trust, and contracts for the use of the assessor, under section 3678 of the Political Code, directing the board of supervisors, when necessary, to provide for such extra clerical force. It was there said: "In the statute before us in this case the compensation was to be allowed by the board to additional clerical force to assist the recorder in performing his official duties. In principle, there is no difference between helping out the recorder's compensation by furnishing him a deputy to perform the work of the office, and furnishing him a 'clerical force' to do the same thing. The one affects his compensation in exactly the same manner as the other. And if the power to do the one thing should not be delegated to the board of supervisors, then the power to do the other thing should not be so delegated."

The judgment should be reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the proceedings.

GRANT v. BANNISTER et al. (S. F. 2,882.)

CHANGE OF VENUE—AFFIDAVITS—WAIVER OF RIGHT.

1. An order granting change of venue for convenience of witnesses, and in the interest of justice, on affidavits alleging "that all the witnesses in this case who are necessary or material, except plaintiff, reside in the county" to which the change of venue was made, will not be disturbed because they did not contain the names of the witnesses and the testimony expected from them, where six of the seven defendants reside in such county.

2. Defendants did not waive the right to move for change of venue by obtaining an extension of time in which to plead, where the stipulation was silent as to the time in which to make a motion, and the statute gives the right to make the motion when defendants appear and answer or demur.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; F. M. Angellotti, Judge.

Action by William Grant against W. D. Bannister and others. From an order granting a change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for appellant. R. H. Countryman (Ralph C. Harrison, of counsel), for respondents.

COOPER, C. This action is brought to quiet plaintiff's title to, and have it adjudged that he is the owner of, 250 shares of the capital stock of defendant corporation. All the defendants, except Hearfield and the corporation, are directors of defendant corporation.

Defendants, at the time of pleading, moved for an order changing the place of trial from the county of Marin, where the action was commenced, to the county of Tuolumne, upon the grounds, first, that the county of Marin is not the proper place for the trial of the said action, for the reason that the residence of each of the defendants, except Hearfield, was at the time the action was commenced, and ever since has been, in Tuolumne county, and that, while Hearfield was and is a resident of Marin county, he is not a necessary or proper party defendant, but was made such defendant for the purpose of preventing a change of venue from Marin county; and, second, that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice will be promoted by the change. The motion was made and granted upon the pleadings and affidavits filed by the respective parties. This appeal is from the order granting the motion.

If it be conceded that Hearfield was a necessary and proper party, the order may be sustained on the second ground stated in the motion. All presumptions are in favor of the order of the trial court, and, unless there is reason to believe that it has abused its discretion, this court will not interfere. Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192. It clearly appears that the transaction out of which plaintiff's cause of action arose, as well as that upon which defendants rely for their defense, took place in the county of Tuolumne. The defendant corporation has its place of business there. McPherson, the person from whom the plaintiff claims to derive his title to the shares of stock, and who is necessarily the important and material witness, outside the parties, resides in that county. All the defendants who claim to be the owners of the stock reside in that county, and it is reasonable to suppose that they will either be witnesses, or be present at the trial in their own interest. The affidavit of Bannister, which is not denied, states that plaintiff is largely interested in business in Tuolumne county, and that he is often in said county, looking after his private affairs.

Appellant contends that the affidavits used by defendants on their motion for a change of venue are insufficient, because they contain only a general statement "that all the witnesses in this case who are necessary or material to the trial thereof, except the plaintiff, reside in said Tuolumne county." The affidavits would have been much more satisfactory if they had contained the names of the witnesses, and the testimony expected from each; and, if the court below had denied the motion, we would attach little importance to such affidavits, had defendants appealed. But the court granted the motion, and we cannot say that the affidavits, in connection with the pleadings and the papers on file, were not sufficient as a basis for the order. Particularly is this so in face of plaintiff's only affidavit to retain the case in Marin county, which contains only the general statement "that he will have at least four witnesess, all of whom reside either in San Francisco or Santa Rosa, Sonoma county." All parties seem to have relied upon general statements in their affidavits, and we do not think the statements of one any more subject to criticism than the statements of the other in this regard. It is stated and conceded that McPherson is a material witness, and that he resides in Tuolumne county. Where six defendants and the only material witness named reside in the county to which the place of trial is changed, we cannot say that the ends of justice will not be promoted by the order.

It is claimed that the defendants waived their right to move for a change of venue for the reason that they asked plaintiff's attorneys for a written stipulation for 30 days' additional time to plead or move in said action. Plaintiff's attorneys refused to grant further time to defendant's attorneys to move or make a motion, but modified the proposed stipulation by striking from it the words allowing additional time to move or make a motion in said action; thus extending the time to plead only. We can regard only the written stipulation. As modified, it extended the time to plead, but was silent as to any time in which to make a motion. The statute gave the defendants the right to make the motion "at the time they appeared and answered or demurred." The stipulation giving further time to plead carried with it the right to move for a change of venue at the time of pleading.

We advise that the order be affirmed.

COOPER v. SPRING VALLEY WATERWORKS. (S. F. 3,111.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1904.)

NEW TRIAL—DISCRETIONARY POWER—REVIEW.

1. Where a motion for a new trial was made on all the statutory grounds, and the court did not intimate on what ground the order granting it was based, the order must be affirmed, if it could be properly based on any of the grounds.

2. The fact that the evidence is conflicting on the questions at issue does not prevent the trial court from exercising its discretionary power in granting a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Erwin M. Cooper, executor of the estate of John H. Lochhead, deceased, against the Spring Valley Waterworks. Plaintiff had judgment, and from an order granting a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Sharpstein, for appellant. M. B. Kellogg and E. Mills Adams, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff, as executor of the last will of John H. Lochhead, deceased, to recover of the defendant the value of 40 shares of its capital stock, alleged to have been wrongfully converted by defendant. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $4,080, with interest. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was granted. From the order granting the motion, plaintiff appeals.

The motion for a new trial was made on all the statutory grounds, and the court did not intimate what ground the order granting the motion was based on, and, unless the order cannot be maintained upon any one of the grounds of the motion, it must be affirmed; and, assuming that it was granted for insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, there is no reason for disturbing it. In the case of In re Carriger's Estate, 104 Cal. 81, 37 Pac. 785, this court said as follows: "When the judge of a trial court is satisfied that a verdict is not warranted by the evidence, he should set it aside; and, when he does so, his order granting a new trial will not be reversed unless it appears to this court that he had no reasonable and just ground for holding that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The mere fact that there is some conflicting evidence on the points at issue does not preclude him from exercising the supervisory power of granting a new trial which is clearly given him." Citing cases. This language is directly applicable to the case at bar.

It is averred in the complaint that the deceased died on the 4th of May, 1899, and that at the time of his death he "was lawfully possessed of forty shares of the capital stock of the defendant, designated on the books of defendant as certificate No. 20,484." But the undisputed facts are that at the time of his death this certificate of stock regularly indorsed in the handwriting of deceased was in the possession of Dr. George M. Terrill, who afterwards transferred it to the First National Bank of San Francisco as security for money loaned him by the bank, with authority to have the stock transferred to the bank; and the respondent afterwards took up the old certificate, and issued a new one for the said 40 shares to the said bank. The issue in the case as asserted by appellant at the time of the trial, and presented to the jury by the court's instructions, which were not objected to, and to which no exception was taken, was whether Dr. Terrill was the lawful owner of the said stock, or whether he had obtained possession of it wrongfully. In the opening statement to the jury, counsel for appellant said that plaintiff would introduce evidence tending to show "that this stock was taken by Dr. Terrill from Dr. Lochhead's possession without Dr. Lochhead's knowledge or consent; in other words, that it was stolen." The court instructed the jury that "if you believe that George M. Terrill was in possession of this certificate, indorsed, and had such possession before the death of Dr. Lochhead, without stealing or finding the same, the court instructs you that there is no evidence that such possession was not rightful, and the presumption is that it was rightful; and if there was an understanding between Terrill and Lochhead that Terrill owned the certificate, or was authorized to pledge it for his own benefit, then the assignment thereof by Terrill to the First National Bank was lawful, as a pledge, and the defendant should receive a verdict at your hands." And further: "The court instructs you that, in order to establish the theft of the stock by Terrill, the plaintiff must produce satisfactory evidence of grand larceny." Now, about the only direct evidence as to this issue was the testimony of Dr. Terrill. We will not undertake to give his testimony in full, but will notice enough of it to show its general character. He testified that he was a physician and surgeon, and attended the deceased professionally for about eight or nine years previous to his death; that during the two years, or a year and a half, before his death "he had organic trouble called 'angina pectoris,' a disease of the heart—suffering from severe spasmodic pains in the heart. This disease depresses the system, and is a dangerous disease. I had to remain sometimes three or four hours at a time with him. He did not want me to go away. I relieved his pains, and he did not want me to leave him. He finally died of this disease. * * * In fact, I gave up my vacation for the summer. He begged me not to go away." He further testified that in January, 1899, the deceased indorsed the certificate of stock and delivered it to him in payment of his professional services—the deceased reserving the right to have the dividends thereon during his lifetime, which were paid to him until his death—and that before that time "Dr. Lochhead had spoken to me repeatedly about my services, and compensating me for the same." There was some conflicting evidence, consisting mainly of testimony of witnesses of declarations of Dr. Terrill tending to show that he was giving his services to the deceased gratuitously; but, considering the direct testimony of Dr. Terrill, the undisputed fact that he was in possession of the certificate, regularly indorsed, together with the other evidence in the case, there is no warrant whatever for here holding that the court below abused its discretion in granting the new trial. Therefore the order appealed from must be affirmed.

¶ 2. See New Trial, vol. 37, Cent. Dig. § 144.

We do not deem it necessary to notice the various other points made by respondent. Many of them are not of any very great importance, and may not arise again. It is proper to say, however, that the court should have ruled out the testimony offered by appellant that the deceased had never told certain witnesses that he had transferred the stock, and that Dr. Terrill had never told the witnesses that the stock had been transferred to him. We see no relevancy or pertinency in this testimony. People are not called upon to speak of such transactions to third persons, and usually do not.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte CLIFTON. (Cr. 1,180.)

IMPRISONMENT—CREDITS FOR GOOD BEHAVIOR—CUMULATIVE SENTENCES.

1. St. 1889, p. 410, c. 264, § 20 (Pen. Code 1903, p. 701), provides that a convict shall be allowed from "his term," for good behavior, a deduction of two months in each of the first two years, four months in each of the next two years, and five months in each of the remaining years of said term. Held, in view of Pen. Code 1876, § 1590, providing that a prisoner shall be granted certain credits for good behavior, increasing in amount for each succeeding year, during his imprisonment, and that such credit is deducted from the "entire term" of penal servitude to which he has been sentenced, that under the act of 1889, where one is convicted of two offenses, and, as a punishment for each, sentenced to imprisonment, the second sentence to commence at expiration of the term of imprisonment imposed by the prior sentence, each term is to be considered by itself, as regards the allowance of credits for good behavior.

In Bank. Habeas corpus proceedings by one Clifton. Petitioner remanded to custody.

E. J. Wachorst and Frank J. Murphy, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Petitioner seeks, under habeas corpus, to be released from imprisonment in the State Prison. In September, 1897, he was convicted in the superior court of Los Angeles county on two separate charges of burglary in the second degree, and, as punishment for the first offense, was sentenced to imprisonment in Folsom for five years, and on the second was sentenced for a similar term in the same prison; the latter sentence to commence, as provided by section 669 of the Penal Code, at the expiration of the term of imprisonment imposed by the prior sentence. Having actually served, up to the time of filing this petition, a period of six years and eight months, and having earned, as he claims, credits for good behavior, under section 20 of the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 410, c. 264), to the extent of three years and six months, he insists that he is now entitled to be discharged from imprisonment.

The only point involved in this matter is whether, in computing the credits for good behavior to which petitioner is entitled, the two sentences of five years each are to be taken as constituting a continuous term of ten years, or do they constitute separate, distinct, and independent terms of five years each. If, for the purpose of computing credits, the two terms constitute a continuous or entire term of ten years, then petitioner is entitled to his discharge, because, under the act, the time he has served, added to the credits he has earned upon the basis of a continuous term, has terminated his period of imprisonment. On the other hand, if, under the act, the terms are to be considered separate and distinct, the petitioner must be remanded, as he has not served sufficient time and earned sufficient credits upon the second term of imprisonment imposed to warrant his discharge.

The solution of this question must be determined from the language of the act itself, read in the light of previous legislation upon this subject. The only previous legislation on the matter necessary to be particularly considered is that found in St. 1867-68, p. 675, c. 504, which, upon the adoption of the Codes, was substantially carried into the Penal Code as section 1590 thereof, and which provided that in deducting credits for good conduct, in favor of a convict, they should be deducted from "the entire term of penal servitude to which he has been sentenced." In Ex parte Dalton, 49 Cal. 463, this court held, where a person was convicted of two offenses, for which he was sentenced to ten years for each offense, that, within the intent of the statute, and as a basis for allowing credits, "the entire term of penal servitude" must be considered as 20 years; that each period of 10 years was but a part of the "entire term," and it is insisted by petitioner that the same construction should be applied to the provisions of section 20 of the act of 1889 upon the same subject. Undoubtedly this should be done if the language in both sections of the statute were the same. But it is not. There is a radical and essential difference between the provisions of the original section 1590 of the Penal Code, construed in the Dalton Case, and the language employed in the act of 1889, under which the matter at bar is to be determined. Under the original section considered in the Dalton Case, it was apparent, as the court decided, that it was the intention of the Legislature, from the language used, that, for the purpose of credit commutation in favor of a prisoner, cumulative sentences of imprisonment should be considered as an "entire term of penal servitude to which he has been sentenced." The Dalton Case was decided in 1875, and at its session of 1877-78 (Amendments to Codes 1877-78, p. 124, c. 438) the Legislature amended the original section so as to provide that the credit deductions for good behavior in favor of a prisoner "shall be allowed from his term," and the new act of 1889, now in force, contains the same language. We think it is manifest from this amendment of the original section so soon after the decision in the Dalton Case, providing that the deduction of credits in favor of a prisoner "shall be allowed from his term," and not from the "entire term * * * to which * * * he has been sentenced," that the Legislature intended that such deductions, when cumulative sentences were imposed, should thereafter be made from the terms as they were served, treated and considered as separate and independent terms of imprisonment, as, but for the comprehensive language in the original section, they would otherwise, in law undoubtedly be. If this were not the intention of the Legislature, it cannot well be perceived why, in the amendment and the subsequent act of 1889, such a radical difference in language was used than was employed in particularly defining the basis of commutation in the original section, particularly when we consider that the meaning of the language in that section had already received judicial construction immediately preceding the amendment, by the decision in the Dalton Case, and its meaning as there employed placed beyond question. If the Legislature had intended that the same basis for commutation should obtain under the amendments as under the original section, it would not have departed from the plain and judicially construed language used in that section, and have provided for credit commutations from "his term," instead of from the "entire term * * * to which he has been sentenced." It is clear that, under the language of the original section, it was intended to make the successive periods of imprisonment under cumulative sentences continuous for commutation purposes; and it is equally apparent by the subsequent amendment, and also under the present act, that it was intended to leave the terms—as the law leaves them—separate. If the provision of the act of 1889 had been inserted in the original section, instead of the language there employed, there would be no room for contending that a prisoner's terms on cumulative sentences meant for commutation purposes the "entire term" of imprisonment to which he had been sentenced, because, in the absence of any language limiting or qualifying the use of the word "term," it must be given its legal significance, and, so given, each period of sentence prescribed under cumulative sentences is legally separate and distinct from the other, and there is nothing in common between them upon which such a contention could be sustained. The judicial records upon which such cumulative sentences are based are themselves separate and distinct. The offenses are different, and the convictions and judgments are distinct. The terms of imprisonment thereunder may be different in point of duration, as they are certainly separate in point of commencement, and are enforced under separate commitments; the term of each successive imprisonment commencing at the expiration of the prior term. It was this legal separateness and distinctness between terms of imprisonment under cumulative sentences which the Legislature in the original section intended, for the purpose of credit commutation, to destroy, and which in clear and comprehensive language it effected, by making the "penal servitude to which a convict has been sentenced" an "entire term." When, however, in subsequently dealing with the subject, it abandoned the definition of an "entire term," which it had theretofore created, and used simply the words "his term," it certainly intended that the word "term" should be employed in its legal significance, and to embrace the period solely which a prisoner was actually serving under a given sentence, treated as separate and distinct from any other sentence which, under an equally separate judgment, he would, on its expiration, be required to serve.

It is insisted by petitioner that his "entire term" and his "term" mean the same thing. Considered with relation to their places in the acts of the Legislature under discussion, we do not think so. In the original section it is the period to which the convict "has been sentenced," whether it be one term, or successive terms, which shall be treated as an entirety for commutation purposes, and is so defined by the Legislature in that section. In the act of 1889, "his term," used without any words of further definition or qualification, in law, means the term he is actually serving under a particular sentence, and considered as legally distinct from any other to which he has been sentenced, or which he may be required to subsequently serve under an independent and separate judgment of imprisonment.

Our conclusion therefore is that, when cumulative sentences are imposed, a prisoner is entitled to commutation credits for good behavior upon each term only as it is served, and not upon the separate terms to which he may have been sentenced, treated as a continuous period of imprisonment, or as an entire term, under the original section of the Penal Code, as construed in the Dalton Case.

The prisoner is remanded to the custody of the warden.

INJURIES TO EMPLOYÉ — FELLOW SERVANTS — DEFECTIVE MACHINERY—EVIDENCE OF NEGLIGENCE.

was injured by the knives of the machine becoming dull and the belt driving the same becoming loose, if the injury resulted from the negligence of any other of such employés than the one injured it was from the negligence of a fellow servant.

2. In an action for injuries to plaintiff, alleged to have resulted from the knives of the planing machine used by him being dull and the belt driving the machine being loose, evidence that immediately after the accident the knives were sharpened and the belt was tightened is inadmissible as an admission of prior negligence.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by C. Helling against H. B. Schindler. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. H. Wilson, for appellant. J. L. Geary, Jr., for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff was employed by defendant as a wheelwright, and his left hand was badly cut by the knives of a buzz planer while he was using such planer in the course of his employment. His claim, as set forth in his complaint, was that at the time of the accident the planer "was out of repair, and unsafe for the uses and purposes for which said machine and apparatus were intended, to wit, the knives and apparatus thereof were dull, and the belt thereof connecting said machine with the power shaft of said plant and putting said machine and the said knives in motion was loose, and failed to give to said knives speed and velocity sufficient and necessary to plane a board upon which plaintiff was then operating," by reason of which, while planing a board, his left hand was thrown upon and in the knives of the machine. He obtained a judgment for $2,500, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The defendant, in his answer, denied these allegations of the complaint. He also alleged contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and also that the injury was caused by the fault and negligence of a fellow servant.

1. The principal question discussed by counsel in this case is as to whether, assuming that the accident was due to the dullness of the knives or the looseness of the belt, the evidence does not show a case where, under the circumstances, the negligent condition must be attributed to the negligence of a fellow servant, rather than that of the employer. The trial court adopted the theory that for any such conditions the employer must be held responsible, and that there was no question as to the negligence of a fellow servant involved in the case. It therefore refused to grant a nonsuit, refused to instruct the jury upon the question of negligence of a fellow servant, and instructed the jury to the effect that, if the planing machine was not in a reasonably safe and suitable condition in either of the particulars claimed, and plaintiff did not, or could not by the exercise of reasonable care, know of such condition, and his injuries were the result thereof, their verdict must be for the plaintiff. Excluding from consideration the evidence as to subsequent repairs, which, as we shall show hereafter, was improperly admitted, the case presented was substantially as follows: The planing machine in question was used, as their needs required, for the purpose of planing small pieces of wood, by all of the men employed in the woodworking department of defendant's establishment, including a foreman of such department. There were six or seven men so employed. The planer was at the time of the accident in perfect condition, except that the knives had then become dull to some extent, and the belt somewhat loose, from use by these employés. No part of the machine broke or gave way. It was the duty of the foreman to see that the knives were kept sufficiently sharp and the belt sufficiently tight to properly run the machine. When the belt became so loose as to slip, the usual and customary way of remedying the defect was by putting on belt dressing, unless it became so loose as to require being shortened. When the knives became dull from use—which was a frequent occurrence—the ordinary method of sharpening was for the foreman to file them, without removing them from the machine, unless the edges had become so worn from long use that they could not be filed to advantage, in which event they were taken out and sent away to be ground. As long as the machine would, when used in the ordinary manner, efficiently do the work, it could not be said to be defective in either of the respects suggested; and both alleged defects were of such a nature that, admittedly, they would at once come to the knowledge of any experienced operator attempting to use the machine, for the effect of the machine upon the board sought to be planed would indicate the condition. Plaintiff had been employed in this shop for more than 19 months, and had continuously used this machine, as required by his work, sometimes 10, 15, or 20 times a day, up to the time of the accident. He had used it on the day before the accident. At the time of the accident, having occasion to plane a board, he waited for the foreman to finish planing a board, and then put his own board on the machine. He passed the board over the machine once, and noticed nothing wrong with the manner in which it worked, and, the board not being sufficiently smooth, he commenced to pass it over again, when, as he said, "it started jumping repeatedly, and threw my hand into the knives." He knew that the knives in this planer became dull from use, and frequently had to be sharpened, and that the belt frequently became somewhat slack from use; but claimed that he did not know that the knives were dull, or the belt slack, in this instance, until the moment of the accident. There is nothing to indicate that the machine had not worked efficiently up to that very moment. The knives were dull to an extent, but not so dull but that they would do the work all right; and the same is true as to the slackness of the belt. The machine had been constantly used on the morning of the accident, right up to the happening thereof between 10 and 11 o'clock. Nor is there anything in the record to indicate that anything more was necessary to fully sharpen the knives than the mere filing thereof, or that the slackness of the belt could not be easily remedied by means at hand, which it was the duty of the foreman to use.

We have thus evidence tending to show a case where the duty of keeping a single piece of safe and adequate machinery in proper running order had been confided to one of six or seven employés, whose duty it was to use the machinery in common, and a case where the particular defects complained of were defects necessarily attendant upon the use of such machinery, which would at once manifest themselves to an operator thereon, and which could immediately be easily remedied by simply filing the knives and tightening the belt—duties which may, with propriety, be said to have to do only with the operation of the machinery. It is manifest that the rule requiring an employer to keep appliances furnished to employés in a reasonably safe and suitable condition—a rule absolutely essential to the proper protection of employés—cannot be held applicable to every defect arising in the daily use of the appliance, and consequent upon such use. It is incumbent upon the employer to furnish an appliance that is reasonably safe, and to use reasonable care to keep the same in proper repair, and this duty he cannot delegate so as to escape liability. The well-settled rule in this regard is clearly stated and the authorities cited in Skelton v. Pacific Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 507, 511, 74 Pac. 13. But there are certain duties necessarily attendant upon the operation of some appliances, and which really have to do only with their proper operation, which, if left unperformed, render the machinery unsafe, or at least inefficient. Take, for instance, the necessity of keeping certain machinery well oiled. A locomotive engineer is injured solely because of the negligence of his fireman in the matter of oiling the machinery of the engine. The machinery was made unsafe by reason of such negligence, but, if the employer has used reasonable care in the employment of the fireman, he cannot be held responsible to the engineer for his negligence. Such a duty must, of necessity, be intrusted to the operatives, and has nothing to do with the employer's duty of furnishing and keeping in repair. And the same would clearly be true as to the duty of keeping the planing machine in question well oiled, which duty, the record shows, was that of another one of the six or seven employés using the machine. As was said in the case of Webber v. Piper, 109 N. Y. 496, 17 N. E. 216, which was the case of a circular saw dull from use: "There are many matters of detail in the management of safe and adequate machinery which must be intrusted to the operatives, and as to which the master owes no duty except the employment of competent workmen. * * * The line of division between the duty of the master to furnish and maintain safe and adequate machinery and that of the operative to manage and handle it with prudence and care is difficult to define by any general description, but is quite obvious when each case, as it arises, comes under consideration. In the one before us the neglect, if any, was in a detail of the management of the machinery. A master builder might furnish proper tools to his workmen, but it would not be his duty to sharpen every chisel as it became dull, or set every saw when that need arose." In Cregan v. Marston, 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, 22 Am. St. Rep. 854, it was said: "The servants cannot furnish the machines. That is the master's right and duty. But the servant who uses them can and should keep them in order for their proper and safe daily use when furnished with the necessary means of so doing and when perfectly capable of correcting the defect." In 1 Bailey's Personal Injuries, § 259, it is declared that "the general rule does not apply to defects arising in the daily use of an appliance which are not of a permanent character and do not require the help of skillful mechanics to repair, but which may easily be, and usually are, repaired by the workmen, and to repair which proper and suitable materials are supplied." See, also, Cregan v. Marston, 126 N. Y. 568, 27 N. E. 952, 22 Am. St. Rep. 854; 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 89; 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 195; McGee v. Cordage Co., 139 Mass. 445, 1 N. E. 745. This principle has been applied in many cases, and we know of no case that has gone to the extent of holding that there is not some such limitation as above suggested upon the general rule. The differences that we find in the reported cases are upon the question as to whether the facts of a particular case bring it within the operation of the general rule or the qualification thereof, for, as said in Webber v. Piper, supra, the line of division is difficult to define by any general description. The statement quoted above from Bailey's Personal Injuries is, at least so far as those engaged in the common use of an appliance are concerned, sustained by the great weight of authority. Of course, if any such defects as are included therein become actually known to the employer, or continue for so long a time or under such circumstances as to warrant the conclusion that in the exercise of reasonable care he should have known thereof, another element is introduced, upon which a liability upon his part might be based. There is, however, no such element shown by the record in this case. The qualification we are considering relates only to such slight defects attendant upon the operation of machinery as, from their nature, require remedying at the hands of the operators themselves, and as a part of the proper operation of the machine. We are of the opinion that it is clear that any such mere dullness of the knives in the planer in question, produced by the ordinary use thereof, as might be sufficiently remedied by the use of a file in the hands of one of the employés, was a defect of such a nature that the employer could not be held responsible therefor, in the absence of other circumstances. It was something necessarily attendant upon the use of the machine, which could be easily remedied, whenever it occurred, by the operators themselves, and for which the means of remedying were supplied to one of their number. The remedying of such a defect would really be a part of the proper operation of the machine, and therefore not "an act the duty for the performance of which belongs in law to the master," and any negligence in the performance of that duty by the particular employé whose business it was to perform it would be the negligence of a fellow servant. The same, we think, is true as to the belt, if it be assumed that the slackness thereof could have contributed to the accident.

We have examined all of the many cases cited by plaintiff's counsel, and find nothing therein in conflict with the views already stated. The general rule as to the employer's liability is fully conceded, and it may be freely admitted that he must take notice of the liability of appliances to wear out from use and become unsafe, and guard against such conditions. The qualification of the rule as to such defects as are attendant upon the operation of the machinery, and the remedying of which is, in its nature, really a part of such operation, and therefore the duty of the employé rather than the employer, is not disputed by the authorities cited, but is, in fact, expressly recognized by some of them. It is manifest from the foregoing that, independent of the question as to whether there was evidence which would support a finding of negligence on the part of defendant, and as to which the trial court said, in denying the motion for a nonsuit, "it is a very, very close question in my mind," the court erred in instructing the jury to the effect that they should find for plaintiff if they believed that the machinery was, at the time of the injury, not in a reasonably safe and suitable condition in both or either of the particulars claimed by plaintiff, that plaintiff did not know of such defective condition or could not have known thereof by the exercise of ordinary care, and that his injuries were the result thereof. There was certainly evidence which, under the views already stated, would have sustained a finding that any defective condition in the respects suggested was due to the negligence of a fellow servant, rather than that of the master. The instruction noted ignored this condition of the evidence, and required a verdict for plaintiff, even though the negligence was solely that of the fellow servant.

2. There was also error necessitating reversal in the admission of evidence as to repairs made after the accident. Whether or not any negligence on the part of defendant was the proximate cause of the accident to plaintiff was one of the matters in issue. The evidence plainly showed that the knives of the planer were more or less "dull," and that the belt connecting the machine with the motive power was more or less "loose." The questions in this connection were, however, whether the knives were so dull and the belt so loose as to render the planer in any degree unsafe for use in the manner in which it was ordinarily used, whether the defendant knew, or in the exercise of reasonable care should have known, of these conditions, and whether such dullness or looseness, or both, proximately caused the accident. Unless these questions could be answered in the affirmative, there could be no finding of actionable negligence on the part of defendant.

Under these circumstances, over the objection of defendant that the proposed evidence was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, and that it was not proper to show the mere fact of repairs made after the accident, or to show any act done by defendant with reference to the machine after the accident, plaintiff was allowed to introduce evidence to the effect, merely, that immediately after the accident the knives, before being again used, were taken by order of defendant's foreman to a planing mill and sharpened, and also that directly after the accident the belt was tightened by said foreman by taking an inch and a half or two inches out of it. There was nothing in the evidence so given to indicate how much "sharpening" was done, or what work was necessary to make the knives "sharp." The only conceivable effect of this evidence as to the sharpening of the knives, limited as it was to the mere fact of the making of repairs immediately after the accident, was to impute to defendant's foreman an admission to the effect that the knives were so dull as to render the machine unsafe for use, and that such condition was the cause of the accident. Assuming that the foreman could bind the defendant by any such admission, it is now well settled in this state, in accord with the rule prevailing generally elsewhere, that evidence of precautions taken and repairs made after the happening of the accident is not admissible to show a negligent condition at the time of the accident. This matter was fully discussed in the case of Sappenfield v. Main Street, etc., Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 Pac. 590, where this court said: "The negligence of the employer which renders him responsible for the accident depends upon what he did and knew before the accident, and must be established by facts and circumstances which preceded it, and not by acts done by him after its occurrence." The court there approvingly quoted from Nalley v. Hartford Carpet Co., 51 Conn. 524, 50 Am. Rep. 47, as follows: "The fact that an accident has happened and some person has been injured immediately puts a party on a higher plane of diligence and duty, from which he acts with a view of preventing the possibility of a similar accident, which should operate to commend, rather than to condemn, the person so acting. If the subsequent act is made to reflect back upon the prior one, although it is done upon the theory that it is a mere admission, yet it virtually introduces into the transaction a new element and test of negligence, which has no business there, not being in existence at the time." The Sappenfield Case has been followed and approved in Hager v. S. P. Co., 98 Cal. 309, 311, 33 Pac. 119; Turner v. Hearst, 115 Cal. 394, 401, 47 Pac 129; Limberg v. Glenwood L. Co., 127 Cal. 598, 604, 60 Pac. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33. The decision in Butcher v. Vaca Valley Ry., 67 Cal. 518, 525, 8 Pac. 174, so far as it is in conflict with these views, has been, in effect, overruled by each of the cases cited. Counsel for plaintiff concedes that it is settled in California that evidence of subsequent repairs or changes is not admissible to prove prior negligence. He, however, claims that the evidence was admissible here to show the actual condition of the machinery at the time of the accident.

There is a line of decisions in other states upholding what may be said to be a qualification to the rule just discussed, to the effect that, where evidence of subsequent changes, though it may be in the way of repairs or additional precautions, fairly tends to show the actual conditions existing at the time of the accident, it is admissible for that purpose. It would seem unnecessary to consider this alleged qualification of the general rule, for we cannot see that it is at all applicable to the evidence under consideration. So far as the knives were concerned, absolutely nothing was shown thereby beyond the mere fact that they were put through the process of being sharpened anew before again being used. This mere fact tended to show, at most, nothing more than an admission on the part of the foreman that they were so dull as to render the machine unsafe for use, and that the accident was caused by this condition, and came within the effect of the general rule already discussed.

The qualification relied on by plaintiff does not go to the extent necessary to sustain respondent under the facts of this case. The first decision cited and quoted from by him—Louisville & Nashville Ry. Co. v. Malone, 109 Ala. 518, 20 South. 36, 37—declares emphatically as follows: "In our opinion, if nothing can be shown except the fact of repairing, that fact is not competent to be considered by the jury. To hold that an act of repairing affords evidence tending to show that a previous injury was the result of a defect in the appliances, would deter a prudent person from making repairs." In the second case cited and quoted from by him—Kuhns v. Wis. I. & N. Ry. Co., 76 Iowa, 71, 40 N. W. 92—there was a disputed question of fact as to whether there was a low joint in the railroad track at the place and time of the accident, and evidence was admitted to show that some sectionmen, discovering the accident, went to the place where the low joint was, and raised it up to a level. This evidence was held admissible solely as tending to show the actual condition of the joint at the time of the accident; but the judgment was reversed for the reason that the evidence had been admitted without any limitation as to its purpose, and the jury had been left at liberty to consider the evidence as an admission or confession of the defendant that the condition of the joint was the cause of the accident.

As the particular evidence in question was, in our judgment, inadmissible for any purpose, it is unnecessary to consider the contention of respondent to the effect that appellant should have had it limited by proper instruction to the purpose for which it may have been admissible.

It is further urged that, if the evidence was improperly admitted, the error was not prejudicial, "in view of the admission of appellant that the machine was in a defective condition." We find no admission on the part of appellant, except such as may be shown by the particular evidence under consideration, to the effect that the knives were in such a condition as to render the machine unsafe for use. It was said of improperly admitted evidence in Estate of James, 124 Cal. 653, 57 Pac. 578, 1008, approvingly quoted in Rulofson v. Billings, 140 Cal. 452, 460, 74 Pac. 35, 37: "If improper evidence under objection has been admitted, it is impossible for this court to say how much weight and influence it had in the mind of the trial court in framing its findings of fact. The improperly admitted evidence may have been all-powerful to that effect. As far as this court knows, it may have been that particular evidence which turned the scale and lost the case to the appellants. This must, of necessity, be the rule wherever improper evidence has been admitted which upon its face tends in any degree to affect the final conclusion of the court." This is manifestly applicable to the case at bar. Under the circumstances here appearing, it is impossible for this court to say how far the evidence as to the sharpening of the knives subsequent to the accident, tending to show an admission on the part of defendant's foreman to the effect that the accident was due to an unsafe condition of the knives, operated to induce a verdict for plaintiff. As said in the case quoted from, it may have been all-powerful to that effect.

It is unnecessary to discuss any of the other questions presented. We have sufficiently indicated our views as to the general questions presented for all the purposes of a new trial.

The judgment and order are reversed.

WALSH et al. v. ABBOTT et al. (S. F. 2,942.)

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—LAND QUITCLAIMED.

1. A deed executed by one having paper title to an undivided one-third of a certain tract of land, executed on the day that suit was instituted against him and others for a decree that by reason of mistakes in description he was the owner of a third interest in the eastern half instead of the northern half of the tract, and which resulted in such a decree, will be held to quitclaim his interest in the entire tract, not merely the north half; it, after granting the undivided one-third of the northern half of the tract known as M., proceeding: "Together with all the estate," etc., "which I had or may have of, in or to the same, or any part or parcel thereof, to have and to hold the aforesaid premises."

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by James Walsh and others against J. P. Abbott and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John O'B. Wyatt (E. W. McGraw and Rodgers, Paterson & Slack, of counsel), for appellants. H. O. Beatty, M. R. Jones, Hartley & Abbott, A. A. Moore, and George A. Lamont (W. S. Goodfellow, Garret W. McEnerney, Sanborn & Beatty, and Chickering & Gregory, of counsel), for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. By this action plaintiffs sought to have partition of the southeast quarter of the Rancho Medanos, in Contra Costa county. The rancho lies on the southern bank of the San Joaquin river and Suisun Bay. The plaintiffs claim as heirs at law of James Walsh, deceased, and seek to establish his ownership in an undivided one-third interest in the southeast quarter of the rancho, claiming that by succession it has devolved upon them.

In 1839 the Mexican government granted the Rancho Medanos to Jose Antonion Mesa and Jose Miguel Garcea. Mesa and Garcea in 1849 granted to J. D. Stevenson the southern half part of the tract of land known as "Medanos." Their deeds were recorded in 1851. In 1850 Mesa and Garcea in like manner granted to Michael Murray, James Walsh, and Ellen Fallon the north half of the same tract. These deeds were recorded in June, 1850. Upon August 2, 1850, James Walsh, by deed of that date, granted to Martin Murphy the undivided one-third of the northern half of the Rancho Medanos. This deed was recorded in 1851. On the day of the execution of the deed by Walsh to Murphy, Stevenson brought suit in the Third District Court of the state against the Garceas, the Mesas, and their grantees, Murray, Walsh, and Fallon, to reform and correct the deed to him and to the other grantees, and to partition the rancho. The suit was based upon an alleged error of description running through all the deeds. It consisted in describing the San Joaquin river as bounding the rancho on the east, when in fact it formed the northern boundary. The action resulted in a judgment favorable to Stevenson's contention, and deeds were exchanged between Stevenson upon the one hand and Murray, Walsh, and Fallon upon the other, whereby there was conveyed to Stevenson the west half of the rancho, and to Murray, Walsh, and Fallon the east half thereof. Subsequently, in 1853, Stevenson, Murray, Walsh, and Fallon filed with the board of land commissioners their petition for the confirmation of the grant. In that year, or in the year after, James Walsh died. After proceedings had before the board of land commissioners and before the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, the grant was confirmed, the west half to Stevenson, the east half to Murray, Walsh, and Fallon, and upon October 8, 1872, the United States issued its patent to them. Plaintiffs, for title, introduced the deeds and records to which reference has been made, and supplemented these with evidence that James Walsh, the patentee, was never married; that of his immediate kin, brothers and sisters, all had died unmarried without issue, saving one brother, who was the father of plaintiffs, who died in 1887, and whose death was followed by that of his wife, leaving no other issue than the plaintiffs herein. The court, upon motion of defendants, nonsuited the plaintiffs upon this showing, and the soundness of its ruling in this regard is here attacked.

Sundry propositions are urged by respondents in support of the court's order. We pass them by, not as being without merit, but because they go merely to the question of the failure of the proof to establish title by succession in the plaintiffs. As, for example, it is urged that the proofs failed utterly to show that both the original James Walsh and the father of these plaintiffs had not, by will, devised all of their title to the lands in question; that there is no presumption of intestacy; and that the ruling of the court was proper for this reason. These points, though only for the argument which is based upon them, concede that some title to the rancho remained in James Walsh, subject to his legal disposition by grant or devise. They are passed by because their consideration is rendered unnecessary in view of the conclusion we have reached that Walsh, by his deed to Martin Murphy, divested himself of all title. That deed is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, James Walsh, for and in consideration of the sum of ten thousand dollars to me in hand paid by Martin Murphy, of Santa Clara County, California, at or before the ensealing and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof I do hereby fully confess and acknowledge, I have given, granted, sold and conveyed, and by these presents, do give, grant, sell and convey unto the said Martin Murphy, his heirs and assigns forever, the undivided one-third of all that northern half part of all that certain tract of land situate in upper California, known by the name of 'Medanos' or 'Meganos' and bounding as follows: On the north by River San Joaquin, on the south by Jonathan D. Stevenson, on the east by Doctor Marsh, and on the west by Salvio Pacheco.

"Together with all the estate, right, title, interest and demand whatsoever which I had or may have of, in or to the same, or any part or parcel thereof, to have and to hold the aforesaid premises with all right, privileges and appurtenances thereunto belonging unto the said Martin Murphy, his heirs, assigns, executors and administrators to his and their use and behoof forever.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto affixed my hand and seal this 2nd day of August, Anno Domini, one thousand eight hundred and fifty.

"James Walsh. [Seal.]"

The contention of appellants is that Walsh by this deed divested himself only of such title as he had to the northern half of the rancho, and that, as by the patent from the United States he and his co-tenants, Murray and Fallon, were granted the eastern half of the rancho, he still retained his undivided interest in the south half of that east half. The particular part of the deed calling for construction is the quitclaim clause beginning with "together with all the estate, right, title," etc. If it shall be found that the true meaning and intent of Walsh was to grant his undivided one-third interest in the northern half of the rancho, which was all of the interest in the rancho to which he then had paper title, and that the quitclaim clause had reference only to this northern half, the construction for which appellants contend will be established. If, upon the other hand, the view of the respondents, which view was adopted by the trial court, is the true one, then by this clause Walsh divested himself of all of his interest in and to all of the rancho, and the effect of the patent from the United States to Walsh is, not to create a new title in him, but to confirm in his grantees, through him, the title which had formerly been his. Stark v. Barrett, 15 Cal. 362; More v. Steinbach, 127 U. S. 70, 8 Sup. Ct. 1067, 32 L. Ed. 51. Certain familiar principles of construction are to be invoked: First, as between the parties to the deed it is to be construed more strongly in favor of the grantee; second, it is to be construed, if possible, so as to give all of its operative words effect; and, third, if any doubt still exists as to the intention of the grantor, in arriving at that intention there shall be considered the situation of the parties, the subject-matter at the time of contracting, and the attendant and surrounding circumstances leading to the execution of the instrument. Brannan v. Mesick, 10 Cal. 95. The first of these principles requires no special elucidation. As to the second, it is to be noted that the construction contended for by appellant gives no meaning nor effect whatsoever to the quitclaim clause. According to this construction, Walsh, having made his deed of grant to all of his interest in the northern half, in the next breath quitclaims to his grantee the same property. Such a construction makes of the clause in question nothing but empty and useless verbiage, while, upon the other hand, to construe it as respondents contend it should be construed, would give reasonable and effective force to the language designedly employed. The deed would then be understood to mean that Walsh, having conveyed by grant all of the land to which he had paper title, as further assurance and confirmation of title to his grantee, and to save the possibility of conflict over boundaries, quitclaimed to him whatever interest he might have in all of the rancho. Under this construction the "same" has reference to the Rancho "Medanos" or "Meganos," as previously employed in the deed, and in the subsequent phrase found in the habendum clause "to hold the aforesaid premises," "aforesaid premises" is referable to the word "same." The belief that such was the true intention of the grantor fairly expressed in his deed becomes fixed when consideration is paid to the surrounding circumstances. Walsh was the owner of one-third of an uncertain half of the rancho. By his paper title it was the northern one-half. It is fairly inferable that Walsh knew that it was in question and in dispute as to which one-half it was within which his land lay. It is fairly inferable, also, that he knew this at the time he made his deed to Murphy, because the suit to determine this question was brought upon the very day he made his deed, and it is not to be supposed that such a suit would have been commenced without an effort first made by Stevenson to reconcile these differences with Walsh, Murray, and Fallon by an exchange of deeds without the necessity of the intervention of a court. It seems in every way reasonable to conclude, therefore, that Walsh knew that his ownership to one-third of the north half was disputed; that the result of the dispute could only be one of two things—to confirm him in the ownership of that particular piece, or to assign to him the ownership of one-third of some other one-half, as was actually done. Was it, then, the intention of Walsh, in conveying to Murphy for a valuable consideration, to give him a title to a limited piece, which title might prove valueless, or was it his intention to convey to him the title which he apparently had to one-third of the north half, and for his grantee's further protection to assure him in this title, should it prove defective, by a quitclaim of whatever interest it might be found in truth that he did have? There can be no hesitation in saying, under all of these circumstances, that the latter was the true intention of the grantor.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SOWELL. (Cr. 1,146.)

CRIMINAL LAW—JURY—SELECTION — MATERIAL DEPARTURE FROM FORMS OF LAW—FAILURE TO SELECT JUROR FROM CERTAIN TOWNSHIP—KEEPING OF SEPARATE LISTS—JURORS—QUALIFICATIONS—PREJUDICE—INSANITY AS A DEFENSE — HARMLESS ERROR — EXPERT TESTIMONY.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 204, making it the duty of supervisors to select jurors, mere failure of the minutes of the board to show that jurors were selected as they in fact were is not a material departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing of the jury, within Pen. Code, § 1859, authorizing a challenge to the panel for such a departure.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 204, making it the duty of supervisors to select the number of jurors which the court estimates will be required, mere unexplained omission of two names from a list prepared under an order requiring the selection of 300 jurors is not a material departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing of the jury, within Pen. Code. § 1059, authorizing a challenge to the panel for such a departure.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 206, providing that jurors shall be selected from townships in proportion to the number of inhabitants, it will be presumed that failure to select any jurors from a township was caused by the fact that none of the inhabitants were qualified as jurors.

4. Conceding that Code Civ. Proc. § 206, requires the lists of jurors selected from each township to be kept separate from each other, failure to do so is not a material departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing of the jury, within Pen. Code, § 1059, authorizing a challenge to the panel for such a departure.

5. Under the express provision of Pen. Code, § 1076, a juror is not biased by a qualified opinion based on rumor and newspaper articles, removable by evidence, and not interfering with impartial action.

6. In a prosecution for crime, in which the defense is insanity, a juror is not disqualified by a prejudice against the possible interposition of feigned insanity as a defense; it appearing that his prejudice does not extend to cases where proof of real insanity is made.

7. On contradictory testimony by a juror as to bias, the finding of the trial court as to competency is conclusive.

8. Error, if any, in admitting as part of a dying declaration a statement by deceased that he thought defendant thought he had shot him in the body, was harmless, especially in view of testimony by defendant that he thought when he fired that he had hit deceased in the side.

9. A statement by the court to an expert that he need base his opinion only on the evidence he deemed true was harmless, where the answer was in fact based on the hypothesis that all the evidence was true.

10. An expert in insanity may testify that certain symptoms could not all be present in the same individual at the same time.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Shadwick Sowell was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Duncan, Jr., for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. C. Daly, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

LORIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be imprisoned for life, and from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial he appeals. No point is made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, but he claims that, for certain alleged errors committed during the trial, the judgment should be reversed, and these are presented as follows:

1. He insists that the court erred in denying his challenge to the panel of trial jurors drawn to try his case, which challenge was interposed upon the ground that there had been a material departure from the forms prescribed by sections 204, 205, and 206 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the selecting and listing by the board of supervisors of jurors from which said panel was drawn, and which departure is made the basis of a challenge by section 1059 of the Penal Code. The particular grounds urged were that there was no record of the board of supervisors disclosing that any trial jurors had been selected by such board, as ordered by the superior court, under said section 204 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that, if such selection were made, there were but 298 jurors listed, notwithstanding the order of the superior court required the selection of 300; that the jurors selected and listed were selected by the board of supervisors by supervisor districts, and not by townships and in proportion to the population therein; and that the lists of selected jurors were not kept separate and distinct from each other. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 205, 206.

We do not think the action of the court in denying the challenge should be disturbed. The first two objections urged—the absence of any record on the minutes of the board, and the selection of a less number than required by the order of the court—do not present such substantial departures from the provisions of the law governing the selection of jurors as deprived the defendant of an opportunity to secure a fair and impartial jury, which is the main purpose to be conserved by adherence to the requirements of the provisions of the Codes cited. As far as the failure of the minutes of the board of supervisors to contain a record of the selection is concerned, it appears clearly from the uncontradicted evidence of members of the board of supervisors who made the selection, and that of the deputy county clerk, that the list of jurors from which the panel to try defendant was drawn was in fact selected by said supervisors under the order of the court, and was certified to by the said board as so drawn, and was delivered by it into the possession of the county clerk. There was no question as to the identity of the list as being the one that was selected by the board under the order, nor was there any question that it was from this list of jurors, whose names were placed in the box, that the panel which defendant challenged was drawn. Under this showing that, as a matter of fact, the jurors on the list certified and delivered to the county clerk were selected by the board of supervisors, the circumstance that an entry of such selection was omitted from the records of the board would not warrant the court in sustaining the challenge on that ground.

As to the ground of challenge that a less number of jurors were selected than were designated by the order of the court: It is not apparent from the record how the omission to return the full number required by the order occurred. It was not claimed, however, to have been intentionally done, and was doubtless inadvertent, because it appears from the certificate of the members of the board of supervisors to the list, and from their testimony on the hearing, that they intended to select and return 300. The list purports to be numbered from 1 to 300, but it appears that jurors whose names should have been placed opposite numbers 178 and 179 in the list, together with these numbers, were omitted. How this occurred was not explained upon the hearing. No inquiry was made by either side about it, and there is now no suggestion that this failure was prompted by any improper motive or was the result of design. It may have occurred, and probably did, through a clerical omission in preparing the complete list for certification to the county clerk from the separate lists made out by each supervisor. It is true that this omission was a failure to follow the order of the court under the plain mandate of the statute, and, while it cannot be too strongly urged that in selecting and returning jurors the provisions of the statute should be literally followed, yet the law has recognized possible departures from what is required, and, to meet them, has provided that not every such departure should be a successful ground of challenge, but only material ones. Material departures are only such as affect the substantial rights of a defendant in securing an impartial jury, and it is not apparent from the record before us how the fact that the supervisors returned 298 instead of 300 jurors could have at all prevented this defendant from securing such a jury. There was no question but that the jurors who were selected were individually suitable and qualified to be returned as such, and that more than enough were returned by the board from which the defendant might select and obtain a jury, and, in fact, out of the panel of 91 which he challenged, such a jury was ultimately selected and tried the cause.

A point similar to the one here discussed was made in the case of People v. Davis, 73 Cal. 355, 359, 15 Pac. 8, and it was there held that the failure to return the full number of jurors designated by the order of the court was not such a material departure as warranted sustaining a challenge to the panel on that account.

As to the challenge on the ground that the jurors were selected from supervisor districts, and not by townships, in proportion to the population thereof, and that the lists were not kept separate and distinct, less need be said. The testimony of the members of the board who made the selections showed that in each supervisorial district such selections were made and apportioned from the judicial townships therein, and were in general proportioned to their population, except as to Humboldt township, which contained 87 voters, and from which no jurors seem to have been selected. While it is probable that there were some persons among these voters suitable to have been returned as jurors, it is still possible that there were not. The fact that there were a given number of voters in the township is not evidence that any of them were qualified to be returned as jurors. The qualifications of jurors and of electors are quite different. A person may be qualified as an elector who would be disqualified as a juror, and it must be assumed, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, that as the law directed the supervisors to select a proportionate number of jurors from Humboldt township, as well as the other townships, this was not done because there were no persons in the former who were suitable and qualified as such. If this were not so, it was incumbent on the defendant (the presumption being that the board properly discharged its duty) to introduce evidence (which he did not) showing that there were persons in that township suitable and qualified to have been selected and returned as jurors.

As to the point that the lists were not kept separate and distinct: It is assumed by both sides in this case that the requirement of section 206 of the Code of Civil Procedure in that regard applies to the township selections; that the lists of selection from each township must be kept separate and distinct from each other. It may well be questioned whether this requirement does not really apply to keeping the lists of grand and trial jurors, which, under the order of the court, the supervisors are required to select, separate and distinct from each other, rather than to so keeping township lists. If this were the true construction to be given to the section, as the lists of grand and trial jurors were in fact kept separate, no further mention of this point would be necessary. On the assumption, however, made by both sides, which for present purposes only will be deemed correct, that the requirement applies to the township selections, it appears as a fact that each supervisor selected the jurors from the township within his district, and the general lists certified to the county clerk showed such selections. Counsel for defendant, in his brief, has found no difficulty in tabulating from these selections and listings the jurors selected from each township, and it appears to us that no one interested in the matter would be unable to do so. But were it otherwise, and independent of the question whether the requirement does not apply exclusively to keeping grand and trial jury lists separate, we would not feel disposed to hold that, where it appeared that the jurors had been selected from townships, the mere fact that they had not been so listed in the certification to the county clerk was of such substantial merit as to warrant sustaining a challenge on that account.

2. It is next insisted that the court erred in denying defendant's challenge to some 12 jurors on the ground of actual bias. This bias was claimed to be evidenced by their statements upon their voir dire that they were of opinion that the defendant, in killing deceased, had committed a crime. But these opinions were founded solely upon public rumors or based upon statements in public journals, and were not unqualified. They were subject to removal by evidence on the trial, and it appearing to the court that, notwithstanding such opinion, the jurors would act impartially and fairly upon the evidence, the challenges were properly denied. Pen. Code, § 1076; People v. Brown, 59 Cal. 354; People v. Miller, 125 Cal. 46, 57 Pac. 770.

In this same line it is also urged that the court erred in denying certain challenges of defendant to jurors whose testimony, it is insisted, showed that they entertained a prejudice against insanity as a defense, and this was the defense alone which the defendant interposed. The examination of these jurors as to insanity as a defense was quite exhaustive, and the inquiries were as to insanity in general. Attention was not particularly directed to that insanity which alone is recognized by the law as a defense, and the existence of which relieves the defendant from responsibility. People v. Hoin, 62 Cal. 120, 45 Am. Rep. 651. And it is quite obvious that, under the inquiries which were made of the jurors concerning their views upon such a defense in general, the prejudice which they expressed was directed to the possible interposition of simulated or feigned insanity as a defense to avoid responsibility for crime, instead of the existence of real insanity, which relieves from it; and, while it is true that their preliminary statements were that they entertained a prejudice, to some extent, against such a defense, it is equally clear from their testimony upon further examination, and in fact from their entire examination upon the point, that this prejudice did not extend to cases where proof of real insanity was made, and that in the case at bar, if such insanity were proven by the defendant, they would recognize and adopt it as a good and perfect defense, and that, as to the law governing the matter of insanity, they would abide by and follow the instructions of the court relative to it. Under this showing, we cannot say that the court erred in denying the challenges. The defendant was only entitled to a jury which would give the defense of insanity, like any other defense, full and fair consideration, and act upon it when duly proven as a valid and complete defense; and this the responses of the jury, taken as a whole, satisfied the court they would do. But if it were not obvious from the testimony of these jurors that whatever degree of prejudice they entertained arose from the impression, popularly entertained, that insanity as a defense is often simulated and feigned, and that the prejudice of which they were speaking had no relation to real insanity, still the most that can be urged upon the record is that the evidence given by each of these jurors on the subject was in itself contradictory; and it is well settled that under such circumstances it is exclusively the province of the trial court to determine the credit which should be given it, and that its determination in that respect is not subject to our review. As was said in People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 559, 39 Pac. 944: "In this case the examination of some of the venire, who were subsequently unsuccessfully challenged upon the ground of actual bias by the defendant, discloses a state of facts which might well have justified the trial court in excluding them from the jury box. But the evidence of these various jurors taken upon their voir dire is not at all conclusive that they were disqualified from acting in the case. When the matter was submitted to the court for a decision upon the evidence taken, it can at least be said the question was an open one as to their disqualification. The evidence of each juror was contradictory in itself. It was subject to more than one construction. A finding by the court either way upon the challenge would have support in the evidence, and under such circumstances the trial court is the final arbiter of the question. For under such circumstances the question presented to this court by the appeal is one of fact, and our power to hear and determine is limited to appeals upon questions of law alone." Also People v. Scott, 123 Cal. 435, 56 Pac. 102.

3. The point that the court erred in refusing to strike out the testimony as to the dying declaration of the deceased, on the ground that no sufficient foundation had been laid for its admission, is without merit. The point urged was that there was no sufficient proof that it was made in the belief that every hope of life was gone. The evidence, however, fully showed that the declaration of the deceased concerning the circumstances attending the shooting was made in expectation of death, and after all hope of recovery, if ever entertained, was abandoned.

The dying declaration of the deceased was oral, and in detailing it the witness called for that purpose testified that the deceased stated to him "that the defendant, after shooting him, had walked over to where he was lying and said, 'You damned old cripple! I will finish you now;' that the deceased begged of him not to shoot again, as he would die from the wound he had already received; that he thought the defendant thought he was shot through the body"; and that defendant then left him. The defendant moved to strike out the latter portion, as to what the deceased "thought the defendant thought" as to the shot, which was denied, and he assigns this as error. Assuming that the motion should have been granted, we do not perceive that its refusal was such prejudicial error as would warrant a reversal upon that ground, particularly when it appears that the defendant, in giving his version of the shooting after it occurred, himself stated that when he fired at the deceased he thought he had hit him in the side.

4. The defense interposed being insanity, and evidence on that matter having been introduced in defendant's case in chief, in rebuttal the prosecution called one Dr. John W. Robinson as an expert witness upon that subject. The doctor had been present in court during several days while the witnesses for the defense were giving their evidence as to the insanity of the defendant, heard it all, and had observed the manner and conduct of the defendant during that period. Certain hypothetical questions purporting to be based on the entire evidence in the case having been put to the witness, and he having answered that there was nothing embraced in the statement contained in the question which, in his opinion, indicated that the defendant was insane, the prosecution then directed his attention particularly to various acts and peculiar conduct on the part of the defendant, claimed by the defense to indicate insanity, and he was asked whether, in his opinion, they did so. In answering he said (and here arises the particular error complained of): "It would be to my mind impossible to have all these symptoms present in the same man. It would indicate acute mania, melancholia, homicidal melancholia. or suicidal melancholia—possibly all of those, but not in the same individual. For that reason it is necessary for me to again apply to the judge: Is it necessary for me to believe all the testimony I hear as an expert? Am I compelled to pass my opinion? The Court: On what you deem the truthfullness of the testimony." This was objected to as incompetent, the objection was overruled, and the witness then completed his answer: "If all these conditions existed in the same individual, I would believe the man was certainly insane. As an expert, I do not believe that all these conditions can exist in the same individual." It is claimed by defendant that allowing the witness to pass his opinion on "what he deemed the truthfulness of the testimony" was an invasion of the province of the jury, to whom is committed exclusively the right to judge of the credibility of the witnesses. It is quite apparent, however, that, whether the rule announced by the court was right or not, the subsequent answer of the witness discloses that he did not make any application of it, or, if he did, its application was favorable to the defendant. As we understand his answer, given after the objection was interposed, nothing was said by him from which it could be inferred that the particular credibility of any witness was taken into consideration by him, nor was his answer predicated at all upon an application of the rule announced by the court. Indeed, the first part of his answer was based upon the assumption that all the facts concerning the defendant referred to in the inquiry put to him, as collated from the testimony of the witnesses for the defense, were true, and his answer thereon was favorable to the claim of the defense that the matters referred to indicated that the defendant was insane. Certainly it cannot be said that an assumption by the witness that all the matters relied on by the defendant were true, and a favorable opinion announced on them, could be in any manner prejudicial to him. And the last portion of his answer—that, as an expert, he did not believe that all the conditions testified to could exist in the same individual—is in no respect different from what he had testified to in his answer given previous to the objection interposed, namely, that, to his mind, it was impossible to have all the symptoms recited present in the same individual. There was no discrimination made as to the testimony of any particular witnesses, or as to any particular facts. His opinion was addressed to the condition of the testimony in the case on the part of the defendant, as it disclosed symptoms claimed to be indicative of the insanity of the defendant. This was certainly a matter upon which, as an expert on insanity, he was competent to give his opinion. No exception could be taken seriously if the inquiries had been directed toward ascertaining from the witness, by reason of his particular knowledge of mental diseases, what particular symptoms would be indicative of the presence of a particular phase of insanity—whether mania, melancholia, or other phases—and whether those symptoms which manifested the presence of one phase would be present or absent in another. And this being true, we do not perceive upon what principle an expert in mental diseases should be precluded from giving it as his opinion, upon the general manifestations relied on to support insanity, that, as a principle of medical science, they could not be all present in the same individual.

This disposes of all the points made, and, there being no error in the record, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

HEATON-HOBSON ASSOCIATED LAW OFFICES v. ARPER. (S. F. 2,970.)

PLEADING — DENIALS — SUFFICIENCY — FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

1. In an action for the reasonable value of services, an answer denying that "defendant is indebted to the said plaintiff in the sum of $699, or in any sum," is sufficient to present an issue in the case.

2. A finding, in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, that a certain account was a mutual, open, and current account, instead of a stated account, as alleged in defendant's answer, but further stating that there was no balance due from defendant to plaintiff at the time of the commencement of the action, could not be construed as a finding that all of the allegations of the complaint were true.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by the Heaton-Hobson Associated Law Offices, a corporation, against George W. Arper. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore, O. G. Heaton, and Frank W. Sawyer, for appellant. F. W. Fry and H. M. Owens, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant for his costs. The appeal is upon the judgment roll, without a statement or bill of exceptions.

The appellant's point on the appeal is that the findings are not within any issue of the case. After alleging the assignment of the claim in suit by Frank W. Sawyer to the plaintiff, and that said Frank W. Sawyer was a duly admitted and licensed attorney at law in this state, the complaint avers that at the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, the said Frank W. Sawyer, as such attorney at law, at the special instance and request of said defendant, performed services to and for said defendant in various actions and matters, the reasonable value of which was and is the sum of $699, and that the last service performed was within two years of the bringing of the suit; that in the city and county and state aforesaid said Frank W. Sawyer purchased coal oil of said defendant, and borrowed money of said defendant, all in the sum of $160, and no more; that said account had by and between the said Frank W. Sawyer and said defendant was a mutual, open, and current account, and the balance due from defendant on account of the same is the sum of $539, after deducting all just credits and offsets. Wherefore plaintiff demands judgment against said defendant for the sum of $539, the said alleged balance and costs of suit. The answer denies the said defendant is indebted to the said plaintiff in the sum of $699, or in any sum; and by an amendment added to said answer it is alleged that on the 19th day of August, 1898, Frank W. Sawyer, plaintiff's assignor, was indebted to the defendant in the sum of $16.90 over and above all claims and offsets, and that on said 19th day of August, and subsequently, and while said Sawyer was so indebted to the defendant, an account was stated between said Sawyer and this defendant, and that upon such statement a balance was found to be due and was due from said Sawyer to the defendant, in the sum of $16.90. The pleadings are unverified.

After preliminary finding in reference to the assignment, and that said Frank W. Sawyer was an attorney at law duly admitted and licensed, the court finds as follows: "At the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, said Sawyer, as such attorney, at the request of said defendant, performed services in various actions and matters, the reasonable value of which was and is the sum of $645, and that the last service so performed was within two years next preceding the commencement of this action, and that a portion of said services, of and to the value of $600, was performed with the express understanding and agreement that it should be paid out of certain property or a certain fund, after first deducting the amount due said defendant from one Wilson, and that said fund or property has been and is insufficient to pay to said defendant the amount due him from said Wilson. That in the city and county and state aforesaid said Frank W. Sawyer purchased coal oil of and borrowed money of said defendant, all in the sum of $160, which is now due and payable. That said account had by and between said Frank W. Sawyer and said defendant was a mutual, open, and current account, and at the commencement of said action and at the time of said assignment there was no balance due from said defendant to said Frank W. Sawyer, or to the plaintiff in this action." And as a conclusion of law the court found that the defendant was entitled to judgment against plaintiff for his costs, and judgment was thereupon rendered accordingly.

The answer was sufficient to present an issue in the case. As said in Young v. Rummell, 2 Hill, 478, 38 Am. Dec. 594, quoted with approval by this court in Meredith v. S. Clara Min. Ass'n, 56 Cal. 183: "Although, in point of form, the plea of non assumpsit puts nothing in issue but the making of the promise, it has been long settled that nearly every defense is admissible under that plea which shows that there was not a subsisting cause of action at the time the suit was brought." And in Burris v. People's Ditch Co., 104 Cal. 248, 37 Pac. 922, this court says: "It may be said generally that any allegation in an answer which, if found to be true, necessarily shows that the allegation of the complaint as to the same matter is untrue, is a good traverse, and sufficient as a denial." To the same effect is Loftus v. Fischer, 106 Cal. 616, 39 Pac. 1064. The appellant is mistaken in claiming that the court finds that all the allegations of the complaint are true. The court only finds, as already shown, that the account was a mutual, open, and current account, instead of a stated account, as alleged in the defendant's answer, but further finds that at the commencement of the action there was no balance whatever due from defendant to said Sawyer, or to his assignee, the plaintiff. In Alhambra Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 606, 14 Pac. 383, it is said: "We do not think the court should strain the language of a finding to make out a case of conflict. The finding should be reconciled if it can be reasonably done." See, also, Schultz v. McLean, 93 Cal. 329, 28 Pac. 1053; Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

No such error or defect is here shown as to justify a reversal. The judgment is affirmed.

LUBLINER v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 4,123.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CHARTER—AMENDMENT—ELECTION.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 8, providing that a city charter may be amended at intervals of not less than two years by proposals therefor submitted by the legislative authority of the city at a general or special election, and that, whenever 15 per cent. of the voters shall petition the legislative authority to submit any proposed amendment or amendments for approval, the legislative authority must submit the same, it is discretionary with the legislative authority of the city to call a special election on petition for submission of amendments, or to wait until the next general election.

In Bank. Petition for writ of mandate by Morris Lubliner against the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco. Writ denied.

Henley & Costello, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner, a taxpayer of San Francisco, prays for a writ of mandate to compel the defendants to order a special election for the ratification of certain amendments to the city charter proposed by petition of more than 15 per cent. of the qualified voters of the city. Whether or not it is the duty of the defendants to call a special election at this time depends upon the proper construction of the following clause of section 8 of article 11 of the Constitution: "The charter, so ratified, may be amended at intervals of not less than two years by proposals therefor, submitted by the legislative authority of the city to the qualified electors thereof at a general or special election, held at least forty days after the publication of such proposals for twenty days in a daily newspaper of general circulation in such city, and ratified by a majority of the electors voting thereon, and approved by the legislature as herein provided for the approval of the charter. Whenever fifteen per cent. of the qualified voters of the city shall petition the legislative authority thereof to submit any proposed amendment or amendments to said charter to the qualified voters thereof for approval, the legislative authority thereof must submit the same." We are of the opinion that under this provision of the Constitution the defendants are invested with full discretion to order a special election, or, if they deem that course unadvisable, to wait until the next general election to submit the proposed amendments to a vote of the people.

Writ denied.

BROWNING v. McNEAR. (S. F. 3,081.)*

SALES—ACCEPTANCE OF GOODS—BREACH OF WARRANTY — DAMAGES — SALE BY SAMPLE—AGENCY—UNCOMMUNICATED LIMITATION ON AUTHORITY.

1. A buyer of personalty cannot, after acceptance without protest, and in the absence of fraud or breach of warranty, claim that the goods were damaged when delivered.

2. Where a breach of warranty of the quality of goods sold is discovered after delivery, the buyer may retain the goods, and sue for the breach or set off the damage caused thereby in an action for the price.

3. Where the buyer's agent in the absence of the seller took samples of grain, which he inspected and submitted to the buyer, who, to the seller's knowledge, purchased on the agent's representations that the samples were fair samples, there was no sale by sample, within Civ. Code, § 1766.

4. Under the express provision of Civ. Code, § 1764, a contract of sale does not imply a warranty.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by J. W. Browning against G. W. McNear. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than his demand, he appeals. Reversed.

Crane & Rutledge and Adams & Adams, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover $6,632.27, alleged to be the balance due him for 21,277 sacks of barley sold and delivered by him to defendant at the agreed price of 81¼ cents per 100 pounds. The defendant, who had received, accepted, and used 20,445 sacks thereof, claimed that the original transaction was no more than an executory agreement for the sale of the 21,277 sacks at the price named, and alleged by way of counterclaim that "said barley was to be delivered to said defendant free on board barge at Eddy's Landing, California, in good order and condition, and equal to a sample theretofore shown said defendant by said plaintiff"; that defendant agreed to pay such price for the barley "when so delivered on board barge and in said condition"; that plaintiff delivered only 20,445 sacks; and that the portion so delivered "was, prior to the delivery of said barley upon said barge, seriously damaged by rain and other causes, so that when placed on said barge the same was greatly inferior in quality to said sample and was not merchantable barley"; and that, by reason of said damaged condition of said barley, defendant suffered damages in the sum of $5,000. He therefore asked that judgment be rendered against him for $1,632 only. The trial court found that the agreement between the parties was executory in its nature; that "it was understood by both parties that said grain was purchased and was to be paid for only against shipping receipts to be thereafter furnished by plaintiff"; that at the time of the transaction, October 9, 1899, the barley was in good order and condition, and equal to samples which had been obtained by the purchaser; that both parties "understood * * * that the barley was being purchased by such samples"; that after October 9th, and before the shipping, it was damaged to the extent of $4,182.96 by rain and mud, so that when it was delivered on board the barges it was not in good order and condition, or equal to the samples referred to, and was not merchantable barley; that 832 sacks, weighing 84,864 pounds, have never been delivered, but are still in plaintiff's warehouse. The court deducted from plaintiff's claim the said sum of $4,182.96 on account of the damage done by the rain to the barley delivered, and also the sum of $689.52 for the 832 sacks still in plaintiff's warehouse, and gave judgment in his favor for $1,759.79, interest, and costs of suit. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the question here is, except as to the 832 sacks of barley that are now in plaintiff's warehouse, whether or not the defendant, having accepted and retained and used the property, can, in this action for the agreed price, recover, by way of counterclaim, the amount of damage done to the property by rain between the time of the transaction, October 9, 1899, and the time of the loading of the property upon defendant's barges. If the transaction of October 9, 1899, amounted to an absolute sale of the property, and the title thereto then passed to defendant, concededly plaintiff would in no way be liable for the damage. It appears to be equally clear that if the transaction amounted only to an executory agreement of sale of a specific, identified lot of barley, and the defendant, without protest, accepted, retained, and used the property, without attempt to rescind or offer to return, he cannot, in this action for the price, offset the damage caused by the rain, in the absence of a breach of warranty on the part of the vendor. An acceptance of property by the vendee, in the absence of fraud or breach of warranty on the part of the vendor, renders him liable for the price agreed on, and precludes him from alleging that the property is not of the character and quality called for by the contract. This must necessarily be so, in view of the fact that by such action he affirms the sale, and, in the absence of fraud, his only possible cause of action against the vendor in this connection must arise from some undertaking on the part of the vendor as to the condition or quality of the property. The authorities appear to be without conflict as to this. See 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1092, and cases there cited. It is the law of this state, as it is generally elsewhere, that where there is a warranty, and it is discovered after delivery that there has been a breach thereof, the vendee may retain the property, and bring an action for the breach of the warranty, or may plead the breach in reduction of damages in an action brought by the vendor for the purchase money. Snow v. Holmes, 71 Cal. 142, 149, 11 Pac. 856; Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 573, 579. This rule, which is vigorously asserted by defendant, is not disputed by plaintiff, but its application to this case is dependent upon the question as to whether or not there was a warranty. If there was not a warranty, defendant was not entitled in this action to any offset on account of the damage caused by the rain to the property that he has accepted and retained; and this is true regardless of the question as to whether the transaction of October 9, 1899, amounted to an absolute present sale, or only an executory agreement to sell. It was undoubtedly upon this theory that defendant alleged in his counterclaim that the "barley was to be delivered on board barge * * * in good order and condition, and equal to a sample theretofore shown said defendant by said plaintiff."

Passing for the present the question as to whether or not the transaction of October 9th amounted to an absolute present sale of the barley, we shall consider the question as to warranty. The superior court failed to find that there was any express undertaking on the part of plaintiff as to the condition of the property at the time of the transaction of October 9th, or as to what condition it should be in at the time of delivery. The evidence was without conflict to the effect that there was no such express undertaking on the part of plaintiff. In fact, the only evidence as to any express understanding on the subject was that as to what occurred in the Bank of Colusa on October 9th, when the transaction was being there closed, where, according to the evidence of defendant's agent, Mr. Hickok, who negotiated the purchase, Mr. Harrington, an officer of the bank, said, "Mr. Browning, I suppose you sold this barley, so if it gets wet you would not be the loser?" and Browning replied, "Yes; I have sold the barley to Mr. McNear. They have to look out for the weather;" and Hickok said, "You need not be worrying about the weather, because I think the barge will be there in a day or two and get it, and there is no indication of rain to-day." This evidence is more than corroborated by the evidence of Harrington and Browning, and it would be difficult, under such circumstances, to find that there was any express agreement or warranty on the part of plaintiff as to the condition in which the barley should be at the time of delivery. There is no claim that there was any express warranty as to its condition at the time of the transaction.

The question then remains as to whether there was any implied warranty. In this connection, the defendant relies upon the finding of the trial court to the effect that at the time of the transaction the barley was equal to samples which had been obtained by the purchaser, and that both parties understood that the barley was being purchased by such samples, as showing a sale by sample, and therefore an implied warranty, under section 1766, Civ. Code, which provides, in accord with the general rule, that "one who sells or agrees to sell goods by sample, thereby warrants the bulk to be equal to the sample." If we concede that the finding of the court above referred to is a finding that the plaintiff agreed to sell this barley by sample, within the meaning of this section of the Code, it must be held that the finding is without support in the evidence. No sample of this barley was at any time exhibited or furnished by the plaintiff. The barley lay in plaintiff's yard, and the defendant's agent, Hickok, had examined it carefully, and on two occasions samples were taken for him by another party under his directions; and so far as appears, these samples were taken without the presence of plaintiff, and without his knowledge. It does not even appear that plaintiff ever saw the samples, Hickok stating that he was not positive that he ever showed them to him. All that plaintiff knew at the time of the transaction was that it was customary for grain buyers to sample for themselves all grain that was for sale; that Hickok had in fact selected and taken, for himself, samples of his barley, had sent a set of the same to his principal, the defendant, and retained a set in his office; and that McNear was acting entirely upon the representations of his agent, Hickok, to the effect that the samples taken and forwarded by such agent were in fact fair samples of the bulk of the barley. There was no act of any kind on the part of plaintiff conveying the slightest intimation on his part as to the correctness of the samples. It would be a novel application of the rule of warranty arising from sale by sample to hold that a vendor is to be held responsible for a sample that he has never seen or exhibited, and concerning which he has made no representation, and which was selected and taken by the purchaser himself, or his agent, upon an inspection of the property. On a sale by sample the law implies the warranty that the bulk is equal to the sample, upon the theory that by his acts and representations the vendor assures the vendee that such is the fact. It says that, where one makes or agrees to make a sale by sample, such act on his part is a representation that the bulk is equal to the sample—an affirmation that the specimen exhibited is a fair sample of the bulk of the commodity. Gurney v. A. & G. W. Ry. Co., 58 N. Y. 364. The sale by sample contemplated by the law is one the circumstances of which indicate something in the way of representation by the vendor to the effect that a sample exhibited fairly represents the bulk. To constitute a sale by sample, it must appear that the parties "contracted solely in reference to the sample exhibited; that they mutually understood that they were dealing with the sample as an agreement or understanding that the bulk of the commodity corresponded with it." Beirne v. Dord, 5 N. Y. 95, 55 Am. Dec. 321; Benjamin on Sales, American note (7th Ed.) p. 685; 15th Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 1227.

While the question as to whether the circumstances of a transaction show a sale by sample is, of course, a question of fact for the court or jury, there must be evidence fairly sufficient to support a finding of such a sale, or it cannot stand. Taking the evidence in this case in the light most favorable to defendant, it discloses no more than that the plaintiff knew that the defendant, through his agent, had personally inspected the barley, and, for the purpose of enabling himself to properly exercise his judgment as to the quality thereof, had himself, through his agent, selected and taken samples, and that he was basing his conclusion as to the quality of the barley and its value upon the result of such inspection and the samples selected by himself. This mere knowledge of plaintiff as to the means used by defendant in determining as to the quality of the barley, unaccompanied by any act of his, could not make the sale one by sample. It was clearly a case where the defendant relied entirely upon his own examination, and took such precautions as he deemed essential to satisfy himself as to the quality of the property, without assistance of any kind from the vendor.

It is further contended that, if there was not an agreement to sell by sample, there was an implied warranty that the goods should be sound and in merchantable condition when delivered upon the barge. The theory appears to be that this is the rule as to all executory sales, as distinguished from the rule applicable to executed sales. In this state the question as to whether there is an implied warranty must depend upon the provisions of our Civil Code. Section 1764 thereof provides that, "except as prescribed by this article, a mere contract of sale or agreement to sell does not imply a warranty." See Sutro v. Rhodes, 92 Cal. 123, 28 Pac. 98. Except for the section relative to sale by sample, admittedly no provision of that article of the Code is applicable to this case, unless it be section 1771. That section provides that "one who sells or agrees to sell merchandise inaccessible to the examination of the buyer, thereby warrants that it is sound and merchantable." This section makes no distinction between executed sales and agreements to sell, and simply means what it says, viz., that if at the time of the sale, or the agreement to sell, the merchandise is inaccessible to the examination of the buyer, the warranty that it is sound and merchantable will be implied. It can have no application to this case, for the simple reason that this barley was not only not inaccessible to the examination of the buyer, but was, as a matter of fact, inspected and examined by him, through his agent, prior to the making of the agreement. It must therefore be held that there was no express or implied warranty on the part of plaintiff, or any undertaking on his part, as to the condition of the property at the time of delivery, and it follows that defendant was not entitled to set off against the agreed price the damage caused by the rain to such of the barley as was received and accepted and used by him.

Upon the question as to whether the transaction of October 9, 1899, amounted to an absolute sale of the barley, there is some doubt as to whether the evidence supports the finding of the court. We do not deem it necessary to discuss this question, in view of the fact that the judgment and order must be reversed for the reasons already stated. Whether or not the parties, plaintiff and Hickok, representing defendant, then agreed upon a present transfer of the barley is a question of fact, the determination of which may well be left to the superior court upon another trial. It is proper to say, however, that the mere fact that payment for the grain was expressly deferred to the time of shipment, and was to be made only as against shipping receipts, does not conclusively establish that the purchase was against shipping receipts only, or that there was no agreement for a present transfer of the property. It is also proper to say that, in the determination of the question as to what the agreement actually was, limitations as to the general transaction privately placed by defendant upon the general authority of the agent, and not communicated to plaintiff, cannot, under the circumstances of this case, play any part.

The status of the 832 sacks of barley that have not been taken by defendant from plaintiff's warehouse must depend upon the determination of the question as to whether the transaction of October 9, 1899, was an absolute sale. If the title thereto then passed to defendant, he is liable in this action for the agreed price; otherwise, not.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

WILLIAMS, BELSER & CO. v. ROWELL.

(S. F. 3,825.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—CONSTRUCTION OF SEWER—"IMPROVEMENTS."

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, giving a lien to any one improving a lot at the request of the owner, a contractor who has, under contract with the property owners along a street, constructed a sewer therein, has a lien both for the portion of the sewer which is a part of the general system and for the branch sewers.

Shaw and Angellotti, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Williams, Belser & Co. against Carrie L. Rowell. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. C. Bates, for appellants. John W. Stetson and Jas. G. Quinn, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. In this case the superior court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and, upon the plaintiffs declining to amend, entered a final judgment for the defendant, from which plaintiffs appeal.

It appears from the complaint that the board of trustees of the town of Emeryville adopted a plan or system of sewers for the town, and that the plaintiffs entered into a written contract with the defendant and other lot owners by which they agreed to furnish the material and construct the whole system, together with the necessary Y branches, manholes, lamp holes, etc., according to the plans and specifications of the town engineer as approved by the board of trustees, and to the satisfaction of the engineer and said board; that the defendant and other owners of lots upon their part agreed in consideration of the performance of this contract to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of 45 cents per front foot according to their frontages set down with their signatures to the contract and representing the amounts of their individual frontage directly along the lines of the proposed sewers. It was stipulated that said rate of 45 cents should include all manholes, lamp holes, inspectors' and engineers' fees, and all incidental expenses, and also all work on crossings. But the respective lot owners were to pay for as many Y branches as they indicated in connection with their signatures at the rate of $1.50 each. The defendant was the owner of a lot fronting 129.57 feet on Auburn avenue and the same length on Lulu avenue, and she, as the owner of said lot, agreed to pay for the work done under the contract, $58.18 for 129.6 feet front at 45 cents, and $4.50 for three Y branches; or a total amount of $62.68. The plaintiffs duly performed their contract, but defendant has failed to pay, and they seek in this action to enforce a lien against her lot for her share of the agreed price of the work and for costs, etc.

Defendant's demurrer was general for want of facts and lack of jurisdiction, and, if it was rightly held by the superior court that plaintiffs had no lien to be foreclosed, the amount claimed under the contract was too small to give the superior court jurisdiction. The main, and in fact the only, question, therefore, which we have to decide, is whether there was a lien. It is true the respondent makes some claim that the complaint does not show that the sewer was constructed in front of her lot, and it is true that in this respect the complaint is ambiguous and uncertain, but this was a defect that should have been pointed out by special demurrer. As against a general demurrer for want of facts we think the complaint may be held to show with sufficient certainty that the sewer was laid for 129.6 feet in front of the defendant's lot, and that three Y branches were placed in that part of the sewer for her accommodation. (Though, as to this matter of Y branches, it is immaterial whether the complaint shows a lien or not, they were separately provided for by a severable clause in the contract, and, if the complaint established a lien for that part of the contract price determined by the frontage, it was error to sustain the demurrer.)

We think that the superior court erred in holding that there was no lien. By section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure it is provided that "any person who, at the request of the reputed owner of any lot in any incorporated city or town, grades, fills in, or otherwise improves the same, or the streets or sidewalk in front of or adjoining the same, or constructs any areas, or vaults, or cellars, or rooms, under said sidewalks, or makes any improvements in connection therewith, has a lien upon said lot for his work done and materials furnished." A system of sewers is an improvement to the lots within the sewer district. This is clearly recognized in the provisions of the Vrooman act, relating to sewers. From its first enactment, in 1885 (St. 1885, p. 161, c. 153, § 24), through all its amendments (St. 1887, p. 148, c. 130; St. 1889, p. 170, c. 151, St. 1891, p. 206, c. 147, and St. 1893, p. 172, c. 144, passim), city councils have been fully empowered to order the construction of sewers in defiance of any protest of property owners, and at their expense. They have power to define sewer districts, including the property in which in their judgment will be benefited—i. e., enhanced in value—by the proposed work, and to assess the whole cost, including all incidental expenses, upon the property so benefited, thereby creating a lien upon each lot for the amount of its assessment. St. 1885, p. 162, c. 153, § 27. The power to subject each lot within an assessment district to a lien for its due proportion of the cost of street or sewer work rests solely upon the assumption that the lot is improved—i. e., enhanced in value —in an amount at least equal to its assessment; and accordingly it is held that the lot alone is liable, the owner being free of any personal liability. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 254. There is no difference in this respect between the construction of a sewer and the improvement of a street except in the wider latitude of discretion given to the city council in determining what property will be benefited, and the mode of apportioning the cost. Assessment according to frontage in this and other cases is only a mode, more or less equitable, according to circumstances, of making the apportionment; but, whatever the mode adopted, the several assessments, if lawfully made, represent in legal contemplation the improvement to the several lots, and are a lien thereon.

Now, in this case it appears that the trustees of Emeryville had adopted a system of sewers for the town upon plans and specifications recommended by the town engineer. This manifested their intention to order the work, let contracts, and assess the cost of the whole work, with all its incidents, ratably upon the lots within the town. In this situation the defendant and other lot owners agreed to assess themselves for their ratable share of the expense. Knowing that they would be subjected to no personal liability if the improvement was carried out by proceedings in invitum, but that their lots would be charged with the expense according to an assessment to be made, they voluntarily entered into an agreement by which they assessed themselves for what each must have deemed his fair share of the expense; or, in other words, the amount of the improvement to his particular lot. It is true that it is not shown that all lot owners in the town joined in this agreement, and it is highly probable that some of them did not. In cases of this kind there are generally found a few individuals who are willing to shift their own burdens to other shoulders, and no doubt the parties to this contract took that into consideration. They may be trusted, however, to have concluded that on the whole it would cost each of them less to have the work done under this contract than to have it carried out under compulsory proceedings by the board of trustees. They were looking out for their own interests, and no doubt they took proper care of them. They secured the improvement of their lots upon terms which they voluntarily accepted in place of the terms which they apprehended might be imposed upon them. This being so, they are brought within the letter and spirit of the law above quoted. The plaintiffs improved their lots at their request, and their claim of lien is for no more than the agreed value of the improvement. The fact that the contract price included the general and incidental expenses of the system, as well as the cost of the branch sewers in front of the respective lots, is no impeachment of this statement. When a system of sewers is constructed under the orders of a city council in the usual way, all these expenses are apportioned to the several lots, and become a part of the whole amount secured by the lien. And justly and reasonably so. A branch sewer laid in front of a lot, but unconnected with a main or outfall sewer, would be simply a nuisance. To make it a real improvement it must be connected with other parts of the system, and the main sewers must be furnished with the means of cleansing, ventilation, and inspection, such as manholes, lamp holes, etc. Street crossings must also be restored where the sewers are laid, and the labor and services of the official engineers and inspectors must be compensated by the contractor. These costs appertaining to the whole system, and essential to its existence and efficiency, must be apportioned, and whether they are assessed by the superintendent of streets in the usual way, or apportioned by voluntary agreement of the lot owners according to frontage, or by some other method, the share apportioned to each lot is to be deemed a part of the price of the improvement to that lot, and, if so, it is a lien thereon. The complaint, in our opinion, sustains the claim of lien, and the superior court had jurisdiction to enforce it.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. Section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure is a part of the chapter of that Code relating to mechanics' liens. The provisions conferring a lien upon a lot for work done in connection therewith in the adjoining street were first incorporated into this section by the amendment made in 1885. There is much ground for the contention that there was no intention by this amendment to give a lien upon the lot for any work except for private improvements made for the benefit of the particular lot. It is a great stretch of construction to hold it applicable to public improvements, such as a public sewer composing part of a general system for the town or city. But for the purposes of this case it may be conceded that in a proper case, where the owner of a lot requests the construction of a public sewer in the street abutting upon the lot, the lot would, under this section, be subject to a lien for its proportional part, according to frontage, of the total cost of the sewer constructed at the owner's request. If by the complaint in this action it had been made to appear either that all of the owners of lots fronting upon the proposed system of public sewers had joined in the contract employing the plaintiffs to construct the sewer, each agreeing to pay his proportion of the cost of the entire work, or that the defendant and the other property owners who did join in the contract had each agreed to pay only that portion of the entire cost of the system which would be properly chargeable to his particular lot upon an apportionment of the total cost according to frontage, then it would follow, under this construction of the section, that each lot would be subject to a lien for such proportional amount of the cost. But that is not this case. It is alleged that the defendant and other property owners employed the plaintiffs to construct the sewer according to the plans and specifications adopted by the town trustees, and to the satisfaction of the town engineer and board of supervisors; but it does not appear that the property owners thus employing the plaintiffs comprised all the owners of lots abutting upon the proposed system of sewers. It further appears that each agreed to pay for the construction of the proposed system a sum equal to 45 cents per front foot upon his particular frontage, but it is not alleged that this sum was the proportional part of the entire cost which would be chargeable to the particular lot if an apportionment were made according to frontage. There can be no presumption that such was the case. It must be con ceded that, if these facts are necessary to give the plaintiffs a lien for the amount they claim, it was incumbent upon them to show them by proper allegations in the complaint. The result is that, so far as appears from the case made by the complaint, the lien is imposed upon the lot of the defendant for a portion of the total cost of the system of sewers, which bears no relation whatever to the cost of the portion of the sewer in front of the lot, or to its proportional part of the entire cost estimated according to frontage. The mere fact that the contract provided for a certain amount per front foot is of no consequence to the proposition. The sum agreed to be paid by each was entirely arbitrary, and, so far as it has any bearing upon the merits of the question, it could as well have been determined by any other method, or by stating the exact sum which each agreed to pay without regard either to frontage or to the total cost. In any system of sewers for a town there would usually be numerous branch sewers entering into the main sewer at different points along the line, and intended to serve the purpose of drainage for lots fronting upon the side streets. It does not appear from this complaint whether the defendant's lot abutted upon the street in which the main sewer was laid, or upon some side street, upon which only a branch was laid. But in either case branch sewers which did not abut upon this lot would be of no benefit whatever to the lot. As there is nothing to show that such was not the case, and as, under ordinary circumstances, there would be such branch sewers, it must be presumed in this case that such were in existence. A lien is therefore charged against the defendant's lot for a sum of which a part, at least, is for that part of the sewer made for the benefit of other lots and for the city in general. The effect of the decision is that in a case where a few lot owners contract for the construction of a public sewer, or system of sewers, for the town, and agree to pay some part of the contract price, there will be a lien imposed by this section, in favor of the contractor, upon the lots owned by each contracting owner, for the amount which he has agreed to pay upon the contract price, regardless of whether such amount is or is not the ratable proportion of the total cost chargeable to his lots, and regardless of whether it really goes in part to pay for portions of the sewer beneficial solely to other lots than his own. It would thus practically impose upon his lot a mortgage for a benefit conferred upon another. In my opinion, section 1191 was not intended to have such effect.

In so far as the majority opinion assumes that the amount each owner agreed to pay in this case was his ratable share of the whole expense apportioned by frontage, it is without support from the facts alleged.

LIMBERG v. GLENWOOD LUMBER CO.

(S. F. 3,056.)

SERVANT'S INJURIES—EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY—HARMLESS ERROR—LAW OF THE CASE.

1. Where, on appeal in an action for injuries to a servant, it was held that he had assumed the risk, such decision as to the effect of the evidence became the law of the case, and was binding on the appellate court on the next appeal, where the evidence was the same.

2. Where, in an action for injuries to a servant employed as a teamster, the only negligence complained of was that the lines were too short and the wagon without a seat, and the issue was assumption of risk, evidence that there was no brake on the wagon was immaterial.

3. Where, in an action for injuries to a servant employed as a teamster, it appeared that he had assumed the risk arising from shortness of the lines and the absence of a seat, there was no prejudicial error in a ruling of the trial court excluding evidence tending to show negligence on the part of the master in furnishing such lines and no seat.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Albert Limberg against the Glenwood Lumber Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Black, for appellant. D. W. Burchard and Joseph R. Patton, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries suffered by plaintiff while in the employ of defendant as a teamster; the claim of the plaintiff being that such injuries were caused by the negligence of his employer, in that the appliances furnished him with which to do the work were defective. There have been two trials of the case. The first trial resulted in a judgment for plaintiff. On appeal by the defendant from such judgment, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, the judgment and order were reversed, and the cause remanded. Limberg v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 127 Cal. 598, 60 Pac. 176, 49 L. R. A. 33. Upon this trial the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial. He contends that the trial court erred in granting the motion for a nonsuit, and also in excluding certain testimony.

1. We are of the opinion that the ruling of the trial court upon the motion for nonsuit is sufficiently specified as an error of law in the statement on motion for a new trial to enable us to review it. That ruling was, however, undoubtedly correct. Upon the former appeal it was held, after a full discussion of the evidence, that the defendant's motion for a nonsuit made on the trial should have been granted, upon the ground that the evidence for the plaintiff clearly showed that, even if it were conceded that the defendant was negligent in not furnishing proper appliances, the plaintiff had, with full knowledge of the defects, voluntarily continued to work therewith for several months prior to the accident, and that he had thus assumed the risk of working therewith. The alleged defects complained of were that the lines furnished for the driving of the horses were too short, and that there was no seat on the wagon. It is unnecessary to discuss the evidence given on behalf of plaintiff on the second trial, further than to say that it is substantially the same, so far as is material to the question of the assumption of the risk of working with the appliances furnished is concerned, as the evidence given on the first trial, and discussed by this court on the former appeal. The decision of this court upon such appeal as to the effect of this evidence has become the law of this case, and is binding upon this court on this appeal. It is suggested by appellant that the evidence on the second trial showed "a new element of negligence of defendant, in not having a brake on the wagon." This was an "element of negligence" not embraced within the issues made by the pleadings; the complaint specifying with great particularity the only negligence complained of, viz., that the lines were too short, and that the wagon was without a seat. The plaintiff's knowledge as to the brake was apparently the same as his knowledge as to lines and seat, for he testified, "There never was a seat on that wagon, nor a brake." We are unable to see how the evidence as to the want of brake in any way affected the question as to whether plaintiff had assumed the risk of working with the short lines on a wagon without a seat.

2. As to the rulings of the court sustaining objections to certain questions asked by defendant, we find no warrant for disturbing the judgment or order denying a new trial. The question asked the witness Sanor, as to whether it was usual or customary, in the business of hauling lumber with four horses, to have a wagon equipped as this wagon was, and with lines such as were here used, was material, if at all, only to the question of negligence; and, if it be conceded that the proposed evidence was competent, the ruling of the court rejecting the same could not have prejudicially affected plaintiff's rights, as it could not affect the determination of the question as to whether plaintiff had assumed the risk of working with the appliances furnished. It being determined that he did assume such risk, it is immaterial whether or not there was, in fact, negligence on the part of defendant. The same may be said as to the question asked the plaintiff as to whether or not, if he had had lines long enough to set back on the load, he would have been pulled off the load by the lines, which went, at most, to the question of negligence and the cause of the accident. There was, however, no error in the ruling of the court sustaining the objection to this question. We are unable to see the materiality of the question asked the plaintiff as to what use he could have made of a brake if there had been one on the wagon.

The order is affirmed.

BLUNT v. FIDELITY & CASUALTY CO.

(S. F. 2,973.)*

ACCIDENT INSURANCE—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY— INJURIES RECEIVED WHILE INSANE—CONSTRUCTION OF EXEMPTION CLAUSE.

1. An insurance company may insert in its policy clauses not mentioned in the application.

2. A provision in an accident policy that it shall not cover injuries received while assured is insane is lawful.

3. In an accident policy, a provision that "in case of injuries * * * intentionally inflicted on himself by the insured, or inflicted on himself or received by him while insane," the company shall not be liable, exempts the insurer from liability for injuries to insured while insane, whether intentionally inflicted or not.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Sarah Blunt against the Fidelity & Casualty Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Morehouse, Kooser & Alexander, for appellant. A. E. Shaw, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The suit is upon a policy of insurance, of the kind usually designated as an "accident policy," issued by the defendant to John P. Blunt for the term of 12 months. It provided that, if death should result from an injury within 90 days from the time the injury was received, the defendant would pay to the wife of the insured, if she survived him, the sum of $5,000. The fourth clause of the policy was as follows: "(4) In case of injuries fatal or otherwise intentionally inflicted upon himself by the assured; or inflicted upon himself or received by him while insane, the measure of this company's liability shall be a sum equal to the premium paid, the same being agreed upon as in full liquidation of all claims under this policy." At the end of 12 months the policy was renewed for the same period, and at the end of that time it was again renewed. During the last year of the insurance, John P. Blunt became insane, and was committed to the Mendocino State Hospital. During the term of insurance, and while insane, he fell against a steam radiator in the hospital, and thereby received injuries from which, within 90 days thereafter, he died. The plaintiff is the surviving wife of the assured. Before the action was begun, the defendant tendered her the full amount of the premium paid, and in its answer it offered to allow judgment for that sum in favor of the plaintiff. The court found these facts, and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum tendered, and against the plaintiff, in favor of the defendant, for its costs.

In contracts of insurance, as in other contracts, the rights of the parties are determined from the terms of the contract, so far as it is lawful. The contract here in question consisted of the application for insurance made and delivered by the assured to the defendant, and the policy of insurance made and delivered by the defendant to the assured. It cannot be conceded that the company was not at liberty to insert conditions in the policy which were not mentioned in the application. The application contained the affirmative stipulations and warranties made by the assured, and the policy contained the stipulations and limitations made by the insurer. The two together constitute the contract. If the policy of the company, which was issued by the company upon receipt and approval of the application, had contained any clause to which the assured did not agree, he, of course, would have been at liberty to reject it, and either demand a rescission and return of the premium paid, or insist upon a policy without the clause to which he did not assent. But when he received the policy and accepted it without objection, and especially when, as the record here shows, with the policy in his possession, he twice renewed it for an additional year, neither he nor the beneficiary can with good reason claim that there is anything contained in it to which he did not fully consent and agree. The fourth clause above quoted is not unlawful, and it cannot be eliminated on the ground that it is not expressly referred to in the application. The effect of this clause is that the defendant did not agree to insure the policy holder against injuries from accidents received by him during such part of the time covered thereby as the assured should be insane, except to the amount of the premium paid; and this regardless of the question whether the injuries were inflicted by himself, intentionally or otherwise, or were received by him from some other cause. Insurance during such insanity, except to that extent, was simply not a part of the contract; and the agreement, in that contingency, was that the company should be liable only for a sum equal to the premium paid. Language could not express this idea more clearly than it is expressed in the policy. The courts have always construed in favor of the assured every ambiguity and uncertainty in contracts of insurance. But where the words are clear and free from uncertainty, and the meaning plain, the contract as made by the parties is beyond the power of the courts to change by a forced construction. There was good reason for the insertion of the clause. A sane man will naturally and instinctively protect himself from injury, while if insane he might unconsciously expose himself thereto. It is to be presumed that, in fixing the amount to be paid as a premium, the company took into consideration its proposed exemption from full liability during such insanity, if it should occur, and reduced the premium accordingly. The assured received the benefit of this clause in the reduced amount of the premium, and hence the contract cannot be deemed inequitable or unfair.

The appellant contends that the fourth clause should be construed by interpolating the word "intentionally" a second time, making it read thus: "In case of injuries fatal or otherwise intentionally inflicted upon himself by the assured; or intentionally inflicted upon himself or received by him while insane," etc. It is obvious that this would be an unfair and forced construction. The natural inference from the context is that the element of intent was designedly omitted with respect to injuries happening to him while insane, so that in case of injury while he was insane, either consciously or unconsciously inflicted by himself, or received by him while in that condition, whether by reason of his consequent inability to avoid injury, or from causes entirely apart from his insanity, the company should be liable only to the amount of the premium. The language used seems well adapted to convey this meaning, and it is apparent that the word "intentionally" was purposely omitted from the second clause in order to avoid any question on that point.

The cases holding that a provision exempting an insurance company from liability if the assured shall commit suicide while insane does not give exemption where the suicide is the result of the insanity go upon the theory that the use of the term "suicide," or other similar description of the mode of death, implies a conscious and voluntary self-destruction, and not an act impelled by the insane delusion, and in that sense involuntary. They do not apply to this policy, which makes the insane condition, and not the volition of the assured, the test of nonliability.

STOCKTON v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF SAN JOSE et al. (S. F. 3,016).

SCHOOLS—TEACHERS—DISMISSAL — POWERS OF BOARD OF EDUCATION—LIMITATIONS OF AUTHORITY.

1. Under St. 1897, p. 621, c. 15, art. 9, § 5, authorizing the board of education of a city to employ, pay, and dismiss teachers, and section

14, p. 624, of said article, providing that teachers elected to permanent positions, who are reported upon favorably by a majority of the committee on classification, shall retain their positions for the ensuing year without re-election, and shall be removed only for cause, the board of education has the right to remove any teachers, including those elected to permanent positions, at will, except such teachers holding permanent positions as have been favorably reported upon by the committee on classification.

2. Nor does a further provision of section 5 of said article and act, to the effect that no election of a teacher shall be construed as a contract, either as to the duration of time or amount of wages, give the teacher any greater right or security from removal, but the object of such provision is to protect the city against a claim that a teacher is entitled to serve for any particular time or at any particular compensation.

3. Under St. 1897, pp. 621, 624, c. 15, art. 9, §§ 5, 14, empowering the board of education of a city to dismiss teachers, but providing that teachers elected to permanent positions, and reported upon favorably by a majority of the committee on classification, shall be removed only for cause, any irregularity in the proceedings of the classification committee cannot avail a teacher who has not been favorably reported by that committee, in proceedings to regain her position.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; M. H. Hyland, Judge.

Application by Fannie Stockton for a writ of mandate against the board of education of the city of San Jose and others. From a judgment denying the application, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John G. Jury and D. M. Delmas, for appellant. H. L. Partridge, F. C. Jacobs, and J. R. Patton, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal, on the judgment roll, from a judgment denying the application of plaintiff for a writ of mandate compelling defendants to admit plaintiff to the use and enjoyment of her alleged right to act as a teacher in the school department of the city of San Jose.

The plaintiff has never held a "city" or "city and county" certificate, and therefore does not come within the provisions of section 1793, Pol. Code, providing that holders of such certificates, when elected, shall be dismissed only for insubordination or other causes. No other provision of the general state law applicable to common schools is cited as precluding the board of education of the city of San Jose from removing plaintiff at its pleasure, and plaintiff bases her claim entirely upon certain provisions of the charter of such city as originally adopted, and as they existed until amended in the year 1901 (St. 1897, p. 592, c. 15); contending that she was regularly elected a "permanent teacher" of the school department, within the meaning of such provisions, and that she has never been legally removed from that position.

In view of the fact that the San Jose charter provisions relative to the status of teachers, and the right and manner of their removal, were materially amended in 1901 (St. 1901, p. 957, c. 37), the question as to the proper construction of the original charter provisions is no longer of general interest, and affects only those who, like this plaintiff, may have been retired thereunder.

As originally adopted, the charter provided, in section 5 of article 9 (page 621), that the powers and duties of the board of education are as follows: "Third. To employ, pay and dismiss teachers, janitors, school census marshals, and such persons as may be necessary to carry into effect the powers and duties of the board, and to fix, alter, allow, and order paid their salaries or compensation, * * * provided, that no election of a teacher or other person employed by the board shall be construed as a contract, either as to the duration of time or amount of wages of such person." It further provided for a standing committee on classification, to consist of two members of the board of education and the city superintendent, the duties of the members of which were, among other things, to make themselves thoroughly acquainted by personal inspection with the work of every employé of the board, and to make a written report to the board at least 20 days before the close of any school year, and to therein "distinctly state what employees shall, in their opinion, be retained for the ensuing year." Section 13, art. 9, of charter. It was further provided by section 14 of article 9 (page 624) as follows, namely: "No teacher shall be elected or appointed to a position in the school department, except in technical or industrial schools that may be established, or as special teacher of some branch, who does not hold a California primary or grammar grade certificate, in full force; and no one shall be elected to a permanent position who has not taught successfully at least one school year in the schools of the city. All teachers thus elected to permanent positions in the department, who are reported upon favorably by a majority of the committee on classification, shall retain their positions for the ensuing year without re-election, and shall be removed only for cause. No teacher shall be removed from a position held in the schools of the city, except by the votes of four members of the board. * * *" These are the only provisions that at all bear upon plaintiff's case.

The findings show that on June 2, 1897, the classification committee, by its written report, recommended that plaintiff be retained in her position as a teacher for the ensuing school year. She entered upon the discharge of her duty as such teacher, and continued to act until the close of the school year, June 30, 1898. The committee did not report favorably upon her for the ensuing year, and she ceased to act as a teacher until December 5, 1898, when she was elected "as a regular teacher in the school department," and acted as such until the end of the school year, June 30, 1899. The classification committee recommended her for employment as a teacher for the school year ending June 30, 1900, and she, pursuant to that employment, entered upon her duties as a teacher, and continued to act until the last-named date. The majority of the classification committee did not report favorably upon her for the ensuing school year, and the report excluding her, by failing to report favorably upon her, was regularly adopted by the board of education, and she was not reelected. Since that time she has not been recognized as a teacher by the board, and has not been allowed to perform any of the duties of a teacher. In addition to these specific findings, the trial court found that plaintiff never was "elected to a permanent position, or employed as a permanent teacher in the school department of the city of San Jose."

The charter, as it then stood, nowhere defined the term "permanent position" or "permanent teacher." It made a distinction between such teachers and others, and by section 14 of article 9 sought to confer some advantage as to tenure upon those who had been elected to "permanent positions," and had thus become "permanent teachers" of the department. But that advantage, as we read the charter provisions, was the advantage of only such permanent teachers as were reported upon favorably by a majority of the committee on classification at the close of any school year, and simply gave to them the right to hold their positions for another school year, without re-election by the board, unless removed "for cause." In other words, there was no "permanent position" in the broad sense that one elected to such a position continued to hold indefinitely, in the absence of removal for cause, but the position was "permanent" only so long as a majority of the classification committee at the close of each school year reported favorably upon the incumbent. In the absence of such a favorable report, the board of education, without other cause, had the right to remove the incumbent.

Whatever right the incumbent of a "permanent position" had to continue in the position, notwithstanding the express desire and act of the board of education to the contrary, must be found in that provision of section 14 of article 9, which declared that "all teachers thus elected to permanent positions in the department, who are reported upon favorably by a majority of the committee on classification, shall retain their positions for the ensuing year without re-election, and shall be removed only for cause." If that provision had not been incorporated in the charter, there could be no doubt that the board of education could remove any teacher, permanent or otherwise, at will, by a vote of four members of the board. This provision was the only limitation on that absolute power that was contained in the charter. By its express terms, the limitation was applicable not to all those who had been merely elected to permanent positions, but only to those who, having been so elected, were favorably reported upon by a majority of the committee on classification at the close of a school year. It gave to those who were so favorably reported upon the right to continue in their positions for another school year, unless removed for cause. Such is the plain reading of the limitation upon the power of the board to remove at will, and the plaintiff, not having been favorably reported upon by the committee on classification at the close of the school year in 1900, did not come within its provisions.

The provision of subdivision 3 of section 5 of article 9 of the charter, "that no election of a teacher or other person employed by the board shall be construed as a contract, either as to the duration of time or amount of wages of such person," in no degree assists the plaintiff. The object of this provision was clearly to protect the city against the claim of any one who might contend that by reason of his election he was entitled to serve for any particular time or at any particular compensation. One elected to a position in the department acquired, as claimed by plaintiff, a "status" thereby, but it was a status that could be terminated by the board of education at any time, subject to the limitations already mentioned.

It is contended that the findings show an irregularity in the proceedings of the classification committee, in that the majority report had not been adopted at any formal meeting of the committee, it having been prepared and signed by a majority, and, without prior consultation with the third member, was presented to him for signature. A sufficient answer to this contention is that, in the absence of a favorable report of the committee as to an incumbent, there is no limitation on the power of the board to remove the incumbent.

In view of our conclusion as to the proper construction of the charter provisions, it is not necessary to determine whether the specific findings show that plaintiff was a "permanent teacher," nor is it necessary to consider the suggestion of defendants to the effect that the charter provisions are in conflict with the general state law relative to common schools.

FREY et al. v. VIGNIER et al. (S. F. 2,952.)*

APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—REVIEW—WITNESSES—ACTION AGAINST EXECUTOR—TESTIMONY OF ASSIGNOR—PLEADING—AMENDMENTS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. The sufficiency of a complaint is not reviewable on appeal from an order denying a new trial, but only on appeal from the judgment.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, provides that an assignor shall not be a witness "on a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person as to any matter or fact occurring before the death of deceased." Held, that where one of several lessees of a building used for milling purposes assigned his interest to the others, and after the building was damaged by fire the landlord agreed to reconstruct a kiln used in the mill, in an action against his executor by the tenants for breach of the contract the assignor was a competent witness.

3. In an action for breach of contract, an amendment of the complaint by inserting the words "for a valuable consideration" was not a statement of a new cause of action.

4. A landlord, after the damage of the leased factory by fire, agreed to repair a certain kiln in the factory, and in an action by the tenants for a breach of the contract plaintiff amended the complaint by striking out the allegation that defendant "repaired said premises and property" except the kiln. Held, that no new cause of action was averred by such amendment.

5. Where a building leased for milling purposes was damaged by fire, and the landlord agreed to repair the premises and rebuild a certain kiln used in the building if the tenants would rebuild the parts of the machinery damaged, the promise and performance of their premise by the tenants was a sufficient consideration for the promise to rebuild the kiln.

6. After plaintiff had amended his complaint, defendant moved for leave to amend his answer by making a special traverse of each of the material allegations in the complaint, but the motion was denied. Held, that on appeal it was not necessary to inquire whether the court was correct in ruling that the original answer sufficiently set forth the defense of defendant, it appearing that afterwards, and after all amendments to the complaint had been made, defendant filed an amended answer, in which he had an opportunity to deny, and did deny, all the material averments of the complaint as amended.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by John Frey and others, doing business as the Monarch Milling Company, against A. Vignier and another, as executor and executrix of the will of Francis T. Eisen, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. M. Jennings, for appellants. Edward J. McCutchen and Page, McCutchen & Eells, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. Judgment went in the court below for plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial. There is no appeal from the judgment. The action was originally against Francis T. Eisen to recover damages against him for his failure to replace a certain kiln used for drying oats and other grains, which kiln had been in a house leased by him to plaintiffs and their predecessors, and had been destroyed by fire. During the pendency of the action Eisen died, and his executor and executrix were substituted as defendants. The transcript presents the difficulty of discovering what questions are involved, rather than the difficulty of determining the questions when discovered. The court, in addition to formal matters, found these facts: On October 7, 1887, said Eisen leased to the present plaintiff Frey and Jesse Newbauer and J. C. Holloway, who then composed the firm of the Monarch Milling Company, and were engaged in the business of manufacturing meals of various kinds out of wheat, oats, and other grains, certain premises in San Francisco, consisting of floors and parts of floors in the building on Stevenson street known as Nos. 12, 14, and 16, together with certain machinery therein owned by Eisen and used for milling purposes, and a kiln for drying, situated on the third floor. The said lessees took possession and began therein their said business. Afterwards Holloway sold and conveyed all his interest in the lease and business to the said Frey and Newbauer, and at other times there were sales of interests in the lease and business to and from other parties until finally the plaintiffs Frey and Hoffman and Schwabacher became and remained the owners and continued to conduct the business. On the 21st day of September, 1887, without any fault of plaintiffs, a fire occurred, which injured and damaged said building and property, and entirely destroyed the kiln and some of the machinery. Immediately after the fire Eisen agreed with plaintiffs, and promised them to repair the premises and rebuild the kiln if plaintiffs would repair and rebuild the parts of the machinery which had been damaged and destroyed by the fire, which plaintiffs promised to do. Plaintiffs complied with their part of this contract, and replaced said machinery; but Eisen neglected and refused to rebuild said kiln or to build any kiln. The kiln was necessary to the proper conduct of said business of plaintiffs, and they were damaged by Eisen's refusal to rebuild the same in the sum of $756.47, for which amount judgment was rendered against defendants. The evidence fully warrants these findings. The order denying the new trial must therefore be affirmed, unless it should be reversed upon some of the special grounds suggested by appellants; and we do not think that any of such grounds are tenable. We will notice such of them as seem to call for any discussion.

Appellants attack the sufficiency of the complaint, but as to this matter it is enough to say that the sufficiency of a complaint can be considered only on an appeal from the judgment, and is not reviewable on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 583, 36 Pac. 936, and cases there cited.

¶ 1. See Appeal and Error, vol. 3, Cent. Dig. § 3478.

It is contended that the court erred in overruling appellants' objections to the testimony of respondents' witness J. C. Holloway; the objection being that he was an assignor of respondents, and therefore disqualified as a witness, under section 1880, Code Civ. Proc., which provides that an assignor shall not be a witness "upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, as to any matter of fact occurring before the death of such deceased person." But the objection was not good, because Holloway had transferred all his interest in the lease and business before the fire; and, as the cause of action arose upon a contract made after the fire to which he was not in any way a party, he was not an assignor of the "claim or demand" sued on.

We do not see any merit in the contention that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. There is no claim that the action was not originally brought in time, as it was commenced within one year after the alleged cause of action accrued. But afterwards the respondents, by leave of court, amended the complaint by inserting after the averment of appellants' promise the words "for a valuable consideration," and it is contended that by this amendment a new cause of action was averred. It is obvious, however, that the amendment referred entirely to the cause of action originally alleged, and was merely a statement of something existing at the time of the accruing of that cause of action, and, being part of it, and which the pleader thought proper to add in order to make the complaint more full. No new cause of action was set up in the amendment. And the same may be said of the other amendments—one striking out the words "and Holloway," and another striking out the allegation that defendant "repaired said premises and property" except the kiln. There is no material variance between the cause of action stated in the complaint and the cause of action upon which the judgment rested. The cause of action alleged was the promise of Eisen to rebuild the kiln, and his failure to do so; and upon these facts the judgment was rendered.

The contention that the claim or demand presented to the executor after the death of Eisen was insufficient, and was different from the cause of action stated in the complaint, is not maintainable. The claim presented was very full, and stated as the ground of the demand the promise of Eisen to rebuild the kiln, and his failure to do so, as alleged in the complaint. The promise of respondents to replace the machinery and their fulfillment of that promise constituted a sufficient consideration for Eisen's promise to rebuild the kiln.

After plaintiffs had amended by striking out the words "and Holloway," the defendants moved for leave "to amend their answer by making a special traverse of each of the material allegations in plaintiffs' complaint." The motion was denied, and appellants assign this ruling as material error. It is not necessary to inquire whether the court was right in holding that the original answer sufficiently set forth the defenses of defendants, and that, therefore, an amended answer was not called for, because it appears that afterwards, and after all the amendments to the complaint had been made, defendants were allowed to file and did file an amended answer, in which they had an opportunity to deny, and did substantially deny, all the material averments of the complaint as amended. The defendants therefore could have availed themselves of any defense which they had, and of the right to introduce evidence pertinent thereto; and they could not have been in any way prejudiced by the said ruling excepted to.

We see no other points calling for special notice. The merits of the case lie in the questions whether Eisen promised to replace the kiln upon the consideration that plaintiffs would replace the machinery, and whether plaintiffs were damaged by his refusal to do so, as found by the court; and each party had a fair opportunity to try those questions. And as there are no good reasons for disturbing the conclusions of the court below as to those questions, there is no ground for reversing the order appealed from.

The order denying a new trial is affirmed.

BATEMAN BROS. v. MAPEL et al. (S. F. 2,967.)*

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—IMPAIRMENT OF SURETIES' RIGHTS—INDEPENDENT TRANSACTIONS.

1. Where a contract provided for payment for materials delivered on their being satisfactory to the architect, a further provision that payments might be made in advance of delivery did not constitute a waiver of the requirement of the approval of the architect.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 2844, giving a surety all the rights of a guarantor; section 2840, exonerating a surety in the same manner as a guarantor, and to the extent to which he is prejudiced by acts of the creditor, and section 2819, exonerating a guarantor when, by act of the creditor, the original obligation is altered, or the remedies of the creditors against the principal impaired or suspended—he cannot complain of advancements by the creditor to the principal, outside of the contract, to enable the latter to complete his contract, where the creditor makes no claim for recovery on account of such advancements, and where they have in no manner affected the rights of the surety.

3. A surety on a contract of a materialman to deliver material is liable, in case of a default of his principal, for the difference between the contract price and the price paid for material in open market.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Bateman Bros. against E. T. Mapel and others. From the judgment rendered, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan, for appellants. Whitworth & Shurtleff and Chas. A. Shurtleff, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was prosecuted by plaintiffs against the defendant Mapel, as principal, and the defendant American Surety Company of New York, as surety, for the sum of $2,000, damages sustained by plaintiffs by reason of defendant Mapel's breach of a contract between himself and the plaintiffs, for the due performance of which contract the American Surety Company became responsible as surety. The action was tried against the surety company alone. Mapel had entered into a contract with the plaintiffs to supply the latter at the site of the Hall of Justice building in San Francisco "all the terra cotta, ornamental pressed brick and fireproofing of said Hall of Justice building, in accordance with the plans and specifications of same, and to the satisfaction of Messrs. Shea & Shea, architects." Bateman Bros. agreed to make payments to Mapel of "ninety per cent. of the value of the materials as per this contract, delivered at said Hall of Justice, conditioned that materials are satisfactory to said Messrs. Shea & Shea, architects." The contract also contained the following clause: "It is hereby further agreed that said Bateman Brothers, if they desire, may make payments to said E. T. Mapel in advance of delivery of the said materials before mentioned to be furnished to them, and said E. T. Mapel agrees to accept such payments as part payments on this contract." The undisputed facts are that Mapel failed to manufacture and deliver any material. He was experimenting in his kilns and factories, but the product of them was unsatisfactory and unacceptable. To aid him in his endeavors to produce satisfactory material, Bateman Bros. advanced him moneys from time to time to the total amount of some $7,000. Mapel's efforts thus ending in a failure, plaintiffs were obliged to buy the material in the open market, and did so buy it, at a loss over the contract price of many thousands of dollars. The gravamen of their action is found in paragraph 7 of their complaint: "That by reason of the failure of said Mapel to deliver said materials mentioned in said contract, and to perform said contract, plaintiffs were obliged to purchase said materials elsewhere, and were compelled to pay and are now obliged to pay for said materials mentioned in said contract, and agreed to be delivered by said Mapel, an amount more than $2,000 in excess of the prices mentioned in said contract." This allegation is fully supported by the evidence, and the court finds it to be true. The surety company set up many defenses, upon one of which the court found in its favor. This defense was to the effect that Bateman Bros. had paid to the defendant Mapel this sum of $7,000 prior to the delivery by Mapel of any material, "without first or ever obtaining from Messrs. Shea & Shea, architects, as in and by said contract required, a declaration or expression or acknowledgment upon their part that the materials prepared and manufactured by the said E. T. Mapel under said contract prior to the dates of said payment and payments were satisfactory to them, the said Shea & Shea." Mapel, it appears, had conveyed to the surety company property of the value of $450 to indemnify it. Judgment for this amount was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, but they were refused further relief.

It thus appears that, in the view of the court, the moneys so advanced by plaintiffs to Mapel without the knowledge of the surety company were construed to be moneys advanced in violation of the terms of the contract and in impairment of the surety's rights, and that the surety was thus exonerated, excepting for the value of the indemnifying property of the principal which it held in its possession. The briefs in this case are devoted largely, if not wholly, to the proper construction of the contract in this regard, but, in the view which we take of the case, that construction is wholly immaterial, although it may be said that it was properly construed by the court. The contract contemplated the privilege to the plaintiffs to pay at their pleasure in advance of delivery, but the condition as to approval by the architect was not waived. It was still required that the material should be acceptable to the architects before such payment was justified under the contract. But, as we have said, this determination is immaterial, and quite inconclusive of the case. If the payments were made within the terms of the contract, then clearly the surety cannot be heard to complain. If they were not, then they were merely advancements of money made by plaintiffs to defendant Mapel, entirely without the terms of the contract, and the surety has no grievance, unless in some substantial way his condition is changed, or a new liability is sought to be imposed upon him because of such payments. "A surety has all the rights of a guarantor, whether he becomes personally responsible or not." Civ. Code, § 2844. "A surety is exonerated (1) in like manner with a guarantor. (2) To the extent to which he is prejudiced by any act of the creditor which would naturally prove injurious to the remedies of the surety or inconsistent with his rights, or which lessens his security." Id. § 2840. "A guarantor is exonerated except so far as he may be indemnified by the principal, if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect, or the remedies or rights of the creditor against the principal in respect thereto, in any way impaired or suspended." Id. § 2819. It is, of course, well recognized that the surety is favored in law, and that any act injurious to his rights will operate as an exoneration under his contract. Sutherland thus expresses it: "A surety is a favorite of the law, and where any act is done by the obligee that may injure him, the courts are very glad to lay hold of it in his favor. If the creditor does any act injurious to the surety, or inconsistent with his rights, * * * he will be discharged." 3 Sutherland on Dam. (3d Ed.) § 735. Thus the question whether the advancements made by Bateman Bros. were or were not within the strict terms of the contract could only affect the surety if, in fact, they were improperly made, and if a recovery was sought against the surety because of them, or because of some other change in its condition because of them. But such is not this action. Plaintiff does not plead the payments. He bases no claim for a recovery upon them, and the surety can avail himself of them to defeat a recovery only if the making of them has prejudiced him, or if the making of them has altered the original obligation of the principal in any respect, or if thereby the remedies or rights of the creditor or of the surety against the principal have become in some way impaired or suspended. Such is not the case here presented. So far as the contract is concerned, since no material was delivered by Mapel, and no material had been accepted by the architects, there were no payments to be made, and the payments which were made were mere voluntary loans to Mapel, the better to enable him to perform his contract. These advancements did not injuriously affect the rights of the surety, nor did they affect them at all. At the utmost, it was but a transaction outside of the contract, to the benefit of both Mapel and his surety, in that it supplied the former with money by which he could complete his contract, if it were possible for him to do so at all. So, as we have said, if a recovery were here sought against the surety because of these advancements, he might well be heard to say that he was not responsible therefor, and was exonerated under his bond, because they were not made in accordance with its terms. And such were the precise facts in United States v. Tillotson, 1 Paine, 305, Fed. Cas. No. 16,524. In that case the United States had advanced to its contractors large sums of money to aid in the construction of a fort, under a contract providing restrictions and limitations in the payment of the money, to the effect that materials should be delivered, with the invoices, at the fort, and pronounced by the engineer of proper quality, and that payments should be made at the end of each month for the work actually performed. The United States sued the surety upon his bond, alleging that of the large advancements so made the contractors had accounted in work and material for but a very small sum, and the recovery was sought for the difference between the amounts so advanced by the United States and the amounts accounted for by the contractors. But it was made to appear that the payments by the United States were without the terms of the contract, and, under the plainest principles of suretyship, it was held that the limitations as to payment ran with the surety's contract, and that they were exonerated as to all payments made not in accordance with these limitations and conditions. So here, as has been said, if the recovery were sought for the $7,000 so advanced, the materials for which were not furnished, the surety could rightfully claim his exoneration. But such is not this action. The surety has not been injured by these payments, and a recovery is not sought on account of them. The case, in effect, is that, notwithstanding the liberality of the plaintiffs in advancing moneys to enable the contractor to furnish the material, he still failed to do so, compelling plaintiffs to purchase the material in open market, and for the difference between the contract price and the price paid in open market the surety is responsible to the extent of his undertaking.

It follows, therefore, that the alleged defense is not a defense to the action, and that upon the facts found plaintiff is entitled to the judgment prayed for. It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and that upon the findings made the court enter its judgment in favor of plaintiffs.

GABRIEL v. BANK OF SUISUN. (Sac. 1,078.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—TERMS OF EMPLOYMENT—PRESUMPTIONS — EVIDENCE — CORPORATE MINUTES—APPEAL—REVIEW OF FINDINGS.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 2012, providing that where, after the expiration of an agreement respecting wages and term of service, the parties continue the relation of master and servant, they are presumed to have renewed the agreement for the same wages and term of service, evidence showing that plaintiff had been employed for the year 1898 at an annual salary of $1,200, payable monthly, and that he continued in that employment during the first two months of 1899, raises the presumption that the employment was renewed for the same wages and term as for 1898.

2. An appellate court cannot interfere with the finding of the trial court on conflicting evidence.

3. The minutes of the meeting of the directors of a corporation are not conclusive evidence of the terms of a contract between the corporation and another, where the latter had no knowledge of such minutes.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by F. Wm. Gabriel against the Bank of Suisun. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Lamont, for appellant. Gregory & Gregory and O. R. Coghlan, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover $1,000 as damages for a breach of contract of employment of the plaintiff by the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The court below finds that the defendant employed plaintiff as its assistant cashier and bookkeeper on or about January 1, 1899, for the year 1899 at a salary of $100 per month, payable monthly, and that plaintiff entered upon service of defendant under said employment, remained in its said service until March 1, 1899, was then wrongfully discharged by the defendant, and was not allowed to remain in said employment for the remainder of the year 1899, whereby he was damaged in the sum of $1,000, for which sum the judgment was rendered.

It is contended that the evidence does not support the finding that the plaintiff was employed by the year for the year 1899. This contention, however, cannot be sustained. The plaintiff testified that he was employed as bookkeeper and assistant cashier in July, 1895, and was continued in that employment to the end of that year "at a salary of $100 a month—$1,200 a year." He then proceeds as follows: "I was employed after that at the end of December, 1895, in the same capacity, for the year 1896, at the same salary—$1,200. I continued in that employment during the whole year 1896. I was again employed December, 1896, for the year 1897, in the same capacity, at the same salary. I remained in the employment during the year 1897. I was again employed at the end of 1897 for 1898, in the same capacity, at the same salary, payable monthly. I continued in that capacity during the year 1898. Q. Did you continue in the service of the bank in that capacity any longer than 1898? A. I did; two months—January and February, 1899"—and further that he then quit the employment because he was discharged by the defendant. By the provisions of section 2012, Civ. Code, "Where, after the expiration of an agreement respecting the wages and term of service, the parties continue the relation of master and servant, they are presumed to have renewed the agreement for the same wages and term of service." The above testimony sufficiently shows that the plaintiff had been employed for the year 1898 at an annual salary of $1,200, payable monthly, and that he continued in that employment during the first two months of 1899. From this the presumption arises, under the section quoted, that the employment was renewed for the same wages and term as for the previous year. There was evidence contrary to this, but we cannot interfere with the finding of the court because of the conflict. The minutes of the meeting of the directors of the corporation cannot be considered as conclusive evidence of the terms of the contract, where, as in this case, the plaintiff, one of the contracting parties, had, as he testified, no knowledge thereof.

The appellant further contends that the evidence shows that the contract of employment, if made for the year 1899, was rescinded after two months by mutual consent. It is sufficient to say on this point that, while there was some evidence tending to show a rescission, there was sufficient evidence to the contrary to justify the finding of the court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; HENSHAW, J.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent. I do not think there is any support in the evidence for the finding that the plaintiff was employed by the year for the year 1899.

In re SHIVELY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,784.)

ADMINISTRATION OF ESTATES—ACCOUNTS OF ADMINISTRATOR—PAYMENT OF INCUMBRANCE ON HOMESTEAD—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Pending the administration of an estate, the administrator by authority of the court executed a mortgage for $1,800 and credited the estate with the amount thereof. One tract, 14 acres, was thereafter sold to a third person for $750, and the other tract, 122 acres, was set aside as a probate homestead for the minor children. The mortgagee demanded the payment of $650 before it would release the 14-acre tract, which sum the administrator paid. Held, that the administrator was entitled to a credit for such payment, though it was a greater sum than the 14 acres were liable for in proportion to its value. Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, which provides that, when no homestead has been selected, the court must select one for the minor children, making it the duty of the court to set apart a homestead from the unincumbered estate, authorized the court to allow the proceeds of such sale to be applied on the mortgage which incumbered the homestead at the time it was set aside.

2. The opinion of the trial judge is not evidence, and is no part of the record.

3. Where, in proceedings for the settlement of the final account of an administrator, the appellant has not pointed out the evidence as to an item complained of, the court will not search the record for it, but will presume that the evidence sustains the finding.

4. The account of an administrator is not, in proceedings for a final settlement, evidence as to contested items.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Proceedings for the settlement of the final account of the administrators of W. B. Shively, deceased. From an order settling the final account, the administrators appeal. Modified.

Henry S. Ford and J. S. Burnell, for appellants. J. N. Gillett, for respondent.

COOPER, C. This is an appeal by the administrators of the above estate from an order settling their final account. Several items were charged to the administrators, or disallowed, which are the subjects of controversy here. These items we will dispose of in the order presented.

1. The first is the sum of $535.29, which the court ordered charged to the administrators. Pending the administration of said estate, the administrators by authority of the court executed a mortgage to the Savings Bank of Humboldt County for the sum of $1,800. The Code authorizes such mortgage to be made when it appears to the court to be for the advantage of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1577, 1578. The administrators credited the estate with the $1,800, and the same was evidently used in paying the debts and expenses of administration. The mortgage covered about 14 acres of land, which was afterwards sold to one French, and also about 122 acres, which was, subsequent to the execution of the mortgage, set aside by the court as a probate homestead for the minor children. The 14-acre tract, not included in the homestead, was afterwards sold to one French for $750. The bank demanded the payment of $650 of the $750 before it would release the 14 acres from the mortgage, which was accordingly paid to the bank. The court refused to allow the item to any greater extent than $114.71, "that sum being the relative proportion that the mortgage on the homestead bore to the mortgage on the 14 acres sold according to their respective values." There is no claim made that the administrators received the $535.29, but it is claimed, and the trial court held, that they could not apply it on the mortgage, upon the theory that the moneys of the estate could not be used for the purpose of paying off an incumbrance upon a probate homestead. In this we think the learned judge was in error. The homestead had been incumbered by the administrators for the benefit of the estate. The money obtained by the mortgage became assets of the estate. The administrators had the right to use the money of the estate for the purpose of paying its debts. Suppose they had borrowed the $1,800 on their own responsibility, and credited the estate with it, using it for paying the debts of the estate, does any one doubt that they could have paid themselves from the proceeds of the sale of the 14 acres as far as it would go?

The Code (Code Civ. Proc. § 1465) provides that, where no homestead has been selected and recorded by the deceased, the court "must select, designate and set apart, and cause to be recorded a homestead for the use of the surviving husband or wife and the minor children." The above section is imperative and the court has no discretion in the matter. Estate of Ballentine, 45 Cal. 696; In re Davis, 69 Cal. 458, 10 Pac. 671. It was, then, the duty of the court, in this estate, before the property was mortgaged, to set apart a homestead from the unincumbered real estate; and this, regardless of creditors of the estate. The homestead laws are to be liberally construed, with a view of securing shelter, care, and support for the widow and minor children. If the court in this case had set apart the homestead before the mortgage was executed, it would have ceased to be assets of the estate, and could not afterwards have been mortgaged by the administrators. The court would have had the right to set aside the 122 acres unincumbered as a homestead, and to have ordered the 14 acres sold. It certainly had the right to allow the proceeds of the 14 acres to be used to assist in paying off the incumbrance which it had authorized on the homestead. There is no question as to creditors involved. The estate is solvent, and the administrators cannot be allowed to deprive the minor children of a homestead, because the court authorized a mortgage upon it, when it would not have done so if the facts had been called to its attention.

In case the mortgagee had brought suit to foreclose the mortgage, the parties owning the homestead would have had the right to a decree that the land not included in the homestead be first sold, and the proceeds applied toward the satisfaction of the mortgage debt, and, if the proceeds had been sufficient to pay off the mortgage, to have the homestead premises freed of the incumbrance. Estate of Huelsman, 127 Cal. 275, 59 Pac. 776, is not in conflict with what has been said. In that case the lien of the mortgage upon the property set apart as a homestead existed at the death of the deceased. The court therein properly held that there is no provision for paying off liens on probate homesteads, but it was speaking of liens that existed at the death of deceased. It did not hold that the administrators could not pay off liens on a probate homestead, which they, of their own volition, contrary to the spirit and intent of the law, had placed there.

2. The court ordered the administrators to be charged with "$100, rent received from W. B. Meakin." Appellants call our attention to the evidence of Daniel Shively, one of the administrators, that neither he nor his coadministrator had received from Meakin any other sums than stated in the account. Respondents have not called our attention to any evidence in support of the ruling on this item, nor have we been able to find any. There are certain reasons given in the opinion of the trial judge which would tend to justify his action, but the opinion is not evidence and is no part of the record. Regarded as a brief, it does not point out any evidence to justify the decision as to this item. Therefore the court erred in charging the administrator with this $100.

3. The court directed that the administrators be charged with $250 as stumpage for pepperwood logs, and $25 as stumpage for redwood taken for shingle bolts, taken by the administrators off lands of the estate. The evidence supports the action of the court in this regard. It seems that the court exercised its discretion in favor of the administrators as to the amount of the stumpage and the price in each case, and its action must be upheld as to these items.

4. It is said: "The court erred in finding that the administrators sold a horse for the sum of $50, and did not account for the same." As the appellant has not pointed out the evidence as to this item, we do not deem it our duty to search through the record for it. We will presume that the evidence sustains the finding as to this item.

5. The items by "cash paid for clothes and maintenance of Maud E. Shively, a minor, $100, and Earnest E. Shively, a minor, $18," were disallowed by the court. It is not pointed out as to why these items should have been allowed, nor is our attention called to the evidence to justify them. The pages and folios of the transcript to which our attention is called only show that the items were included in the account, but the account is not evidence as to contested items.

The decree should be modified, in accordance with what has been said, as to the "item of $535.29," and as to the item of "$100, rent from Meakin," and the administrators credited with said items, and, as so modified, affirmed; appellants to recover their costs on this appeal.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the decree is modified, in accordance with what has been said, as to the item of $535.29, and as to the item of $100 rent from Meakin, and the administrators credited with said items, and, as so modified, affirmed; appellants to recover their costs on this appeal. BOLAND v. ASHURST OIL, LAND & DEVELOPMENT CO. (Sac. 1,294.)

BROKERS—COMMISSIONS — ACTIONS — CREDITS—COSTS—APPEAL—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A finding upon issues of fact on conflicting testimony must be accepted as correct.

2. A principal cannot deprive his broker of any part of his commissions for making a sale by subsequently agreeing with the purchaser to accept a less price than that procured by the broker, or by neglecting to collect the price, but the broker is entitled to commissions based on the price procured by him.

3. In an action by a broker for commissions, where plaintiff testified to the receipt of certain commissions, the court should have allowed defendant such amount as a credit upon plaintiff's claim.

4. In an action in the superior court, where plaintiff recovered less than $300, he was not entitled to costs.

5. Error in finding that plaintiff was entitled to costs was harmless, where no costs were included in the judgment.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by C. A. Boland against the Ashurst Oil, Land & Development Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

O. B. Parkinson and Dennett & Walthall, for appellant. L. J. Maddux and Arthur L. Levinsky, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. Action to recover a balance due for commissions for services rendered in the sale of certain stock. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $186.25, with interest thereon from September 1, 1901, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed; contending that the court erred in allowing the plaintiff any commission upon the sale to Underwood, and in the amount allowed upon the sale to Brown.

The agreement between the parties, as found by the court, is that the defendant agreed to pay a commission to the plaintiff "for all sales made to persons by the plaintiff, or to any persons by the assistance of the plaintiff." Whether he is entitled to a commission upon the sale to Underwood depends upon whether he assisted in making the sale. Upon this issue there was conflicting testimony, and the finding of the court that he assisted in procuring Underwood to purchase the stock must be accepted as correct.

The sale to Brown was of 2,000 shares for the sum of $1,000, and was also made through the solicitation of the plaintiff. The purchase was closed by Brown with one of the officers of the defendant upon the payment by him of $250, instead of requiring him to pay for the full amount of the purchase; and the defendant, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, agreed with him that he might pay the balance whenever he wished to, and has since made no effort to collect it. The court properly allowed a commission upon the full amount of the sale. The defendant could not deprive the plaintiff of this commission after the sale had been made by agreeing with the purchaser to accept a less amount, or by neglecting to collect from him the price at which it was sold.

¶ 2. See Brokers, vol. 8, Cent. Dig. §§ 55, 56.

At the trial the plaintiff testified that he received as commission on the Courtright sale $9.40. The court should have allowed the defendant this amount as a credit upon the plaintiff's claim.

In its findings, the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover his costs from the defendant. As the plaintiff recovered less than $300, this was error; but as no costs are included in the judgment—the provision therefor being followed by a blank space—the error is harmless.

We advise that the superior court be directed to modify its judgment by deducting therefrom, as of the date of its entry, the sum of $9.40, with interest thereon from September 1, 1901, to that date at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and, as so modified, that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the superior court is directed to modify its judgment by deducting therefrom, as of the date of its entry, the sum of $9.40, with interest thereon from September 1, 1901, to that date at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; and, as so modified, the judgment and order are affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

GATJE v. ARMSTRONG. (Sac. 1,230.)*

DEED—CANCELLATION FOR FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—RETURN OF CONSIDERATION—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

1. Evidence in an action to set aside a conveyance of land alleged to have been procured by means of fraud and undue influence considered, and held to warrant a judgment for plaintiff.

2. A court of equity, having decreed cancellation of a conveyance of land for fraud, to do complete justice between the parties, will adjust the accounts between them in relation to the land, and will not require plaintiff to restore to defendant money received, where defendant has already realized from the land more than the amount paid to plaintiff in the original transaction.

3. It is no defense to an action to cancel a deed procured by fraud and undue influence that plaintiff, in making the deed to defendant, intended to defraud another person.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Oval Pirkey, Judge.

Action by Johanne Gatje against E. M. Armstrong. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Bridgford and Wm. M. Finch, for appellant. Charles L. Donohoe, C. F. Humphrey, O. V. Eaton, and Frank Freeman, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is an action to set aside a conveyance of upwards of 300 acres of land in Glenn county, alleged to have been procured by defendant from plaintiff by means of fraud and undue influence exercised by the latter toward the former, and to compel defendant to reconvey said lands to plaintiff. The case was tried without a jury, findings were waived, and judgment was entered in plaintiff's favor. The appeal is by defendant from an order denying him a new trial.

The main contention of appellant is to the effect that the decision of the court is unsupported by the evidence, and, there being no findings in the case, appellant endeavors to show that upon no reasonable theory of the evidence can the judgment of the court find support.

In support of the judgment, it is proper to presume that the trial court gave full credit to the testimony of the plaintiff in the case, and refused to believe the evidence adduced by defendant, wherein it conflicted with plaintiff's evidence.

Plaintiff's story, as told upon the witness stand, was, in substance: That she was a German woman, little versed in the English language, with very little knowledge of business, and no knowledge of law. That a short time before meeting the defendant she had been divorced from her husband. That the real property in dispute here had belonged in part to her divorced husband, and in part to herself; the whole having a mortgage on it for about $3,000. That the husband had conveyed his part of the property to plaintiff, that she might dispose of it the more conveniently, by sale or otherwise, and thereafter restore to him in money the equivalent of his interest in the aggregate property. The plaintiff was sent by an employment agency in San Francisco, at the request of defendant, to see the defendant, on Taylor street, in said city, where defendant seems to have been waiting in bed to undergo some kind of a surgical operation. The plaintiff waited on defendant for a few days subsequent to the operation, for which the defendant paid her. He also engaged her to go with him to Iowa Hill, in Placer county, there to cook for him and his men for wages at a certain mine which defendant was managing. Soon after going there, and after mutual protestations of love between the pair, plaintiff and defendant became engaged to be married, and also thereafter became intimate sexually. This relation existing between them, and he being a shrewd business man, the plaintiff soon came to rely on defendant for advice and aid in conducting her business in connection with her land in Glenn county. The defendant undertook to procure a loan for plaintiff to take up the $3,000 mortgage when the same should fall due, but failed to obtain the same. While her affairs were in this condition, defendant came to plaintiff with a paper in his hand, and informed her that her divorced husband was threatening a suit to get his property back from her. Defendant advised plaintiff that she would lose her property if she did not follow his directions. The plaintiff acted upon this advice, and, in obedience to defendant's directions, conveyed the property to defendant; receiving therefor his note for $500, together with a check for $500 more. She testifies, in substance, that this was a mere colorable transaction; that defendant agreed that plaintiff "could have her property back for the same amount of money." She says: "He told me, 'You can take this five hundred dollar check, and you can buy your children some clothes, and send for your children.'" That thereafter she offered him the said note and check, and demanded her property back. That he then informed her that it was not time yet to reconvey, for the reason that her husband had sued her "down in the city." She says: "When I told him to give me my property back, he said: 'It isn't time to do it now. Your home is with me. You go to Iowa Hill. That is the place where you have to stay.'" Thereafter she returned to Iowa Hill. Some months later defendant repudiated his agreement to marry the plaintiff, refused to return her property to her, and told her "to get out"; claiming that he had bought the property, and that it was his own. It further appears from the evidence that the property in dispute is of the value of about $10,000.

We think that the foregoing evidence warrants a court of equity in finding that the deed from the plaintiff to defendant was obtained by fraud, and that the same should be canceled. Conceding that there was no false representation as to a suit having been threatened by plaintiff's divorced husband, the relations of the parties were of such a character that it was natural for plaintiff to repose, as she did, the highest trust and confidence in defendant. The defendant took advantage of this confidence and of the ignorance of plaintiff to obtain a deed to this property for about half what it was worth. The gross inadequacy of the consideration, combined with the condition of dependence, trust, and confidence of the plaintiff in the defendant, we deem entirely sufficient to predicate the decree of fraud upon.

The decree requires the plaintiff to cancel and surrender to defendant the $500 note which she received from him, but does not require the restoration of the $500 received in the check, or any other sum of money paid out by defendant on account of this land. In this, however, we see no error. It is true, defendant paid off the mortgage on the property, amounting to $3,304. He also remortgaged it for $1,500, which amount, at least, seems still to be a lien on the property. In addition to this, the defendant received rents from the property, as conceded in his reply brief, to the extent of $1,588.55. It also appears that defendant sold some 45 acres of the place. It is fair to presume that the trial court, sitting as a court of equity, to determine what the decree should be, charged the defendant with the full value of this land, at $30 per acre, as shown by the testimony of the witnesses, which would amount to $1,350 for the 45 acres. If we add the amount of the outstanding mortgage of $1,500 to the total of the value of the 45 acres sold, and the amounts received in rents, the sum is about $4,438. Deduct from this the total of $3,304 paid on the mortgage, and the $500 given to plaintiff at the execution of the deed, and we have left $634. Of course, nothing should be allowed for the item of $1,260 paid by defendant for a strip of land adjoining the land in controversy. This strip is no portion of the land here in controversy, and has nothing to do with the case in hand. The court was also warranted in refusing to allow defendant anything for his personal services or expenses in connection with the land, for the reason that there is evidence tending to show that those services and expenses were voluntary acts of kindness, which plaintiff was led to believe were to be performed without compensation. There are some items of expenditure upon the property, such as insurance, taxes, abstracts, repairs, etc., amounting in the aggregate to less than $500, which the court may have offset against the balance of $634 mentioned above; and, if they were so offset, the appellant can find no ground of complaint therein. The defendant having obtained the conveyance by fraud, equity invests him with the character of a trustee, and he holds the property in trust for plaintiff; and a court of equity will do complete justice between the parties, and, to this end, will adjust the account between them in relation to the land, and will offset the claim of one against the other, and will not require the plaintiff to restore to defendant money received, when it is shown that the latter has already realized out of the trust estate more than the amount paid by him to the plaintiff in the original transaction. The valid claim for money by the one will be treated as extinguishing, so far as it will go, a similar claim by the other, leaving nothing to be returned or restored where the claim is thus fully extinguished. More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 Pac. 1044. Nor is it material that plaintiff on one occasion tendered to defendant the $500 check, and in her complaint offers to restore the $500 represented by the check. From the evidence the court was warranted in finding that this offer was more than the defendant was entitled to receive, and, under the general prayer for relief, giving to plaintiff such decree as she was entitled to.

The contention of appellant that plaintiff should be refused relief because the purpose of the conveyance was to defraud her divorced husband is disposed of by the recent well-considered case of Donnelly v. Rees, 141 Cal. 56, 74 Pac. 433. The defendant will not be permitted to validate his own fraudulent act by showing that the party he has defrauded intended to defraud some other person.

Some alleged errors of law occurring at the trial are referred to by appellant. We have examined these, and find that they are not of sufficient importance to warrant a discussion.

We advise that the order denying a new trial be affirmed.

McADOO et al. v. SAYRE, Judge of Superior Court of Lake County. (S. F. 3,974.)

TESTAMENTARY TRUSTS—SETTLEMENT OF TRUSTEE—DETERMINATION OF BENEFICIARY—JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1699, provides that where any trust has been created by will, to continue after distribution, the superior court shall not lose jurisdiction of the estate by final distribution, but shall retain jurisdiction thereof for the settlement of accounts under the trusts, and that the testamentary trustee may during the continuance of the trust, or at its termination, pray for the settlement of his accounts as such trustee before the superior court. Held, that the statute confers on the superior court jurisdiction to ascertain who is entitled to the trust estate already delivered by the trustee, and also that which remains to be delivered, and make such orders as may be necessary to enable the trustee to make final settlement.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 1699, provides that the report accompanying the account of a testamentary trustee in the superior court on an accounting therein must give the names and post-office addresses of cestuis que trust. Held, that a failure to give such names and addresses is not sufficient cause for a writ of prohibition to prevent further action, since an appeal lies from any order that may be made.

Beatty, C. J., and Angellotti, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Application by Mary Floyd McAdoo and others to restrain M. S. Sayre, as judge of the superior court of Lake county, from making an order declaring a certain trust terminated, and directing testamentary trustees to pay over the trust property. Application denied.

Maguire, Lindsay & Wyckoff, for petitioners. John F. Davis, Chas. S. Wheeler, and Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the defendant, as judge of the superior court of Lake county, from making an order declaring the trust terminated, and directing certain testamentary trustees to pay over, convey, and deliver the trust property to the beneficiaries. The facts are substantially as follows: Upon the final settlement of the estate of Cora Lyons Floyd, a large amount of property was distributed to certain trustees in trust to hold the same during the lifetime of the daughter of deceased, to maintain and support the daughter during her life out of the income, and upon her death to pay over and deliver the same to the descendants of the daughter, or, if there were no descendants, to such person as the daughter should by will appoint, or, failing such appointment, to the petitioners herein. The daughter died on February 11, 1904, leaving no descendants. A document purporting to be her last will, whereby she bequeathed and devised all her estate to her husband, Milos Mitrov Gopcevic, was admitted to probate in the superior court of San Francisco county on March 9, 1904. In April, 1904, the trustees filed an account and report of the trust in the superior court of Lake county, entitled, "In the Matter of the Estate of Cora Lyons Floyd, Deceased," in which, in addition to a statement of their account and an inventory of the trust property, they alleged the marriage of the daughter to Gopcevic on October 6, 1903, her subsequent residence in San Francisco, her death there without issue, and that she left a will, which had been admitted to probate. The account—due notice having been given in the meantime—came on for hearing on May 13, 1904. On that day the executors of the will of the daughter, and Gopcevic, the surviving husband, filed an answer to the account and report of the trustees. The answer states the bequest and devise by the daughter to Gopcevic, her husband; alleges that by virtue thereof all the property of the trust vested in said Gopcevic (Civ. Code, § 1330); and asks an order declaring the trust at an end, and directing the trustees to pay over, convey, and deliver the property to him. The cause thus presented was submitted to the court, and the respondent, as judge of said superior court, was about to determine the matters involved in the account and declare the balance due, and was considering whether or not the court had jurisdiction in that proceeding to determine who was entitled to the property, and to order the trustees to pay over, convey, and deliver the trust property to the person or persons entitled thereto. The purpose of the proceeding in this court is to prevent the lower court from proceeding to do anything more than to settle and declare the balance due on the account.

There is thus presented the question whether or not section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure confers upon the superior court, in the settlement of a trustee's account in the proceeding there established for that purpose, jurisdiction to ascertain and determine who are the persons entitled to the trust property, and, upon the final account, to direct the trustees to deliver the property to such persons in settlement of the trust, or to approve and confirm such delivery if already made by the trustee. The respondent contends that the court may in that proceeding do all these things. The petitioners claim that the power of the court is exhausted when it has adjusted all disputes as to the correctness of any items of the account, and has allowed compensation and expenses to the trustee, and declared the balance due.

Upon a consideration of the questions usually involved in the settlement of the accounts of trustees of any class of trusts, it is apparent that the court having jurisdiction of the matter of such settlement, even if its functions be limited to the mere ascertainment of a balance, must frequently be called on to determine who is entitled to the property. One who has no interest in the trust has no standing in court to assail the account presented by the trustees, nor to move the court to require an account of them. The section in question gives the right to apply for an order on the trustees for an account exclusively to the beneficiary or his guardian. Even if this provision were omitted, such right would still be limited to those having some interest in the trust or in the trust property. The trustee, then, has the right, when an account presented by him is attacked by objections at the hearing, or when he is cited to appear and render an account, to make the preliminary objection that the person who thus invokes the action of the court with respect to the trust has himself no interest in the property, and hence cannot be heard to make his objection or demand an accounting. This objection of the trustee may be disputed, and thereupon the court must determine whether or not such party is the beneficiary, or is interested in the trust. So, also, there may be, as in this case, two or more parties, each claiming to be beneficiaries. In such a case the trustee may be justly entitled to credits if one of these parties is the real beneficiary, which he could not have if the other was the party interested. The account cannot be settled without a determination of the question which party is entitled. Considered as a mere matter of power, therefore, the court must have the authority in such a proceeding, whenever the necessity properly arises, to determine who are the persons entitled as beneficiaries.

But the precise question here involved is whether or not, independent of any necessity arising from a dispute over specific items of the account, or over the right to contest the same, the court has a general power, upon final settlement at the termination of the trust, to dispose of the entire matter of the trust by determining who, by the terms of the trust, is entitled to the property, and directing the trustees to turn over the same to such person. The decision of this question depends on the effect to be given to the language of section 1699, Code Civ. Proc. That section declares that "where any trust has been created by or under any will to continue after distribution, the superior court shall not lose jurisdiction of the estate by final distribution, but shall retain jurisdiction thereof for the purpose of the settlement of accounts under the trusts." It also provides that such testamentary trustee may during the continuance of the trust, or at its termination, "render and pray for the settlement of his accounts as such trustee, before the superior court in which the will was probated, and in the manner provided for the settlement of the accounts of executors and administrators." Further provision is made for notice to be given of the hearing, and for citation to compel the trustee to account, but these provisions are not important to the present question.

Jurisdiction for a certain purpose necessarily includes authority to do all things necessary to accomplish that purpose, which can be done by the means afforded. Every trustee who, by the terms of the instrument creating the trust, has possession or control of the trust property, is chargeable in his accounts with the whole of the estate thus committed to his hands. Aside from his allowances for compensation and expenses, he cannot in his account obtain credit against this charge, except as he may dispose of the trust property to a beneficiary in the lawful execution of the trust, in which case he is entitled to credit thereon for the property so disposed of; and, when he has thus disposed of it all, his account then stands balanced, and then only has he fully accounted and become entitled to his discharge. He may, if he chooses, exercise his own judgment as to the beneficiary, and, upon the termination of the trust, deliver the property to such person before presenting his accounts for settlement, or he may present his account for compensation and expenses, and obtain settlement to that extent before proceeding to make settlement with the beneficiary, and then present for settlement a supplementary account for the balance. But in either case he has not fully accounted until he has thus disposed of the entire estate, and he will remain subject to be called on to account until this is done, and until the court having jurisdiction of the accounts has, upon a hearing, declared the account correct and the trust fully executed. The object of the section under consideration was to provide a convenient and effectual method of procedure by which to secure a judicial determination, binding on all persons interested, that the estate is all accounted for, the accounts fully settled, and the trust executed. It follows from these propositions that the settlement of the final account of a testamentary trustee in accordance with the provisions of this section will necessarily involve a decision as to the effect of the instrument by which the trust was created, in order to ascertain who is entitled to the trust estate, and determine whether or not the trustee has properly disposed of it in the execution of the trust. In many cases, as above stated, a determination of this question will be necessary upon the settlement of the current accounts; but in the case of a final account, showing a complete execution of the trust, it will be necessary in every case. The necessity of this is shown in the provisions of the Code respecting the settlement of the accounts of executors and administrators. They are made chargeable in their accounts with all the estate which comes to their hands. Code Civ. Proc. § 1613. Upon the settlement of an account allowing compensation and expenses, the court must thereupon make an order for the payment of the debts; that is, it must determine, to that extent, who are the beneficiaries, and order the execution of the trust to that extent by payment to them. Code Civ. Proc. § 1647. If this exhausts the estate the account is final, but a supplementary accounting must be made, showing the payments made under the order. Id. And when, after the debts have been paid, the balance still remaining has been ordered distributed by the court, the executor or administrator is not entitled to a discharge until he has further accounted to the court for this balance by showing that he has paid or delivered the property to the parties entitled thereto. Code Civ. Proc. § 1697. This latter is not usually styled an account, but it has all the essential attributes thereof; and, although the Code does not require notice to be given thereof, there can be no doubt that the court would have power, if occasion arose, to require a notice to the distributees, in order to facilitate a determination of the question whether or not the delivery had been made at all, and, if made, whether it was to the proper parties. It is true that in this state the distribution of estates has been made, to some extent, a matter distinct from the settlement of the accounts. But it is clearly made so merely for convenience. If those provisions of the Code were omitted, the court would still be compelled to ascertain and declare the interests of the successors, in order to adjudge whether or not the accounts were correctly rendered. Furthermore, in the case of bills for an accounting in equity, the proceeding has always been to ascertain who was entitled to the balance found on hand, and give judgment accordingly in his favor against the trustee. The forms of interlocutory decrees in such cases include a judgment of this character, to become effective on the approval of the account. 3 Dan. Chan. Prac. *2193, *2238; 2 Lind. on Part. *516; 22 Encyc. Pl. & Pr. 107; 1 Cyclo. Law & Proc. 448; Keogh v. Noble, 136 Cal. 153, 68 Pac. 579. The question as to who were entitled to the trust estate was usually settled in a preliminary inquiry concerning the necessary parties. 1 Dan. Chan. Prac. *216, *217; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 112, p. 119; Alison v. Goldtree, 117 Cal. 547, 49 Pac. 571. And either party was entitled to a judgment if a balance was ultimately found in his favor, although the party entitled was a defendant who had not filed a cross-bill. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 522; Beach, Eq. Pr. § 429; Story, Eq. Pl. § 106; Pars. on Part. § 208.

These methods of procedure in probate and in equity were obviously not adopted arbitrarily, but from the necessities of the case, and because there could be no complete accounting without establishing the right of the parties entitled to the property accounted for when it was passed from the control of the trustee. And it is difficult to perceive how any good end could be accomplished by arresting a proceeding of this character midway, and relegating the parties to another action in the same court, or another court of concurrent jurisdiction, for a second determination of questions which the court in the proceeding had been compelled to determine —an action in which no new questions could well arise, and the only effect of which would be further delay and uncertainty, and possibly further complications arising from conflicting decisions in the different courts. We conclude, therefore, that in a proceeding of this character the court has the power, and it is its duty whenever the power is invoked, to ascertain who is entitled to the trust estate already delivered by the trustee, and also that which yet remains to be delivered, and make such orders as may be necessary to enable the trustee to make final settlement with the beneficiary in safety, and secure a final settlement of his account, which will entitle him to a discharge.

It is further provided in section 1699, Code Civil Proc., that the report accompanying the account must give the names and post-office addresses, if known, of the cestuis que trust. This the report in question failed to give, and it is claimed that for that reason the proceeding is void, and that prohibition will lie to prevent further action therein. This, however, would not be sufficient cause for a writ of prohibition. An appeal lies from any order that may be made in the proceeding, and it will furnish a sufficient remedy to any person aggrieved by the action of the court in attempting to proceed without jurisdiction.

It is further urged that the court will be premature in its action if it should proceed at the present time to direct the delivery of the property to Gopsevic, the husband, claiming under the will of the deceased daughter. It is claimed that, as less than a year has elapsed since that will was probated, it is still subject to contest, and that therefore the probate is not final, and the property should not be turned over to the appointee until the time for contest has expired, or, if a contest is instituted, until it is finally decided. It is not necessary here to determine whether this contingency would be sufficient to abate the proceeding as for a final settlement, or would be good cause for a postponement of the settlement of the trust until after the probate of the will had become final. We cannot anticipate the action of the court below, and assume that it would be erroneous on this point; and in any case its decision would be subject to appeal, and an ample remedy is thereby provided.

The application for writ of prohibition is denied.

KOWALSKY v. KOWALSKY. (S. F. 3,884.)

DIVORCE — TEMPORARY ALIMONY — DEFENSES AGAINST ALLOWANCE—CONSIDERATION OF MERITS — INACCURACY OF ORDER.

1. Where there is no issue as to the marriage in divorce proceedings, the merits of the case will not be considered on an application for temporary alimony further than is necessary to determine that the wife is proceeding in good faith.

2. An order awarding counsel fees "to the plaintiff or to her counsel" in a suit for divorce, while inaccurate in directing payment to be made to plaintiff's counsel, is not sufficiently irregular to justify a reversal.

3. In a suit for divorce, where plaintiff, in her affidavit for alimony, alleged that defendant owned property worth $100,000, and was in the receipt of an income of $600 per month, and defendant did not deny this allegation, further than to say that his property was not worth $100,000, and that his monthly income was not $600, the fact that it also appeared that plaintiff was the owner of property of the value of $700, or thereabout, did not preclude the court from awarding plaintiff temporary alimony and counsel fees.

4. In an action for divorce for cruelty, the fact that defendant had a home, in which he was willing plaintiff should live during the pendency of the action, was not material on the question of plaintiff's right to temporary alimony and counsel fees.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court of City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Ettie Kowalsky against Joseph N. Kowalsky. From an order awarding temporary alimony and counsel fees to plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. I. Kowalsky and T. J. Crowley, for appellant. Campbell, Metson & Campbell and C. H. Oatman, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action for divorce the defendant appeals from an order requiring him to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $100 a month for her support during the pendency of the action, and the further sum of $250 for counsel fees.

If we were hearing an appeal on the merits, we might be disposed to scan carefully the allegations of cruelty, to determine whether a cause of action is well stated. But the marriage is admitted in the answer, and a cause of action for extreme cruelty is sufficiently stated to make out a prima facie case. The purpose of allowing alimony to the wife during the pendency of the action is to enable her to live in the meantime, and to employ counsel who can properly present her case to the court, both in the pleadings and in the introduction of evidence. The merits of the case, where there is no issue as to the marriage, will not be considered on an application for such alimony further than is necessary to determine that the wife is proceeding in good faith, and not for the mere purpose of obtaining money from the husband. Storke v. Storke, 99 Cal. 622, 34 Pac. 339; Langan v. Langan, 91 Cal. 654, 27 Pac. 1092; Poole v. Wilber, 95 Cal. 339, 30 Pac. 548; Hite v. Hite, 124 Cal. 389, 57 Pac. 227, 45 L. R. A. 793, 71 Am. St. Rep. 82.

The direction that the counsel fees allowed be paid "to the plaintiff or to her counsel," while inaccurate in expression, is not a sufficient irregularity to justify the interference of this court. The addition of the words "or to her counsel" does not change the character of the order as an allowance to the plaintiff, and was probably intended only to indicate that her counsel should have authority to receive the money. Counsel would have the authority although the order was silent in regard to the matter, and hence the addition was unnecessary, but we cannot see how its insertion could in the least injure the appellant.

It was within the discretion of the court to award the plaintiff temporary alimony and counsel fees, notwithstanding the fact that it appeared that the wife was the owner of some corporation stocks of the value of $700 or thereabout. The plaintiff alleged in her affidavit that the defendant owned property worth $100,000, and was in the receipt of an income of $650 per month. The defendant made no denial of this allegation, further than to say that his property was not worth $100,000, and that his monthly income was not $600. This was equivalent to an admission that the value of his property and the amount of his income, respectively, were $1 less than these sums. The court might well conclude that, with such abilities on the part of the husband, it would not be fair to the wife to compel her to sell all that she had in order to raise money wherewith to live and prosecute her action.

The fact that the defendant had a home in which he was willing that the plaintiff should live during the pendency of the action was not material. It involved the merits of the action. The plaintiff alleged that she had been driven from that home by the cruelty of the husband. It would be deciding the case in advance of the trial to offer evidence to show that she was not justified in living apart from him.

The order is affirmed.

ALFERITZ et al. v. CAHEN et al. (S. F. 3,093.)

JUDGMENTS—DEFAULT—VACATION—NEGLIGENCE OF ATTORNEY—DISCRETION.

1. Where, by the negligence of defendant's attorney in not ascertaining or appreciating that an action for conversion was against both members of a firm, he did not attend the trial, whereupon judgment was recovered against both of such members, and no affidavit of merits or defense other than a general denial was filed, and one of them intended to contest the suit, the court's refusal to vacate the judgment was not an abuse of discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by George C. Alferitz and others against A. Cahen and another. From an order denying an application of defendant H. Cahen to set aside a judgment by default, he appeals. Affirmed.

M. S. Eisner and Reinstein & Eisner, for appellant. Lyman I. Mowry, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by H. Cahen, one of the defendants, from an order denying his motion to vacate a judgment against himself. The motion was made under section 473, Code Civ. Proc., and reliance was had principally upon the ground of the mistake of his attorney.

The action was commenced in 1894, against the defendants as copartners under the firm name of A. Cahen & Son, for the conversion of 17 bales of wool. The defendants answered by general denial. The case slumbered for some six years, during which time plaintiff had died, and his personal representatives had been substituted. Defendants' attorney, not having had occasion during this time to refresh his memory as to the facts, had forgotten that the action was against A. Cahen and H. Cahen, and assumed that it was against A. Cahen alone. His mistaken belief in this regard was promoted, if not prompted, by the fact, as appears from his affidavit, that the partnership had been dissolved before the date of the alleged conversion, and that, as a consequence, if there had been a conversion of plaintiff's goods, the defendant H. Cahen was not responsible therefor. The attorney for the plaintiff came to the attorney for the defendant, stating that the estate of Alferitz was ready for settlement, and said that the pending litigation should either be compromised, or that the case must be tried. Defendants' attorney, still in the mistaken belief that the sole defendant was A. Cahen, said that he would communicate with his client touching the compromise. He did so communicate with A. Cahen, who expressed his inability to pay anything, and instructed his attorney not to defend the litigation. Plaintiffs' attorney, being notified that a compromise was impossible, proceeded to have the cause set for trial, and served proper notices upon defendants' attorney. These notices disclosed the fact that the action was against the two Cahens, but they were actually received by the managing clerk of defendants' attorney, and were not seen by defendants' attorney himself. Defendants' attorney, being instructed by A. Cahen not to defend the action, and still entertaining the mistaken belief that A. Cahen was the only defendant, failed to appear at the time of the trial. At that time plaintiffs made their proofs and recovered judgment against both of the defendants. H. Cahen was doing business under the name of the California Fruit Evaporating Company. Execution was issued and levied upon his property in that company, whereupon his attorney with due diligence moved for a vacation of the judgment against H. Cahen, which motion was denied.

The sole question presented to this court upon an appeal such as this is whether or not there has been an abuse of the discretion vested in the trial court, either in granting or in refusing the motion. Where such abuse has been plainly shown, this court has lent its aid in correction of it, but in all other cases relief has been denied. The whole consideration has been well summed up by Mr. Justice Harrison in Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 Pac. 165, where it is said: "The rule has been so often declared as not to need the citation of authorities that the action of the superior court upon an application to set aside a default or grant relief therefrom rests so largely in its discretion that it will not be disturbed on appeal unless it shall be made clearly to appear that there was an abuse of this discretion. While it has been said in some cases that this discretion is better exercised when it tends to bring about a decision of the cause upon its merits, the rule itself has never been relaxed. This observation has been in the nature of advice to the superior court, and not for the purpose of compelling it to decide in that mode. Unless the record clearly shows that the court has abused its discretion, its order, whether it be to grant or deny the application, will be affirmed." While it may be conceded that if the trial court in this case had reached the opposite determination, and had vacated its judgment, to the end that H. Cahen might be permitted to defend the litigation upon its merits, this court would not have disturbed the conclusion, upon the other hand that is very far from a declaration that the decision which the court actually reached was unwarranted, and therefore an abuse of its discretion; for, while conceding that the attorney for defendant was laboring under a mistake, there was still to be considered whether or not the mistake was one entertained under such circumstances as to entitle the party to relief. Herein are to be considered the circumstances that the answer of H. Cahen nowhere discloses a special defense, but rests merely upon general denial; further, that plaintiffs' attorney, in his conversations with defendants' attorney, always spoke of the defendants in the plural, and that there was nothing in the language of defendants' attorney to lead plaintiffs' attorney to believe that defendants' attorney was laboring under any mistake. Still further, that the notices served upon defendants' attorney showed plainly and properly who the defendants were, and even if those notices did not come under the eye of defendants' attorney, they were received by the managing clerk of defendants' attorney. Where such questions of negligence and mistake arise, there must always come a time when, notwithstanding the hardship to the client, he must be bound by the errors and omissions of his attorney. It may not be said that it was an abuse of the discretion of the trial court to hold in this instance that he was so bound.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

DODGE STATIONERY CO. v. DODGE et al.
(S. F. 2,917.)*

TRADE-NAMES—NAME OF INDIVIDUAL—USE BY CORPORATIONS—USE BY INDIVIDUAL HIMSELF—UNFAIR TRADE—INJUNCTION—SCOPE—CONTRACTS—RESTRAINING TRADE—SALES OF GOOD WILL.

1. The vendor of stock in a corporation has no vendible interest in the good will of the business carried on by the corporation, and cannot transfer any part thereof, but such good will is the property of the corporation alone.

2. Under Civ. Code, §§ 1673, 1674, declaring contracts by which one is restrained from exercising a lawful profession or business, except where one sells the good will of a business, void, a contract by the vendor of stock in a corporation, binding him not to engage in the line of business conducted by the corporation, is void.

3. Where one tradesman resorts to any artifice to represent his goods or his business as the goods or business of a rival, thereby deceiving the public, a fraud is committed, which will be restrained on the ground of unfair competition, although the rival tradesman has no proprietary interest in the words or device imitated.

4. A trading corporation may, equally with a private person, acquire the good will of a business, which is defined by Civ. Code, § 992, as a well-founded expectation of continued public patronage, and procure the protection of that good will against the unfair trade of rivals.

5. While a private person may engage in a business in his own name, although his name is used in the same business by a corporation of which he was at one time a leading stockholder, so long as he does not resort to any artifice to produce the impression that the place of business conducted by him and that conducted by the corporation are identical, yet he cannot, by becoming a stockholder in a new corporation, confer on it the right to adopt a name similar to that used by the former corporation to palm off the business of the new corporation as that of the old.

6. Where a name adopted by a corporation is so similar to that of another corporation as to create confusion and enable the later corporation to obtain the business of the prior one, injunction will lie to restrain the simulation, so far as necessary to protect the rights of the prior corporation.

7. The names "The Dodge Stationery Company" and the "J. S. Dodge Company," when taking into consideration the fact that the business conducted by the latter is the same as that conducted by the former, are sufficiently similar to warrant an injunction restraining the latter from conducting its business under the name adopted by it.

8. Where a corporation by using the term "Dodge's" became well known to the public, and built up a large business under that name, another corporation engaging in the same business would be enjoined from using the term "Dodge's" on its signs, thereby conveying the impression that its was the business conducted by the former corporation, although a man named Dodge was the manager of the latter corporation, and although the term was not used on its signs with any actual fraudulent intent.

9. One who had been the president of a corporation to which he had given his name, and which used his surname possessively as a popular name, under which it had built up a profitable business, would be enjoined from engaging in the same business with a new corporation bearing his name and also making use of his surname alone as a popular name.

10. The use by a corporation of the name of an individual, who at one time had been its president, as its corporate name, and his surname, used possessively, under which it had built up its reputation, as its popular name, does not import a declaration that a person of the name used is now connected with it, so as to render such use fraudulent.

11. The use by one corporation or individual of a name similar to that of another corporation engaged in the same business will be enjoined only so far as is necessary to protect against fraudulent representations.

12. A corporation engaging in business under a name similar to that of another corporation engaged in the same business should be enjoined from making use of that name only in the business in which both corporations were engaged, and not from making use thereof in any other business.

13. A person whose name was used as the corporate name of a corporation of which he was at one time president, and whose surname was used as the popular name of that corporation, who engaged in the same business, after the termination of his connection with the corporation, in a new corporation making use of his name as a corporate name and of his surname standing alone as a popular name, was properly enjoined from engaging in the business at the place in the same city where the new corporation had established itself, and had used misleading signs similar to those used by the old corporation, and from causing any business similar to that of the old corporation to be carried on by the new corporation in the city under the designation of his surname without a qualifying statement that the business so carried on was not the business theretofore carried on by the old corporation under that name, and from in any manner representing that such business was the same business as that carried on by the old corporation; but a further provision of the injunction restraining him from using his own name in the carrying on of the business at any other place in the city unless qualifying that name by explanatory statements making its use burdensome was unauthorized.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by the Dodge Stationery Company, a corporation, against J. S. Dodge and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Modified.

A. E. Shaw and J. F. Riley, for appellants. Mastick, Van Fleet & Mastick, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This action was brought to obtain a decree enjoining the defendants from maintaining certain signs, doing business under certain names and designations, or using the same in the conduct of their business, using or exhibiting certain samples, and enjoining the defendant corporation from using its corporate name, or any other name in colorable imitation of plaintiff's corporate name, in the conduct of its business. Plaintiff had judgment substantially in accord with the prayer of its complaint, and defendants have appealed from such judgment.

The findings of the trial court, and allegations of the complaint which are not denied by the answer, show the following facts:

Plaintiff was incorporated in August, 1894, for the purpose of buying, selling and dealing in books, periodicals, and stationery, and carrying on a general engraving, typographing and printing business, and has ever since been engaged in said business in the city and county of San Francisco. Defendant J. S. Dodge was one of the incorporators, its first president, and its general manager until September 17, 1900, when he sold and transferred all his stock to another, since which time he has not been a stockholder in the corporation, in any way interested therein, an officer thereof, or in its employ. In March, 1896, plaintiff moved its place of business to No. 112 Post street, and in March, 1899, to No. 123 Grant avenue, where the business has ever since been conducted. During the period that the business was being conducted at these places, with defendant J. S. Dodge as manager, said defendant Dodge usually advertised and conducted the business of plaintiff under the name of "Dodge's," that being the only name or device placed in a conspicuous manner on the signs used, and the signs used at 123 Grant avenue containing simply the word "Dodge's," and no other word or designation whatever; and these conditions have ever since continued to exist. It was always the custom of plaintiff to stamp on the back of envelopes sold by it the word "Dodge's," with a designation of the street and number of its place of business. During the time that the business of plaintiff has been conducted at these two places it has become well and favorably known to its customers as "Dodge's," and under that name plaintiff has built up and is now carrying on a large and profitable business, the corporate name being used only on billheads and correspondence. Within a few months after parting with his stock in plaintiff corporation and ceasing to be interested therein, viz., on January 2, 1901, defendant J. S. Dodge, with four others, organized defendant corporation, the "J. S. Dodge Company," for the purpose of engaging in the same character of business as that followed by plaintiff. Said J. S. Dodge Company and J. S. Dodge hired a store at No. 209 Post street, in the same block in which plaintiff's place of business is situated, and only 100 feet distant therefrom, and placed thereon a conspicuous sign, as follows: "Dodge will occupy these premises on his return from New York with a complete stock of up to date stationery, etc., about March 1st." The word "Dodge" thereon was displayed in very large and conspicuous letters. On April 1, 1901, they opened their stationery business therein, and have ever since maintained the same, the only signs displayed being several containing simply the word "Dodge" in large letters, and a large marble slab in the sidewalk in front of the store, containing simply the words "Dodge, Stationer." They have also stamped the envelopes sold by them with the words "Dodge's, 209 Post St., S. F.," and have done other things calculated to convey the impression that their establishment and that of plaintiff are identical. There is not now, and has not been since September 17, 1900, any person by the name of Dodge connected in any way with plaintiff corporation.

The court also found that J. S. Dodge and his fellow incorporators caused the name "J. S. Dodge Company" to be adopted as the name of defendant corporation, with the intent and for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff, appropriating to their own benefit the good will of plaintiff's business, and deluding and deceiving the customers of plaintiff and the public into the belief that the business theretofore conducted by plaintiff was being conducted by defendants; that the store at 209 Post street was hired by the defendants, and the announcement by sign was made by them that Dodge would occupy the premises, for the same purpose and with the same intent; and that, "if said defendants are permitted to continue to carry on said business at the place aforesaid, with the sign aforesaid, and under said corporate name, the customers of plaintiff and the public generally will be deceived and misled into believing that the store where the defendants are so conducting business is the store of plaintiff," to the great damage of plaintiff.

The court further found that J. S. Dodge had been engaged in the stationery, etc., business in San Francisco for more than 25 years, either individually, in partnership, or as stockholder in corporations; that in all firms or corporations with which he has been connected the name "Dodge" has been used by him in the title of the firm or corporation; that he has during said time built up a large trade by his personal endeavor, "and has used said name 'Dodge' or 'Dodge's' for the purpose of notifying the public * * * and his patrons generally of the fact that he was connected with said partnership or corporation, and giving his personal attention and supervision to the business by them carried on." There was no finding that there was any fraudulent intent on the part of the defendants in so far as the use of the signs "Dodge" and "Dodge, Stationer," on and about the store at 209 Post street, after the commencement of business therein, was concerned, and the complaint contained no allegation as to any fraudulent intent in this respect.

The trial court, by its decree, enjoined defendants and each of them from maintaining in connection with their business at 209 Post street, or at any other place where they may conduct a similar business, the signs now maintained, or any sign containing the name "Dodge" or "Dodge's," with or without initials or other words or devices, unless accompanied by an express and conspicuous statement that the business carried on under such sign is not the business heretofore carried on by plaintiff, and is not the business heretofore carried on under the name of "Dodge's," and is not the business heretofore carried on at No. 112 Post street and No. 123 Grant avenue; from in any way carrying on such business under such names, or any designation containing such names, without such accompanying statement; from using such names, or any description in any way containing such names, in the conduct of such business, without such an accompanying statement; and also enjoined defendant corporation from using its corporate name, "J. S. Dodge Co.," as its corporate name, and from doing any business under said name, or any name in colorable imitation of the corporate name of plaintiff.

We cannot say that the findings of the court as to the intent with which the defendant Dodge used his name in the title of the firms and corporations with which he had been connected are necessarily inconsistent. An intent to show his connection with the defendant corporation, J. S. Dodge Company, may have coexisted with an intent of himself and fellow incorporators therein to adopt a certain corporate name for the purpose of misleading and deceiving the customers and patrons of plaintiff in the manner alleged and found. Nor can we hold that the findings of the court are not in all respects either sustained by sufficient testimony or admitted by the pleadings. As is usually the case, the intent must be determined from the acts and the circumstances attending their commission, and here the acts and circumstances were such as to sustain the conclusions of the trial court as evidenced by the findings. Under the circumstances appearing, there can be no doubt as to the correctness of the conclusion of the trial court as to the effect upon plaintiff's business of allowing defendants to continue their business at 209 Post street, with the signs now there, and under said corporate name.

The question, then, is as to whether, upon these facts, plaintiff was entitled to any relief, and, if so, the extent thereof. This action is not based upon the theory that by the sale of his stock in plaintiff corporation there was any transfer by defendant Dodge of the good will of the business or of any good will. The vendor of stock in a corporation has no vendible interest in the good will of the business carried on by the corporation, and cannot transfer any part thereof. The good will of a business conducted by a corporation is the property of the corporation alone, and can be transferred only by it. It is not claimed, therefore, that Dodge, by the sale of his stock, contracted not to engage in the stationery business, for, had he so purported to do—which he did not—his contract would have been void under the provisions of sections 1673 and 1674, Civ. Code, there having been no transfer of the good will of the business. Merchants' Ad-Sign Co. v. Sterling, 124 Cal. 429, 57 Pac. 468, 46 L. R. A. 142, 71 Am. St. Rep. 94. Admittedly, defendant Dodge, having terminated his connection with plaintiff, had the right to engage, whenever and wherever he saw fit so to do, in the same character of business as that carried on by plaintiff. Nor is the action based upon the claim of any proprietary interest in the name "Dodge's" or "Dodge." The basis of plaintiff's action is that defendants are attempting by fraudulent representations to the effect that plaintiff's business is defendants' business to appropriate the benefit of the good will of plaintiff's established business. The rule upon which a judgment in favor of plaintiff must rest was well stated in Weinstock, etc., v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 539, 42 Pac. 142, 145, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57, where this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Garoutte, said: "The fundamental principle underlying this entire branch of the law is that no man has the right to sell his goods as the goods of a rival trader. * * * We think the principle may be broadly stated that, when one tradesman resorts to the use of any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of representing his goods or his business as the goods or business of a rival tradesman, thereby deceiving the people by causing them to trade with him when they intended to and would have otherwise traded with his rival, a fraud is committed—a fraud which a court of equity will not allow to thrive." This doctrine has been repeatedly stated in different forms by the courts, and is universally recognized, and we do not understand it to be disputed here. As pointed out in Shaver v. Heller, 108 Fed. 821, 48 C. C. A. 48, there is a distinction between a suit for the infringement of a trademark and an action to restrain unfair competition in trade. In the latter case—to which this action belongs—no proprietary interest in the words or device imitated is requisite. It is sufficient that the plaintiff is entitled to the good will of a business, and that this good will is injured, or is about to be injured, by the palming off of the business or goods of another as his. In passing, it may be said, in response to a contention of defendants, that it appears clear to us that a trading corporation may, equally with a private person, have a well-founded expectation of continued public patronage, and this constitutes the good will of its business (Civ. Code, § 992), which may be protected by a court of equity against acts of the character complained of (Weinstock, etc., a Corporation, v. Marks, supra).

Coming to the application of the principle under discussion, it is obvious that there is a very material distinction between the rights of the defendant Dodge and the defendant corporation, the J. S. Dodge Company. Dodge himself, being entitled to engage in the stationery business, had the unquestionable right to engage in that business in his own name, so long as he did not resort to any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of producing the impression that the place of business conducted by him and that conducted by plaintiff were identical. It does not follow, however, that he could confer the right to use his name upon a corporation for the purpose of enabling that corporation to engage in a business which had been conducted by another corporation under a similar name, and it is well settled that he could not so do. This must be especially true where he himself caused the use of his name by the prior corporation. The distinction has been made in several cases. As has been said by the courts, a person comes naturally by his name from his parents, and it is a thing personal to himself, which in truth and in justice he has the right to use, provided he does not resort to artifices calculated to produce deception or confusion in the public mind between him and some other person, to the injury of the latter; while the name given to a corporation is an artificial and impersonal thing, selected arbitrarily by the corporators themselves, and which can be selected from an entire vocabulary of names. "To say that one has the right to select his own name as the designation of a corporation is but another way of stating that he has a right to select any title from among the whole range of names; but it is not equivalent to a statement that he can give his own name to a corporation with a view to making it similar to that employed by other persons in the same business, to their or the public's injury." De Long v. De Long Hook & Eye Co. (Sup.) 32 N. Y. Supp. 203, 89 Hun, 399, 35 N. Y. Supp. 509. See, also, Rogers, etc., v. Rogers, etc. (C. C.) 11 Fed. 495, 499. The defendant corporation is a distinct person in law from J. S. Dodge, and its legal rights in the matter of the selection and use of a corporate name are precisely the same as if J. S. Dodge had never been connected with it. Whoever its incorporators might be, they had no right to fraudulently adopt a name similar to plaintiff's name for the purpose of palming off the business to be conducted by the new corporation as plaintiff's business, and thus invade the rights of the prior corporation. If the name so adopted was so similar to the name of the prior corporation as "to create confusion, and enable the later corporation to obtain, by reason of the similarity of names, the business of the prior one," injunction will lie to restrain the simulation so far as may be necessary to protect the rights of the prior corporation, even to the extent of prohibiting the use of the name at all; the courts interfering in such cases solely for the purpose of preventing fraud, actual or constructive. See Chas. S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co., 144 N. Y. 462, 39 N. E. 490, 27 L. R. A. 42, 43 Am. St. Rep. 769; De Long v. De Long H. & E. Co., supra; Garrett v. T. H. Garrett & Co., 78 Fed. 472, 24 C. C. A. 173; Penberthy Injector Co. v. Lee, 120 Mich. 174, 78 N. W. 1074; Schmid v. De Grauw (Sup.) 59 N. Y. Supp. 569.

As to the similarity of the corporate names in this case, when the surrounding circumstances are taken into consideration, it is only necessary to refer to the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals in Chas. S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co., supra. While the names are not identical, and, standing alone, without taking into consideration the business conducted by defendant corporation, and for which it was formed, are not, perhaps, so similar as to justify a court from interfering, when we take into consideration the fact that defendant corporation was organized for and is conducting a stationery business, the similarity is apparent at once. As in the Higgins Case, so here, as between these parties the case is precisely the same as if defendant's corporate name contained a designation of its business, and the word "stationery" had been placed therein, making it the "J. C. Dodge Stationery Company."

As to the rights of the courts to restrain such a company from using on its signs the term "Dodge's," a name under which plaintiff's business has become well and favorably known to the public, and under which plaintiff has built up a large and profitable business, or any term so similar thereto as to mislead the public into believing that the defendant's place of business is the same establishment that has been maintained by plaintiff under that name, there can be no question. The term "Dodge" is of this character. It is not defendant's corporate name, and defendant corporation had no right to conduct its business under that name in such a way as to convey the impression that it is the business conducted by plaintiff as "Dodge's." The fact that a man named Dodge is a stockholder therein or the manager thereof cannot, as we have already seen, affect this question. If the defendant corporation had desired simply to show that the J. S. Dodge, who had formerly been connected with plaintiff, had severed his connection therewith, and was now the manager of defendant, it could have done it in such a way as to invade no right of plaintiff.

It appears also to be immaterial, in this connection, whether or not such term "Dodge" was used on the signs with actual fraudulent intent. If the natural and necessary consequence of said defendant's conduct in this respect was such as to cause deception, said defendant, knowing the facts, must be held to the same responsibility as if it acted under the honest impression that no right of the plaintiff was invaded. Higgins, etc., Co. v. Higgins, etc., Co., supra.

As to the defendant J. S. Dodge the plaintiff was also entitled to an injunction. While it is undoubtedly true that he has the right to engage in business in his own name, the books are full of cases to the effect that one will not be allowed to resort to any artifice or contrivance in the use of his own name for the purpose of deceiving the public as to the identity of his business or products. The cases generally, including several of those cited by learned counsel for defendants, recognize this qualification of the right to use one's own name. In Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co., 163 U. S. 169, 16 Sup. Ct. 1002, 41 L. Ed. 118, the first case cited by defendants upon this point, it is declared by the United States Supreme Court that, though one may so use his name, he cannot resort to any artifice or do any act calculated to mislead the public as to the identity of the business firm or the articles produced by him. It is the manner of the use, rather than the use of the name itself, that is prohibited in such cases. In the case at bar the defendant Dodge adopted a method of indicating the new business carried on by him and the new corporation practically identical with that which he had previously caused the plaintiff to adopt, and under which its business had been built up, and was well and favorably known. That method was the placing on the signs the surname "Dodge" alone, indicating that the business theretofore carried on by plaintiff as "Dodge's" was being carried on at the new place. The natural and necessary consequence of using this name in this manner would be to mislead plaintiff's customers and divert plaintiff's trade, and Dodge must have known this. Each case of this character must depend upon its own circumstances, and we are of the opinion that the circumstances of this case are such as to justify a court in restraining defendant Dodge from the use of his own surname in such a manner as to cause the public to believe that a stationery business conducted by him is the same stationery business as that conducted by the plaintiff. The use of such surname in the manner indicated was entirely unnecessary to the exercise of the right of Dodge to do business in his own name, and was an artifice or contrivance which the law will not tolerate to another's detriment.

It is urged that plaintiff's complaint is devoid of equity, in that by the use of the word "Dodge's" it is attempting to trade upon the reputation of J. S. Dodge, who is no longer connected with it. Its use of the signs "Dodge's" without qualifying words, it is said, is a representation that J. S. Dodge is still connected therewith. The soundness of the principle invoked by defendants in support of their contention cannot be disputed. If the plaintiff had made any false representation in the respect stated, we would have a different case. There has certainly been no misrepresentation in the matter of plaintiff's corporate name, and we do not understand that any such is claimed. It bears the name "The Dodge Stationery Company," the name selected by the defendant J. S. Dodge for it. That name does not import any declaration that there is any Dodge now connected with it. Upon this point it is sufficient to refer to the opinion in the case of Holmes, etc., v. Holmes, etc., 37 Conn. 278, 9 Am. Rep. 324. As to the use of the word "Dodge's" by plaintiff, the business conducted by plaintiff corporation has become well and favorably known under that name. It may be that the skill and management of J. S. Dodge contributed in some degree to the favorable reputation of plaintiff, but it is immaterial what contributed thereto. The name "Dodge's," through J. S. Dodge's own acts, became so bound up with plaintiff's business as to indicate the business itself carried on by it, the Dodge Stationery Company, and the mere continuance of the use of that name after the retirement of Dodge indicated nothing more.

We have examined such rulings of the trial court in the matter of the admission of evidence as are complained of, and find nothing that could have prejudicially affected defendants' case.

The court below was justified in granting an injunction as against both defendants. We are, however, of the opinion that in some respects the injunction granted was, as is urged by defendants, too broad, and unnecessary to a proper protection of plaintiff's legal rights. Some cases have been cited by plaintiff in which the decree has absolutely enjoined the use of the name of the person or corporation, but an examination of these cases will develop the fact that in those cases, generally, such extreme relief was absolutely essential to prevent a continuance of the fraud and the ensuing damage. Each case must necessarily stand upon its own facts. The only object of a court of equity in such cases being to protect against the fraudulent representations, it will go no further than is necessary to accomplish that result. Any further step is an encroachment upon the legal rights of the defendant.

So far as the defendant corporation is concerned, the decree of the court is fully warranted, except in so far as it is enjoined from using its corporate name in any class of business different from that of plaintiff, or from using in such different class of business any other name in colorable imitation of plaintiff's corporate name. So long as the defendant corporation does not trench upon plaintiff's line of business, it should be at liberty to use its corporate name, or any other name, as it pleases.

As to the defendant Dodge, we do not see how it can be essential to the protection of the public or of the legal rights of plaintiff that he should be restrained from using his own name in the carrying on of the stationery business, if he chooses to engage therein, at some other place than No. 209 Post street, unless he so qualifies that name by explanatory statements as to make the use extremely burdensome. It may well be, as claimed by plaintiff, that as to the store at No. 209 Post street, such an impression has been created by the misleading signs and statements, which will continue unless removed by defendants themselves, as justifies the relief granted against Dodge as to that place. So far as the decree enjoins Dodge from doing any of the acts specified therein at No. 209 Post street, it was warranted by the case presented, and will not be disturbed. So far, too, as the decree prohibits him from causing any business similar to plaintiff's to be carried on in the city and county of San Francisco under the simple designation "Dodge" or "Dodge's," or with signs containing those words alone, without a qualifying statement to the effect that the business so carried on is not the business heretofore carried on by plaintiff under the name "Dodge's" at No. 112 Post street and No. 123 Grant avenue, and from in any manner representing that any such business carried on by him is the same business heretofore carried on by plaintiff, or from in any way designating such business simply "Dodge" or "Dodge's," it was warranted by the case presented. The decree should, in our opinion, so far as the defendant Dodge is personally concerned, go no further than this, and must be modified accordingly.

The cause is remanded to the superior court, with directions to modify the judgment in the respects indicated herein, and, when so modified, said judgment shall stand affirmed. Defendants shall not recover their costs on this appeal.

TREANOR v. WILLIAMS. (S. F. 3,880.)*

ELECTIONS—CONTESTS—STATEMENT—SUFFICIENCY — ILLEGAL BALLOTS — DISTINGUISHING MARKS — DEFENSES — NONCOMPLIANCE WITH PURITY LAW—APPEAL—QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

1. Where an appealing contestee in an election contest did not bring up any of the ballots the counting or rejection of which was complained of by him, the Supreme Court could not reverse the judgment on any point arising out of the rulings on particular ballots.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1117, providing that a statement of contest is sufficient if the grounds of contest are alleged so as to advise defendant of the particular cause for which the election is contested, a statement alleging various acts of misconduct by the election boards, by which votes were counted for contestee which should not have been counted for him, and votes which should have been counted for contestant were not so counted, and averring that contestant actually received the more and that contestee actually received the less legal votes, was sufficient to present the question as to which of the parties actually received the greater number of legal votes, and a further averment that a tabulated list attached thereto showed the votes actually cast for the contestee, did not preclude the contestant from claiming or the court from finding that the contestee received less than the number of legal votes stated in such list.

3. Ballots having crosses after "No Nomination" are properly rejected in an election contest, although there are a large number of such ballots.

4. The intent of a voter in making a distinguishing mark on his ballot cannot be shown other than by what appears upon the face of the ballot.

5. Whether or not a contestant has complied with the purity of election law is a matter irrelevant to an election contest.

McFARLAND, J. This is a contest over the office of county recorder of the county of Santa Clara, arising out of an election for that office held in November, 1902. Upon the returns of the election boards the board of election canvassers declared that Thomas W. Treanor had received the highest number of votes for said office, and was elected, and a certificate of his election was issued and delivered to him. Thereupon C. R. Williams, who had been a candidate for said office at said election, duly instituted this contest. The court below found that Williams had received 4,004 legal votes, and Treanor only 4,001 legal votes, and rendered judgment for Williams. From this judgment Treanor appeals.

It appears from the record that the court examined all the votes that had been received at the election, and rejected a great many that had been counted by the election boards for the contestee, Treanor, and also rejected a large number of votes which had been so counted for contestant, Williams. It was stipulated that none of the ballots offered in evidence need be copied into a bill of exceptions or statement, but that all of the ballots objected to by either of the parties should be withdrawn from the clerk's office "by the party who should appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment that might be rendered in the action to which he is a party, and be deposited with the clerk of the Supreme Court upon filing his transcript on appeal," and that they might be used on the hearing here as though they had been copied into the bill of exceptions. Under this stipulation appellant has deposited with the clerk of this court, and thus brought to our attention, only 28 of such ballots. But these ballots so brought here are of no materiality whatever, because they all contain votes for contestant which were rejected by the court. The record shows that "the court, upon objection of the contestee, rejected 251 of said ballots on the grounds [naming several specific objections]; said ballots having been counted for contestant by the boards of judges and election officers of the respective precincts." The record further shows that "the said contestee, Treanor, specially objected to each of the following ballots containing a vote for said contestant Williams, said ballots being a portion of the 251 ballots above mentioned"; and then follows a reference to each of the said 28 ballots deposited with the clerk of this court, and certain specific objections to each. We can see no purpose in this, unless it be that the contestee was fearful that the grounds on which the court rejected said ballots might turn out to be untenable, and he desired to add further grounds; but as 251 ballots, including the said 28 ballots, which had been counted for contestant by the election boards were actually rejected by the court, the contestee has nothing to complain of on this point. And as none of the other ballots—amounting to several thousands—are here, we have nothing before us to show whether or not the court committed any error in counting or rejecting any one of those ballots. The judgment must therefore be affirmed, unless appellant has some valid objection to its validity which goes to some point other than the ruling of the court on particular ballots; and we do not think there is any such valid objection.

The main objection is that the court found that contestee received only 4,001 legal votes, and that this finding is at variance and in conflict with an alleged averment in the complaint or "statement of contest" that contestee received 4,862 legal votes. But there is no specific averment that contestee received 4,862 legal votes. There is an averment that the election boards counted for the contestee, Treanor, "ballots which were not cast or voted for said contestee, but were cast and voted for this contestant, for said office"; and there is an averment that in a tabulated statement attached to the complaint designated as "Exhibit A," column G thereof, which foots up 4,862, shows the votes actually cast in said respective precincts for said Thomas W. Treanor; and appellant's contention is that this last averment as to column G precluded respondent from claiming, and the court from finding that appellant had less than 4,862 legal votes. But, taking the two averments above mentioned together, the phrase "actually cast" in the latter averment is apparently used in the same sense as in the former averment, where it clearly means that ballots containing the name of contestant were "counted and tallied or caused to be read" for contestee. And this would be a warrantable construction even if the rules applicable to ordinary civil actions applied here; while under the provisions of the Code relating to election contests a "statement of contest" is sufficient if the grounds of contest are alleged with such certainty as will advise the defendant of the particular proceeding or cause for which said election is contested. Code Civ. Proc. § 1117. And see Abbott v. Hartley (Cal.) 77 Pac. 410. The statement in the case at bar alleges various acts of misconduct by the election boards by which votes were counted for contestee which should not have been counted for him, and votes which should have been counted for contestant which were not so counted, and then avers that contestant actually received 5,083 or more "legal votes," and that the contestee "actually received a less number of legal votes than the contestant at such election." These averments fully present the real question which the court was called upon to decide, namely, who of the two parties actually received the greater number of legal votes. The case was tried on this theory without objection, and the attention of the court was not in any way called to what is now claimed to be a variance; and it is quite clear that appellant was in no way prejudiced by the alleged variance, even if it could be held that there was such a variance.

It is contended that the court erred in rejecting ballots because they had crosses after "No Nomination"; but this point has been definitely settled against appellant's contention, and the fact that there were a large number of such ballots does not affect the rule (McMenomy v. Ruch [Cal.] 75 Pac. 661; Merkley v. Trainor [Cal.] 75 Pac. 656); and the intent of the voter in making the distinguishing mark "cannot be shown other than by what appears upon the face of the ballot" (Maddux v. Walthall, 141 Cal. 412, 74 Pac. 1026).

The objection to the opening of the ballot pouches was without merit. They came from the clerk's office in the same condition as when received there, and there was no circumstance whatever to raise the slightest suspicion of their integrity.

The objections to contestant's want of compliance with the purity of election law, and the fact that the court did not find on that subject, need not be considered. Whether or not a contestant had complied with that law is a matter irrelevant to an election contest. Maddux v. Walthall, supra.

As to the matter of voters who were illegally assisted we cannot say, upon the evidence in the record, that the court erred in holding that not more than four of them voted for contestant. There is not even a fair doubt of the correctness of the ruling of more than one, or at the utmost two, of the other votes, and a different ruling as to them would not change the result.

There is no other point make by appellant that is tenable or that calls for special notice.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment on the ground that, the case having been tried and submitted to the court below on the theory that the pleadings did not contain a conclusive admission that the contestee, Trainor, received 4,862 legal votes, it is too late in this court to present a different construction of the pleadings, and claim here, for the first time, that the contestant is bound by the admission. King v. Davis, 34 Cal. 106; Lee v. Figg, 37 Cal. 336, 99 Am. Dec. 271; Hutchings v. Castle, 48 Cal. 156; Hughes v. Wheeler, 76 Cal. 230, 18 Pac. 386; Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 403, 25 Pac. 497; Willey v. Crocker, etc., Bank, 141 Cal. 518, 75 Pac. 106. I do not agree with the construction put upon the pleadings in this respect in the principal opinion. I concur in all other points.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The finding that Treanor received only 4,001 votes is in conflict with the fact clearly established by the pleadings that he received 4,862 votes. If the evidence established the fact as found, the pleadings might have been amended to conform to the proofs; but they were not amended, and must prevail. I cannot see any grounds for holding that the case was tried upon any theory as to the effect of the pleadings which precludes the contestee from raising this objection to the findings. No doubt it is technical, but the whole contest is based upon grounds equally technical.

TRIAL—DISMISSAL—LACHES.

1. A complaint in a suit to foreclose a mortgage was filed in 1898, and defendants answered in 1899. In June, 1900, the complaint was amended by stipulation. In July, 1901, defendants moved to dismiss for want of prosecution. In opposition to the motion, it was shown by affidavits that pending the suit negotiations for a settlement were entered into, and continued from time to time until October, 1900; that it was necessary to obtain the consent of a pledgee to a settlement; that in October, 1900, the pledgee became the absolute owner of the mortgage, and thereafter sought to procure a settlement; that defendants never asked that the action be tried. The answer of defendants did not deny the execution of the mortgage, nor aver payment, but alleged that the mortgage had been transferred. Held, that it was error to dismiss the cause for laches; defendants having shown no defense to the action.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; John M. Corcoran, Judge.

Action by the Merced Bank and another against James D. Price and others. From a judgment of dismissal entered on motion of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. W. Knox and F. H. Gould, for appellants. J. F. Peck and J. F. McSwain, for respondents.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from the judgment dismissing the action upon the application of the defendants. The ground upon which the dismissal was made, as stated in the notice of motion, and also in the order of the court granting the same, was that the plaintiff Merced Bank had neglected to prosecute the same with diligence, and that it had abandoned said cause. The action is upon a promissory note, and to foreclose a mortgage securing the same. The note was executed by defendants James D. Price, Jeff D. Price, Thomas Price, and George Price, in the sum of $6,500, and made payable to the Merced Bank or order; and the mortgage to secure the same was executed by the makers of the note, and, in addition thereto, Nettie L. Price and Mary Wilson, also part owners of the real estate covered by the mortgage. The complaint in the action was filed September 30, 1898, and summons thereon issued and returned within a year, and all the defendants answered September 25, 1899. June 8, 1900, by stipulation of all parties, the complaint was amended as to the description of the property embraced in the mortgage, and it was also stipulated that the answer of defendants to the original complaint might stand as an answer to the amended complaint. This stipulation was filed and an order made accordingly June 11, 1900. The notice of motion to dismiss for failure to prosecute was made, and filed July 26, 1901. Monday, August 12th, was noticed as the day set for hearing said motion; and in the meantime, on August 7th, a stipulation was prepared on the part of plaintiff's attorney, who was also the attorney of Sophie A. Ivett, who was then the owner and holder of the note and mortgage, to have said Ivett substituted in place of the original plaintiff, and to allow the action to proceed in her name, and that the said action might be tried on September 3d following, or as soon thereafter as counsel and the court could hear the same. Defendants' attorneys declined to sign this stipulation. The hearing of the motion to dismiss, however, was continued until October 1st. On the hearing J. W. Knox submitted his affidavit on behalf of the Merced Bank and Sophie A. Ivett. In his affidavit it is set forth that the note and mortgage were pledged by said bank to Sophie A. Ivett as collateral security for certain moneys due from said bank to her, which said pledge was in writing, but not recorded; that said note and mortgage remained so pledged until October 2, 1900, at which time, upon full settlement between said bank and said Sophie A. Ivett, and as part payment of the sum then due her from said bank, the bank sold, assigned, and transferred absolutely to her the said note and mortgage in suit; and that the same had then become the property of said Sophie A. Ivett. He further states in said affidavit that, after the answer of the defendants was filed, negotiations were entered into between the parties to the action for settlement of the same, which continued, off and on, until October 2, 1900, and that, by reason of the fact that the said note and mortgage sued on were pledged to said Sophie A. Ivett, it became necessary on the part of the original plaintiff to get her consent to a settlement of said suit for any less sum than the full amount due on said note and mortgage. It is further stated in said affidavit that the defendants never at any time asked that said action be set down for trial, or attempted to have said action set down for trial. The affidavit of said Sophie A. Ivett was also filed on said hearing. In this affidavit the affiant states that she has been anxious at all times since October 2, 1900, to have said suit compromised, settled, or tried, and disposed of, and has used every reasonable effort in her power to accomplish the same without sacrificing her rights in the matter, and is now anxious to have the said suit tried and disposed of at once, and hereby asks that an order be made by this court allowing said suit to continue in the name of the plaintiff for the use and benefit of said affiant, Sophie A. Ivett, she now being the owner and holder of the note and mortgage sued on in said action, or that said Sophie A. Ivett may be substituted as plaintiff in said action, and that prior to said October 2, 1900, she simply held said note and mortgage as a pledge.

The facts set forth in these affidavits with reference to the assignment of the note and mortgage by the Merced Bank by way of pledge, merely, in the first instance, and that the same were not assigned absolutely until a short time before the motion on the part of the defendants to dismiss the action, are not controverted on the part of the defendants. It is claimed, however, by defendants' counsel, that these facts merely raise an issue with the answer filed by defendants, and it is contended that such issue raised by the pleadings cannot be tried upon affidavits. The answer, however, entirely fails to raise any issue in reference to the merits of the action. It does not deny the execution of the note and mortgage, or aver payment thereof, or question the amount alleged to be due thereon, as set forth in the complaint. It merely denies that the amount claimed as attorney's fee is a reasonable sum to be allowed, but alleges, on the contrary, that $100 is a sufficient sum to be allowed as attorney's fee. It also avers that, before the action was brought, the plaintiff Merced Bank had assigned and delivered the note and mortgage to one S. A. Ivett, as administrator of the estate of J. L. Ivett, deceased, and alleges that certain probate proceedings in said estate resulted in vesting the absolute ownership of the note and mortgage in said S. A. Ivett. It further avers that prior to the filing of the complaint the note and mortgage had been indorsed, assigned, and transferred to the Bank of British Columbia, and that thereafter the same had been assigned and transferred to S. A. Ivett. None of the material allegations of the complaint having been controverted by the answer, for the purpose of the action they are deemed to be true, and the allegations in reference to the assignment are in the nature of new matter in avoidance of the action, and are deemed controverted by the opposite party. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. The burden of proving these matters in avoidance, therefore, was on the defendants. At the hearing of the motion to dismiss, there was an affirmative showing on the part of the plaintiff, which was not controverted, that the action was properly brought and continued up to that time, and that, upon the application of Sophie A. Ivett, who had become the absolute owner of the note and mortgage, a substitution of the party plaintiffs should have been granted, and the action allowed to proceed as requested.

The order dismissing the action was based solely upon the ground of failure to prosecute, and not for any of the causes enumerated in the Code. Nor could it well have been, as the service and return and appearance of the defendants, and other proceedings, were all within the time required by the Code. Conceding the power of the court in a proper case to dismiss a cause for laches, there was an abuse of discretion in the case at bar in exercising that power in favor of these defendants, who, as shown, had no defense whatever to the action upon the merits. Herman v. Pacific Mfg. Co., 131 Cal. 210, 63 Pac. 344.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to proceed in the case as herein suggested.

We concur: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.

WALL v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF DEAF, DUMB, AND BLIND ASYLUM et al. (S. F. 3,109.)

ASYLUM—POWERS—REMOVAL OF PHYSICIAN—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—"TEACHER OR EMPLOYÉ"—EJUSDEM GENERIS—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. The by-laws of a state asylum can confer no greater power on the institution than the statute under which it is organized gives it.

2. In a proceeding to test the validity of an order of the board of directors of the State Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Asylum to declare the office of physician thereof vacant before the expiration of plaintiff's term, a finding that the by-laws of the institution had been repealed previous to plaintiff's election makes the fact that plaintiff's election did not take place on the day prescribed in the by-laws immaterial on the question of the legality of plaintiff's election.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, declaring it to be a disputable presumption that official duty has been regularly performed, the fact that an order of repeal of the by-laws of a state institution was not passed by unanimous vote does not interfere with the correctness of a finding that the repeal was regular, in the absence of evidence to the contrary.

4. Pol. Code, § 2255, provides that the board of directors of the State Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Asylum shall have power: "(2) To elect the principal teacher; (3) to elect a treasurer; * * * (4) to elect a physician for the asylum for the term of two years, who shall not be a member of the board of directors; (5) to remove at pleasure any teacher or employee; (6) to fix the compensation of teachers and employees." Held, that the board has no power, notwithstanding subdivision 5, to remove the physician before the end of the term for which he has been elected.

5. Under direct provisions of Pen. Code, § 772, an officer neglecting or refusing to perform his official duties may be deprived of his office; and hence a contention that unless the physician of the State Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Asylum is included in Pol. Code, § 2255, subd. 5, empowering the board of directors of the State Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Asylum to remove at pleasure any teacher or employé, there is no provision for his removal, is untenable.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by B. P. Wall against the board of directors of the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind Asylum of the State of California and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. A. Moore and E. Nusbaumer, for appellants. Whitworth & Shurtleff and Charles A. Shurtleff, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff was elected by the defendant, June 2, 1899, to serve as physician of the institution for a term of two years from and after April 2, 1899, at a salary of $1,200 per year; but by an order of the board of date September 29, 1899, the office was declared vacant, and another physician appointed. This proceeding was commenced to test the validity of the latter order, which in the court below was adjudged to be void. The appeal is from the judgment. There is a bill of exceptions in the record, on which it is claimed that, in certain particulars to be adverted to, the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings. The points urged by the appellant are (1) that, under the by-laws of the board, it had the power to remove any officer or employé at will; (2) that it had the power to remove the plaintiff under the provisions of section 2255 of the Political Code, prescribing the powers and duties of the board; and (3) that the plaintiff was not legally elected. But of these, the first is manifestly untenable, for if, under the statute, the board had no power to remove the plaintiff, it could not confer such power on itself by its by-laws. And with regard to the third, it is equally clear that, on the evidence produced, the court was justified in finding that the plaintiff was legally elected. The record of his election is set out in defendant's answer, and if it be true that the election did not take place on the day prescribed by the by-laws, as is claimed by appellant, the fact would be immaterial, if the by-laws had been previously repealed; and that such is the case is expressly found by the court, and we think on sufficient evidence. It is, indeed, objected that the order of repeal was not passed by unanimous vote, which is true, and that it does not appear that the month's notice of intention to repeal, otherwise required by the by-laws, had been given. But the presumption is that the proceedings were regular (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15), and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the court was justified in so finding. Another objection urged is that the board had no power to elect the plaintiff retrospectively, for the period which had elapsed at the time of the election, which is perhaps true. But if this be so, the result would be merely that his term of two years would either commence at date of election, or would be proportionately shortened. Whether the one or the other need not now be determined.

It remains, therefore, to consider only "the powers of the board" under the statute, which, so far as material, are as follows: "(2) to elect the principal teacher; (3) to elect a treasurer, who shall not be a member of the board of directors; (4) to elect a physician for the asylum for the term of two years, who shall not be a member of the board of directors; (5) to remove, at pleasure, any teacher or employee; (6) to fix the compensation of teachers and employees." Pol. Code, § 2255. And by section 2268 it is provided that the "principal teacher is the chief executive officer of the asylum, with powers and duties as follows: * * * (2) With the consent of the board of directors, to fix the number of, and appoint and remove the assistant teachers and employees; (3) to prescribe and enforce the performance of the duties of the assistant teachers and employees," etc. Here the express provision is that the physician shall be elected "for the term of two years," which implies that he is not to be removed by the board or otherwise during the term prescribed; and this implication is strengthened by the failure to provide for a fixed term in the case of the "principal teacher" and "treasurer," who under section 16, art. 20, of the Constitution—if public officers, and otherwise, upon general principles—will hold only "during the pleasure of the board."

But this can be said only with the qualification that there be no other provision in the act indicating such intention; and such a provision, it is claimed by the appellant, is to be found in subdivision 5 of the section, empowering the board "to remove, at pleasure, any teacher or employee." But notwithstanding the generality of the term "employé," which includes officers (U. S. v. Maurice, 2 Brock. 96, Fed. Cas. No. 15,747, cited Patton v. Board of Health, 127 Cal. 394, 59 Pac. 702, 78 Am. St. Rep. 66), the claim is, we think, untenable. For, upon familiar principles, the coupling of the term "employé" with the antecedent term "teacher" indicates that the former is used in a restricted sense, as applying only to employés "of like kind" with "teachers," or, as otherwise expressed by the author, employés ejusdem generis (Broom's Max. 565–7, 570), by which is meant some kind or class of employés in which teachers are included; thus excluding classes of employés which do not include them. The terms used by the author, "kind" and "genus," refer to the familiar logical distinction between genus and species; and the principle may be technically expressed by saying that—to apply the maxim—the general class or genus of employés is to be regarded as divided into two species or kinds, the one excluding and the other including teachers, and that the term "employés" is to be construed as referring to the latter class only. Thus, for example, if we regard the genus employés as divided into the two species of officers and employés not officers, the rule would require that the expression "any teacher or employee" should be construed as excluding the former and applying only to the latter.

This is, in fact, assumed by both parties; and accordingly the question principally discussed in the briefs is whether the physician provided for in the act is or is not an officer, by which is meant a public officer, for that he is an officer cannot be doubted. This is an interesting question, and while, perhaps, not material to the principal question involved, is yet so connected with it as to require discussion. In considering it, it is to be observed, the election of principal teacher, treasurer, and physician is provided for, in identical terms, in three consecutive subdivisions; and from this, and the essential similarity of their employments, these must be regarded as constituting a class apart from other employés, and each as coming within the application of the maxim, "Noscitur a sociis." It will be proper, therefore, first to consider the question with reference to the class generally, and afterwards to refer to their differences. Pursuing this course, it is to be observed that all these officers are of a permanent nature; that they involve the performance of public functions; and that they are created, and the election of the officers provided for, by the sovereign Legislature. Such offices are therefore essentially distinguished from employments existing only in the discretion of the board, and involving the performance of duties more or less casual and temporary; and hence, under any definition of the term, their incumbents may well be regarded as public officers. Patton v. Board of Health, 127 Cal. 388, 59 Pac. 702, 78 Am. St. Rep. 66; People v. Harrington, 63 Cal. 257; People v. Wheeler, 136 Cal. 652, 69 Pac. 435. This is sufficiently manifest with regard to the principal teacher and treasurer; and, indeed, the former is expressly designated in the act as the "chief executive officer" of the asylum. Nor can the case of the physician be distinguished in any essential particular. He therefore comes clearly within the application of the maxim cited. But whether or not we call the officers named public officers, the same reasons which lead us to distinguish officers from employés, and consequently the same rule, equally applies to them. They must therefore be regarded, with reference to the question before us, if not as public officers, at least as quasi such. Having regard, therefore, to the intention of the act, it would seem unreasonable to suppose that such officers or quasi officers come within the purview of the provision in the fifth subdivision of the section. Or at least, if such a construction be admissible, or even if it be probable, it is not so clearly so as to warrant us in disregarding the express terms of the fourth subdivision of the section, or the intention of the Legislature thus clearly manifested that the term of the physician shall be for two years.

It is, indeed, urged by the appellant that, upon this restricted construction of the term "employé" in this and in the sixth subdivision of the section, there would be no provision in the act either for the removal or for the compensation of the officer in question. But as to his removal, that is provided for by the general law. Pen. Code, § 772. Otherwise there would be a defect in the law, which is but an additional reason for regarding him as such. As to compensation, assuming that the term "employés" is used in the sixth subdivision in the larger sense, so as to include the officers or quasi officers of the institution, yet it would not follow that it is to be so construed in other parts of the act. Such would be the common rule, but, where the occasion demands it, "the same words may have different constructions to effectuate the intention" of the act. Potter's Dwarris on Stat. 194–6. Nor, giving the term in question the restricted construction we have assigned to it, is it clear that the power to elect does not, in the absence of statutory provision, include the power to provide for the compensation of the elected officer (Civ. Code, § 3522; Broom's Max. 463); and, if it be otherwise, all that can be said is that there is a defect in the law. On the other hand, giving to the appellant's argument all the force that can be possibly given it, it is more than counteracted by the use of the same term in the second and third subdivisions of section 2268, Pol. Code, where the principal teacher is authorized "to appoint and remove the assistant teachers and employees," and to prescribe and enforce their duties; and where the term "employés" cannot be construed as applying to the permanent officers or quasi officers of the institution without making these provisions repugnant to other provisions of the act.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed: SHAW, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

GIBSON et al. v. ANDERSON. (S. F. 3,020.)

REAL ACTIONS—COSTS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, provides that costs are allowed of course to the plaintiff upon a judgment in his favor in an action for the recovery of real property, and in an action which involves the title or possession of real property; and section 1025 declares that, in an action other than those mentioned in section 1022, costs may be allowed, or not, in the discretion of the court. Held, that where plaintiffs, in an action between heirs to set aside certain conveyances of real estate by deceased to defendants, were successful, they were entitled to costs as of right.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; A. L. Rhodes, Judge.

Action by Henry Gibson and others against Manetta Anderson. From that part of a judgment in favor of plaintiffs denying costs, they appeal. Reversed.

Will M. Beggs and W. C. Kennedy, for appellants. W. A. Bowden, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action to annul a deed to certain lands. Plaintiffs had judgment. They appeal from the part of the judgment which denied them their costs of suit.

Respondent's contention is that "in this class of cases the allowance of costs is a matter of discretion to be exercised by the trial court." Citing Code Civ. Proc. § 1025; Abram v. Stuart, 96 Cal. 235, 31 Pac. 44; Irvine v. Perry, 119 Cal. 352, 51 Pac. 544, 949; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 149, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Senior v. Anderson, 130 Cal. 290, 62 Pac. 563; and other cases. Appellants claim that the action involved the title or possession to real estate, and that plaintiffs were entitled to their costs as matter of right, under section 1022, Code Civ. Proc.

Plaintiffs and defendant are children of Sarah Gibson, now deceased, who in her lifetime, in April, 1896, conveyed certain real property situated in Los Gatos, Cal., and certain other real property situated in the city of Omaha, Neb., to defendant by two separate deeds of gift. It is alleged in the complaint and found by the court that at the time of these conveyances Mrs. Gibson was advanced in years, and that her mental and physical powers were somewhat impaired; that she was under the care and control of defendant, who had great influence over her; and that the conveyances of said real property were upon the understanding that their purpose was to prevent any of the children of Mrs. Gibson from procuring a conveyance from her of said lands, and that the defendant should hold the title to said property for the use of her mother, and that she should reconvey to her the title whenever requested so to do; and that defendant would support her mother during her natural life. It also appeared that Mrs. Gibson died testate in April, 1897, and the plaintiffs and defendant were her heirs at law and the devisees of her will, and that her will was admitted to probate April 30, 1897; that prior to her death, and not long after making said conveyances, she demanded of defendant that she reconvey said lands to her, but defendant refused to do so. The title to the property was alleged and found to be in defendant by virtue of said conveyances, but the conclusion of law from the findings was that "plaintiffs are entitled to judgment to the effect that the said deed of conveyance of the Los Gatos property be annulled and adjudged to be void, but without their costs of suit in this action expended." The conveyance of the Omaha property was not referred to in the judgment.

The foregoing is sufficient to illustrate the character of the action. Section 1022, Code Civ. Proc., provides that: "Costs are allowed, of course, to the plaintiff, upon a judgment in his favor in the following cases: (1) In an action for the recovery of real property. * * * (5) In an action which involves the title or possession of real property." In an action other than those mentioned in section 1022, costs may be allowed, or not, in the discretion of the court. Id. § 1025. The pleadings, findings, and judgment all go to show that the action involved the title to the land in question, and, although plaintiffs recovered as to part of the land only, they were entitled to their costs as matter of right. In the recent case of Sierra Water & M. Co. v. Wolff (Cal.) 77 Pac. 1038, which was an action to quiet title, it was held that the question of costs does not depend upon the form or nature of the action—whether legal or equitable—but depends rather upon the fact whether the case comes within the terms of the statute relating to costs, namely, section 1022, supra. It was also held that because plaintiffs in that action recovered judgment for part only of the land in controversy did not change the fact that they had judgment in their favor.

Plaintiffs moved the court, under section 663, Code Civ. Proc., to amend the conclusions of law, and to vacate that part of the judgment disallowing their costs of suit, and to enter judgment for their costs. Such motion is authorized by the Code provision supra. Shafer v. Lacy, 121 Cal. 574, 54 Pac. 72.

It is advised that the case be remanded, with directions to set aside that part of the judgment relating to costs; to correct the conclusion of law, conforming to the foregoing opinion; and to amend the judgment by awarding costs to plaintiffs; and, as thus amended, the judgment to stand affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the case is remanded, with directions to set aside that part of the judgment relating to costs; to correct the conclusions of law, conforming to the foregoing opinion; and to amend the judgment by awarding costs to plaintiffs; and, as thus amended, the judgment will stand affirmed: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

HOLMES v. WARREN. (S. F. 3,096.)

APPEAL FROM ORDER DENYING NEW TRIAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—OVERRULING DEMURRER—INSUFFICIENCY OF FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—PLEADING—PROOF OF NEGATIVE ALLEGATIONS—DEEDS—DEED AS MORTGAGE—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY.

1. The overruling of a demurrer cannot be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

2. The sufficiency of the complaint to support the judgment cannot be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

3. The sufficiency of the findings to sustain the judgment cannot be reviewed on appeal from an order denying a new trial.

4. Where, in a suit to recover land, the complaint alleged that the premises were not agricultural land, and the answer denied it, the land being a little over an acre in a city and having a dwelling house on it, the burden of showing that it was agricultural land, within the meaning of the Code, was on defendant; Code Civ. Proc. § 1869, providing that every party must prove his own affirmative allegations, and that evidence need not be given in support of a negative allegation.

5. On appeal from an order denying a new trial, the only questions reviewable are those relating to alleged errors of law, and whether the findings are supported by the evidence.

6. On an issue as to whether a deed absolute in form was an absolute conveyance or a mortgage, it was proper to admit in evidence a receipt given by the grantor to the grantee for money, which stated that it was a final payment in purchase of land as per the deed in question.

7. On an issue as to whether a deed absolute in form was an absolute conveyance or a mortgage, it was proper to admit in evidence a contract between the parties whereby the grantee agreed to sell the land to the grantor for a certain price before a specified date.

8. On an issue as to whether a deed absolute in form was intended as an absolute conveyance or as a mortgage, the test is whether there was a subsisting debt after the conveyance.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Suit by Henry T. Holmes against Joseph M. Warren. Judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore and Howard J. Peirsol, for appellant. Lincoln Sonntag, and R. E. Hewitt, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial, and comes up on a bill of exceptions used on the hearing of said motion. The action is for the recovery of a lot or tract of land on the east shore of Lake Merritt, in the city of Oakland. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant entered into possession of the premises in question under a lease for the term of two years, and thereafter remained in possession, without the consent of the plaintiff, after the expiration of the two years' term, and refused to surrender possession of said premises after demand therefor duly made. It is averred in the answer that a deed executed by the defendant and wife of the premises in controversy, bearing date August 19, 1895, was not intended as an absolute conveyance, but was a mortgage, and that defendant did not enter into possession under the lease, but had been in possession as owner for years, and continued in possession after the execution of the deed, and up to the time of the commencement of the action, as the real owner. The court found that on the 19th day of August, 1895, the defendant, Joseph M. Warren, and his wife made, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to the plaintiff a deed of grant, bargain, and sale of the land and premises in question, for the consideration of $3,000, with the intent that the said instrument should be an absolute conveyance; that the same was not executed and delivered as security for the payment to the plaintiff of the sum of $3,000, or the performance of any other act or obligation, and that the same was not in fact a mortgage, and did convey the title and ownership of said real property to the plaintiff, and released the claim of ownership of the parties who executed said deed as aforesaid; that on the 20th day of August, 1895, the plaintiff executed and delivered to the defendant a lease in writing, whereby he leased to the defendant, and the defendant hired and leased from the plaintiff, the real property in question for the term of two years from the 19th day of August, 1895; that the defendant possessed and occupied the said premises under the said lease to the 19th day of August, 1897, and the term expired on that date; that upon the expiration of the term of said lease the defendant remained in possession and occupation of said real property without the consent of the plaintiff, and withheld the possession of said premises from the plaintiff, and excluded him therefrom; that on the 25th day of May, 1899, the plaintiff demanded the possession of said premises from the defendant, and he then and there refused to surrender them to the plaintiff.

The first point made by the appellant is that the demurrer to the second amended complaint was improperly overruled. The appeal being only from the order denying the motion for a new trial, and not from the judgment, this question cannot be considered. And whether the complaint is sufficient to support the judgment, or whether the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint, can be considered only upon an appeal from the judgment. Neither of these matters is involved in the re-examination of an issue of fact after the trial and decision. An appeal from an order denying a new trial does not involve any consideration of the correctness of the judgment. The motion for a new trial is an issue of a distinct proceeding, and is to be heard upon an independent record, distinct from the record upon which the judgment depends. Bode v. Lee, 102 Cal. 583, 36 Pac. 936; Taylor v. Hill, 115 Cal. 143, 44 Pac. 336, 46 Pac. 922; Hall v. Susskind, 120 Cal. 560, 53 Pac. 46; Schroeder v. Pissis, 128 Cal. 209, 60 Pac. 758; Byxbee v. Dewey, 128 Cal. 322, 60 Pac. 847.

The appellant also makes the point that a nonsuit should have been granted, and his counsel urges, as a reason therefor, insufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action, saying, "There was not a sufficient complaint to which any evidence offered by the plaintiff could be applied;" and, further, "Even if the complaint was sufficient, the evidence adduced failed to support it." As to the first branch under this point, that the complaint was insufficient, what has been said with reference to the demurrer will apply also to this. On the other branch of the point, that the evidence is insufficient, an inspection of the record satisfies us that the court was warranted in refusing the motion for a nonsuit.

Appellant also makes the point that the findings are insufficient to sustain the judgment; but, for the reasons already given in reference to the demurrer to the complaint, and upon the authorities cited under that head, the appellant is precluded from raising this question, there being no appeal from the judgment.

The complaint alleges that the premises in question are not agricultural land. The answer denies this. There was no evidence offered on this subject, and the findings are silent with reference thereto. It does "not devolve upon the plaintiff to prove his negative allegations." Code Civ. Proc. § 1869; Petaluma Paving Co. v. Singley, 136 Cal. 616, 69 Pac. 426. The tract of land or lot was only an acre and one-twelfth, and situate, as already stated, in the city of Oakland. It had a dwelling house and other improvements. Therefore it could not well be presumed to be a country farm or agricultural land, and the burden of showing that it was agricultural land, within the meaning of the Code, was upon the defendant, and no evidence was introduced upon that subject. Hence the decision is not against law.

On this appeal the only questions discussed by counsel that we are at liberty to consider are those relating to alleged errors of law, and also as to whether the findings are supported by the evidence. Schroeder v. Pissis, supra; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 41 Pac. 299. The alleged errors in law occurring at the trial, as urged by appellant's counsel, consist in the admission in evidence of certain documents to which objection was made and exception taken. These are as follows: As a part of the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff in reference to the transaction resulting in the conveyance to the plaintiff of the property in question, a receipt from the Union Savings Bank of Oakland to the plaintiff for $2,118.25 was offered in evidence, and objected to on the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, which objection was overruled by the court, and the receipt was read in evidence. The plaintiff continued, testifying: "That represents $2,118.25. It has been in my possession ever since the 19th of August, 1895. I paid Mrs. Muller $318 on the note secured by the second mortgage on the property described in the complaint." (Receipt shown and offered in evidence, which was objected to on the same grounds as the preceding; objection overruled and exception taken, and read in evidence.) This receipt reads as follows: "August 20, 1895. Received of H. T. Holmes, Two Hundred and Ninety-one 25-100 Dollars, being final payment in purchase of land City of Oakland, Alameda Co., as per deed dated August 19, 1895 (Jos. M. Warren and wife to H. T. Holmes). 291.55. Joseph M. Warren." It is also contended that the court erred in admitting in evidence the agreement between the plaintiff and defendant for the sale and purchase of the land. By this agreement the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant, clear of incumbrances, the land in question, on or before the 20th day of August, 1897, for the sum of $3,000, with 8 per cent. on that amount to the date of sale. Appended to this agreement is the following: "And the said Joseph M. Warren and Lizzie F. Warren hereby agree that should we not have paid the amount heretofore stated to H. T. Holmes in purchase of said land on or before the 20th day of August, 1897, then and in that case this agreement shall lapse and become of no effect, and we shall have no claim whatever thereunder against said H. T. Holmes or against the said land." Signed and acknowledged by Jos. M. Warren and Lizzie F. Warren. These several instruments objected to by defendant were introduced as a part of the evidence in support of the contention of the plaintiff that the instrument of August 19, 1895, executed by defendant and his wife to the plaintiff, was a conveyance in fee instead of a mortgage, and, as such, were properly admitted for that purpose.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision. The facts and circumstances disclosed by the record, if true, are sufficient to support the findings, and even if there were a substantial conflict in the evidence, which we do not think is the case here, the findings and decision of the court below would be conclusive.

The case seemingly most relied upon by the appellant, as it appears to be cited in his brief several times, is that of De Carrion v. De Aguayo (decided by this court in June, 1901) 65 Pac. 618, but not carried into the California Reports. In that case the court found the deed, although purporting to be a conveyance in fee, to be a mortgage. It is said in the decision: "After the deed was made, defendants continued in possession of the premises as before. They never paid any rent or leased the premises. They continued to make small improvements as before. Nothing appears as to any agreement of sale having been made, or any price being named for the deed. * * * There was testimony on the part of the plaintiff tending to contradict some of the matters above set forth. But, in case of a substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding of the court below is conclusive here. Not only this, but we think the finding is supported by the great preponderance of the evidence. If Saturnino Carrion took the deed from defendants in June, 1892, as an absolute conveyance of the property, it is strange that nothing was said in the negotiations as to the price thereof. * * * If Carrion had in fact purchased the property, it would seem that in the ordinary course of business he would have entered into possession of it, or, if he allowed defendant to remain in possession, it would have been under a lease of some kind." Here, as already shown, the plaintiff paid $3,000 for the property, and thereafter gave the defendant a lease of the premises for a definite period, and also entered into an agreement to convey the land at a stipulated price within a certain period, making the case altogether different from the one relied upon by appellant.

In this case there is no pretense that Holmes, after the transaction in question, could have maintained an action against Warren to recover the $3,000 mentioned as the consideration of the deed in question, and the test in all this class of cases is, was there a subsisting debt after the conveyance? for, to be a mortgage, there must necessarily be a debt for which the conveyance is security. As said in Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22, "If there is no debt, there is no mortgage." And in Ganceart v. Henry, 98 Cal. 281, 33 Pac. 92, it is said: "A deed of conveyance absolute on its face is certainly some evidence that the transaction is what it purports to be, viz., a sale. To establish an equity superior to the deed, and authorize a determination that the deed was given as security for an existing debt, the testimony, if parol in character, should establish a clear case"—citing Hopper v. Jones, 29 Cal. 19, and Henley v. Hotaling, supra. In Bryant v. Broadwell, 140 Cal. 490, 74 Pac. 33, in the opinion, it is said: "Defendant's claim that the deed was in fact executed as a mortgage finds considerable support in the evidence, but there was evidence contrary thereto sufficient to sustain the finding. It must be borne in mind in this connection that, if a deed purports on its face to grant real property, the burden is on the party claiming it to be only a mortgage to establish that fact." Here that was not done.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BELL v. PLEASANT et al. (S. F. 2,940.)*

DEEDS—RECORD—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—MORTGAGES—BURDEN OF PROOF—PLEADING—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTOR—TRANSCRIPT—COSTS.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 1214, providing that every conveyance, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, is void, as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded, and section 1217, providing that an unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof, where a subsequent purchaser of real estate, whose deed is recorded, claims title against a prior grantee under an unrecorded deed, the burden is upon the former to prove that he is a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration.

2. In an action to recover real estate by one claiming under a prior unrecorded deed, as against defendants, claiming under a subsequent recorded deed, the fact that plaintiff alleged in his petition that defendants had notice of plaintiff's title at the time they took their conveyance, and that such allegation was traversed, did not shift the burden of proof on the issue of notice to plaintiff.

3. In an action to recover real estate between parties holding under different deeds from a common grantor, it was immaterial that, prior to their conveyance, legal title to the property had been vested in trustees to secure an outstanding debt, which had been renewed, the rights of all of the parties being subject to such lien.

4. Where, in an action to recover real estate between parties claiming under different deeds from a common source, plaintiff claimed that defendants' claim was, in legal effect, a mere mortgage to secure a debt, declarations made by the grantor of such deed at the time of the transaction and subsequent thereto were admissible on such issue.

5. Where, in an action to recover land, the court, before the transcript of the testimony was written up, ordered that the same should be prepared at the equal expense of both parties, the successful party, having paid one-half of such cost, was entitled to have the amount thereof allowed as a part of the costs in the case.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by Teresa Bell against Mary E. Pleasant and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, she appeals. Reversed.

T. J. Butts and T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Edmund Tauszky, Wallace A. Wise, and Black & Leaming, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the plaintiff against the defendants to cancel a deed executed by the defendant Mary E. Pleasant to the defendant Solomons on February 4, 1897, and certain other deeds thereafter executed by the defendant Solomons and his successors, whereby the title acquired by Solomons was vested in the defendant Leo Block. The defendants appeared and answered, and, after trial, findings were made in favor of the defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The complaint, in substance, alleges that prior to September 27, 1891, the defendant Mary E. Pleasant held the legal title to the property as trustee for the use and benefit of the plaintiff; that on that day she executed a deed to the plaintiff, conveying to her the property in question, but that said deed had never been recorded; that afterwards, on February 4, 1897, with the intention to cheat and defraud the plaintiff, the said Mary E. Pleasant executed another deed, purporting to convey the same property to the defendant Solomons, which deed was duly recorded; and that subsequently, by mesne conveyances, the title acquired by Solomons under said deed became vested in the defendant Leo Block. It is further alleged that the defendant Solomons and each of his successors, including the defendant Leo Block, took their respective deeds with knowledge of the fact that the land was the property of plaintiff. The court found that Solomons and each of his grantees took their respective conveyances without any notice, knowledge, or information whatever as to the claim, right, title, or interest of the plaintiff. It is contended by the plaintiff that this finding is not supported by the evidence.

It is not seriously contended by the defendants that there is any affirmative evidence to the effect that they, or either of them, received their respective deeds without notice of the rights of the plaintiff, and upon an examination of the evidence we find nothing in support of such finding. The claim of the defendants is that the burden of proof to show notice of plaintiff's right on the part of Solomons and his successive grantees rests on the plaintiff, and that, in the absence of evidence on the subject, the court necessarily made the finding that they took without such notice. In this we think the defendants are mistaken, and the court erred. It has been repeatedly decided by this court that where one holding under an unrecorded deed brings an action involving the respective titles to the land against a subsequent grantee under a deed which is first recorded, the first grantee will prevail, unless the second grantee not only shows the making and recording of his deed, but also that he made his purchase and paid the price in good faith, and without knowledge of the rights of the previous grantee. The question depends on the effect of the rule embodied in sections 1214 and 1217 of the Civil Code, which are as follows:

"Sec. 1214. Every conveyance of real property other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, is void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee of the same property, or any part thereof, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded, and as against any judgment affecting the title, unless such conveyance shall have been duly recorded prior to the record of notice of action."

"Sec. 1217. An unrecorded instrument is valid as between the parties thereto and those who have notice thereof."

The first case on the subject is Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 218, which was decided before the enactment of the Code. It is there held that where a subsequent buyer, whose deed is recorded, claims title against a previous grantee under an unrecorded deed, the burden is upon the subsequent buyer to prove that he "is a purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration." The rule was laid down thus in Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 167, 3 Pac. 644: "To entitle a party to protection as such a purchaser, he must aver and prove the possession of his grantor, the purchase of the premises, the payment of the purchase money in good faith, and without notice, actual or constructive, prior to and down to the time of its payment." The same doctrine has been approved and followed by this court in the following cases: Landers v. Bolton, 26 Cal. 419; Isenhoot v. Chamberlain, 59 Cal. 639; Wilhoit v. Lyons, 98 Cal. 413, 33 Pac. 325; County Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Fox, 119 Cal. 64, 51 Pac. 11; Beattie v. Crewdson, 124 Cal. 579, 57 Pac. 463; Alcorn v. Buschke, 133 Cal. 658, 66 Pac. 15; Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 45, 73 Pac. 803; Cal. C. F. Ass'n v. Stelling, 141 Cal. 719, 75 Pac. 320. It also prevails in the United States courts. Boone v. Chiles, 35 U. S. (10 Pet.) 211, 9 L. Ed. 388. In view of these numerous decisions, it must be conceded that the rule contended for by the plaintiff is firmly established, notwithstanding one or two cases which seem to state the opposite rule. In Fair v. Stevenot, 29 Cal. 487, the opinion seems to be written upon the assumption that the burden in such cases was on the claimant under the prior unrecorded deed to show notice of his right to the second grantee, but there is nothing in the decision upon that exact point, and it cannot be taken as a statement of the doctrine. In Smith v. Yule, 31 Cal. 184, 89 Am. Dec. 167, it is said that notice, either actual or constructive, to the second grantee, must be clearly shown, before the claimant under an unrecorded deed can prevail against a subsequent grantee for a valuable consideration. The ground of this position, as stated, is that if a second grantee, knowing of the previous conveyance, should nevertheless purchase the property and attempt to assert title thereto, such conduct would constitute fraud on his part, and that the case comes under the rule that fraud is never presumed, but must always be proven. This is the only case which states the rule contrary to the numerous decisions above cited, and it must be considered as overruled. There is a line of cases which the defendants contend establish a contrary rule, but upon examination it will be seen that there is a clear distinction between them and the case at bar. Thus it has been invariably held that in a suit by a beneficiary to enforce a resulting or constructive trust against a grantee of the trustee, in cases where the trustee held under a deed purporting to convey the legal title, without terms indicating the trust, it was incumbent upon plaintiff not only to prove the facts establishing a trust, but also to prove that the grantee of the trustee took his conveyance with notice of the equities of the plaintiff. In Wyrick v. Weck, 68 Cal. 8, 8 Pac. 522, which was a case of this character, the court said: "It is said that the defense of a bona fide purchaser without notice is in the nature of new matter, the burden of proving which is upon the defendant. Ordinarily this is so." And the court proceeds to show that in that particular kind of cases the rule is different. The same proposition is stated and the distinction noted in Tillaux v. Tillaux, 115 Cal. 674, 47 Pac. 691, and in Warnock v. Harlow, 96 Cal. 298, 31 Pac. 166, 31 Am. St. Rep. 209. This principle is also applied in cases of suits by a purchaser under a judgment and execution sale against a grantee of the judgment debtor, where the plaintiff claims that the conveyance by the debtor to the grantee was fraudulent and void as against creditors. Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 666, 58 Pac. 264. In such cases the burden is on the creditor to prove the fraudulent intent of the debtor in executing the deed. If thereupon the grantee proves that he paid a valuable consideration, the burden is then imposed on the creditor to prove notice of such fraudulent intent to the grantee at the time of his purchase, or before payment of the price. The underlying reason for this rule in these cases is that as the debtor or trustee, as the case may be, holds the legal title at the time of the conveyance, the legal effect of his deed is to convey that title to his grantee, and thus there is established a legal condition which inures to the benefit of the grantee, and cannot be changed in equity, except by proof of circumstances to show a superior equity in the party who disputes it. Equity follows the law, and, a legal condition or status being once established, the burden of proof of facts necessary in equity to change the status is upon him who asserts the equitable right. A similar proposition was involved in Garber v. Gianella, 98 Cal. 527, 33 Pac. 458, and the same rule was applied. In Wyrick v. Weck, supra, it is said: "If there were matters in pais tending to show notice of plaintiffs' rights at the time of such purchase, * * * it was necessary for the plaintiffs to make the proofs, for without such proof the title must remain where plaintiffs have alleged it to be—in defendants." And in Casey v. Leggett, supra, it was said concerning the deed by the debtor to his grantee: "The deed having been made for a valuable consideration and delivered to the grantee, the law presumes that the grantee rightfully acquired a title to the property." In the case at bar and other similar cases, however, the conditions are precisely the reverse, and the principle operates against the defendant. A subsequent deed by the grantor to another person does not of its own force convey any title, for the grantor, having previously parted with his title, has left in himself nothing to convey, and his deed alone can therefore convey nothing. It can only be effective, as against the first grantee, when supplemented by proof that it was first recorded, and that the grantee therein named purchased for value, and without notice of the prior deed, or of the rights of the first grantee. This, also, is an attempt to change a legal condition. The necessary facts cannot be presumed in favor of the second grantee, and hence the burden is on him to make the supplementary proof. The case of Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 480, 58 Pac. 910, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, is cited by the defendants in support of their contention on this point. In that case it was held that a purchaser of a negotiable instrument having shown that he bought it for a valuable consideration before maturity, the plaintiff, in an action against him to cancel the note on account of fraud in procuring its execution, must prove that the purchaser at the time he bought had notice of the fraud. The same proposition is decided in Jordan v. Grover, 99 Cal. 194, 33 Pac. 889; Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 263, 35 Pac. 873; and Sinkler v. Siljan, 136 Cal. 356, 68 Pac. 1024. These cases, however, manifestly rest upon the same ground as Casey v. Leggett, Wyrick v. Weck, and similar cases, above cited. The indorsement of a note carries the legal title to the note and vests it in the indorsee, and, if it is shown by him that he bought for a valuable consideration before maturity, his legal title cannot be divested, nor his right to recover defeated, without the proof which shows his purchase to have been fraudulent, namely, that he had notice of the lack of consideration or of the fraud, or other defense of the maker. They in fact apply the same principle as the many decisions above cited holding that, in a suit between a prior grantee under an unrecorded deed, and a second grantee whose deed is first recorded, the burden is upon the second grantee to prove that he purchased without notice of the other's rights, and for a valuable consideration. It follows that, in the absence of any evidence on the subject, the finding should have been in favor of plaintiff on this point.

Defendants claim that plaintiff must prove that defendants had notice, because it is one of the facts alleged in her complaint and denied in the answer. This, however, is not the test. The plaintiff was obliged to prove only those facts which were necessary to constitute her cause of action. If she has alleged some fact not necessary to her case, but which is, in effect, a traverse of some fact which might have been alleged in defense to her action, and the defendant denies such allegation, this does not change the burden of proof, nor require the plaintiff to introduce any evidence upon that subject until the defendant has produced evidence thereon which makes rebuttal evidence on her part necessary. She is not obliged thus to anticipate a possible defense.

The court found that at the time of the execution of the deed by Mary E. Pleasant to Solomons the plaintiff was the owner of the property. Hence the further finding that the deed to Solomons and his deed to his successors in interest were executed for a valuable consideration was not alone sufficient to defeat the title of the plaintiff and authorize a judgment for the defendants. It required the aid of the other finding that Solomons, or some one of the successive grantees under him, took without notice of plaintiff's rights. As this latter finding is not sustained by the evidence, it follows that a new trial should have been granted.

We do not consider as important the facts which are undisputed, that ever since the year 1883 the technical legal title to the premises has been vested in certain trustees to secure an outstanding debt of $15,000 to the savings and loan society, and that this trust has been kept in force by renewals from time to time. Since 1891 the plaintiff has been the owner of the property subject to the trust, and the rules we have been considering are as much applicable to her estate therein as they would be if the trust deed had not existed. None of the defendants claim any rights under the trust, but all rights of both plaintiff and defendants are alike subject thereto.

The plaintiff asserts that the court erred in admitting in evidence certain declarations of Mary E. Pleasant to the plaintiff at and subsequent to the execution of the deed from Pleasant to Solomons. The plaintiff's point is that, at the time the plaintiff was the owner of the property in controversy, Mary E. Pleasant occupied the position of a previous owner, and that the declarations of a previous owner affecting title to the property, made after such owner has parted with the title, and not in the presence of the grantee, are not admissible against a grantee. There can be no dispute concerning the correctness of this rule, but we do not think it is applicable in this particular instance. The defendants claimed title as innocent purchasers for a valuable consideration under a subsequent deed from the plaintiff's grantor. The plaintiff claimed that the deed from Mary E. Pleasant to Solomons, under which the defendants claimed, was in legal effect a mere mortgage to secure a debt, and hence that it did not convey any title whatever. The defendants were therefore required to meet both propositions: First, they had a right to show that Solomons or any of his successors was a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice of the plaintiff's rights; and, secondly, they had to meet the contention that the deed under which they claimed did not convey the legal title, but was in effect a mortgage. On the latter proposition it was competent to show the declarations made by Mary E. Pleasant at the time of the transaction and subsequent thereto with respect to that particular question. As we understand the record, these declarations were admitted solely for that purpose.

Plaintiff further alleges that the court erred in denying her motion to strike from the cost bill the item of $122.50 for one-half of the cost of transcribing the testimony. The item was properly allowed. Before the transcript was written up, the court made an order that it should be done; the expense to be borne equally by both sides. Upon the making of this order, the prevailing party, having paid one-half of the cost of writing up the testimony, was entitled to have it included in the cost bill, and allowed as part of the costs of the case. Barkly v. Copeland, 86 Cal. 493, 25 Pac. 3. If the judgment and order had been affirmed upon this appeal, this item of cost would remain as a part of the costs properly chargeable against the plaintiff. It is necessary, however, to reverse the order denying a motion for a new trial, and the effect is that this item of costs is again set at large, to be determined by the court upon a subsequent trial of the case.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

In re MURPHY'S ESTATE. (S. F. 3,972.)

MURPHY v. O'CONNOR et al.*

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — PARTIAL DISTRIBUTION—PETITION—RIGHTS OF EXECUTRIX—DEVISEES — DEFENSES — JUDGMENT — APPEAL—PERSONS INTERESTED.

1. Where, on an application by legatees for a partial distribution, the executrix raised an issue as to the sufficiency of the petition to show sufficient assets to pay the legacies without loss to creditors, both the power of the executrix to comply with an order directing such distribution and the petitioners' right to an immediate distribution were involved, on both of which questions the executrix was interested, personally and on behalf of creditors, and hence was entitled to appeal therefrom.

2. A petition by legatees for the partial distribution of an estate, in the exact language of Code Civ. Proc. § 1661, declaring "that said estate is but little indebted, and that the shares and legacies of petitioners may now be allowed to them without loss to creditors of the estate," was sufficient as against the executrix.

3. An executrix in her representative capacity is not entitled to object to the payment of legatees on the ground that they had forfeited their right to the legacies by an alleged violation of a provision in the will that, if any one therein named should contest the will, he or she should take nothing under it.

4. Where, on a petition for partial distribution to legatees, the other legatees and devisees did not appear at the hearing, or in any manner object to the order in favor of petitioners, but an appeal was taken by the executrix in her representative capacity only on the ground that the petition was insufficient in respect to its statements as to the condition and value of the estate and the amount of the debts, the order of distribution became final in so far as it allowed the legacies.

5. Where an executrix appeared and contested a petition by legatees for partial distribution in her capacity as executrix only, such appearance did not entitle her to claim rights in such proceeding which she possessed only as devisee, as to which she should be considered as having made default.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Application by Margaret M. O'Connor and another for a partial distribution of the estate of John Murphy, deceased. From an order in favor of petitioners, Anna J. Murphy, as executrix, appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. William E. White and Edward C. Harrison, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by Anna J. Murphy, in her capacity as executrix of the estate of John Murphy, deceased, from an order of partial distribution directing her, as such executrix, to pay to each of the two respondents a legacy of $500 bequeathed to them, respectively, by the will of the deceased.

The respondents claim that, under the facts shown in the record, the only effect of the partial distribution is to reduce the residue of the estate to the extent of the legacies distributed; that it affects the interests of the residuary devisees only, and hence, they say, the executrix, as such, has no interest in the controversy, is not a "party aggrieved" by the order, and has no right of appeal therefrom. It may be conceded that this would be the case if the facts showed no other grounds of appeal than above stated. But the appellant presents for review an issue at law as to the sufficiency of the petition to show that there were sufficient assets to pay the legacies without loss to the creditors. In such a case both the power of the executrix to comply with the order and the right to an immediate distribution are involved, and upon these question the executrix is, both personally and on behalf of the creditors, interested, and has a clear right to appeal. *Rehearing denied December 22, 1904.

This issue is presented by demurrer to the petition for partial distribution. The grounds of the demurrer are that the facts stated do not entitle the petitioner to the relief asked for, and that the petition was uncertain in that it failed to state the value or nature of the estate, or whether it was in money, chattels, or land, or the amount of incumbrances, if any. The only statement on the subject contained in the petition is as follows: "That said estate is but little indebted, and that the shares and legacies of your petitioners may now be allowed to them without loss to the creditors of the estate of said deceased." This is in the exact language of that part of section 1661, Code Civ. Proc., declaring what must be made to appear at the hearing before the order can be granted. Without determining whether or not this would be a sufficient statement of facts if the objection were made by an heir or by another legatee, we are satisfied that it is sufficient as against the executrix, who generally must have greater knowledge of the value and character of the property, the amount of money on hand, and the amount of the indebtedness than any other person. The Code does not attempt to prescribe the form or contents of the petition. It is clear that elaborate pleadings are not required or contemplated in the proceeding, and, so far as the executrix is concerned, they are not necessary. On the subject of pleadings in probate courts generally, the author of Woerner on Administration says: "Their procedure is generally summary, requiring no pleading in the technical sense, nor adherence to artificial rules in the statement of a cause of action or defense. An intelligible statement of an existing substantial right, which the court has jurisdiction to enforce, is a sufficient allegation of all matters necessary to sustain a judgment." 1 Woerner on Adm. page *339. The authorities on which this statement is founded are, for the most part, decisions of states having a less formal probate procedure than our own, and hence it is doubtful if the rule stated can be considered universally, or even generally, applicable to probate proceedings under our system. But even if a more rigid rule is applied, as may be inferred from the provisions of section 1713, Code Civ. Proc., we think a statement of the ultimate facts concerning the nature of the estate and the amount of the debts which, according to the Code, the court must find to exist before making the order, will afford sufficient information of the grounds on which the application will be made to enable the executrix, at least, to make any proper opposition or defense. If it accomplishes this, it serves the purposes for which pleadings are required. The demurrer of the executrix was properly overruled.

The appellant further claims that the petitioners had forfeited their right to the legacies because of an alleged violation of a provision in the will that, if any one named therein should contest the same, he or she should take nothing under it. This is a question in which, as executrix, the appellant has no interest, and which she cannot have decided on this appeal. It does not affect the executrix in her representative capacity. It concerns only the rights of the residuary devisees. In such cases the executrix "cannot litigate the claims of one set of legatees against the others at the expense of the estate" (Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 465); nor maintain an appeal (Est. of Wright, 49 Cal. 551; Est. of Marrey, 65 Cal. 287, 3 Pac. 896; Merrifield v. Longmire, 66 Cal. 180, 4 Pac. 1176; Jones v. Lamont, 118 Cal. 503, 50 Pac. 766, 62 Am. St. Rep. 251; Est. of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 70 Pac. 455; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 90, 70 Pac. 1008). The distinction is thus stated in Re Welch's Estate, 106 Cal. 429, 39 Pac. 805: "It is a sound proposition that administrators, general or special, like receivers and other trustees or custodians of funds for designated purposes, are not ordinarily affected by orders in reference to their disposition, and therefore will not be heard on appeal from such orders. But this rule has its well-defined limitations. Wherever an order or decree involves a construction of the proper exercise of the duties of the officer, wherever it presents a question as to the right or power of the trustee to comply with it, wherever obedience to it might subject him to liability, the rule does not operate. Even where the order is one merely for the payment of funds, if any of these questions arise under it and personal liability may attach, the right of the officer to appeal is recognized and upheld." Moreover, a decision of the question on this appeal would be of no avail, even to the real parties interested. The legatees and devisees did not appear at the hearing, or in any manner object to the order, and as to them it has become final and conclusive so far as it allows the legacies of the petitioners. The only matter which can be the subject of further action in the court below, if the order should be reversed on this appeal, is that in which alone the executrix, in her representative capacity, is interested, namely, the sufficiency of the petition in respect to its statement of the condition and value of the estate, and the amount of the debts. Although the executrix is also a residuary devisee, yet, as she neither objected nor appeared as devisee, she is as fully concluded with respect to her rights as devisee as are the other devisees. Her appearance as executrix gives her no standing to claim rights which she possesses solely as devisee. As such devisee she must be considered as one who has suffered default.

No other questions are presented. The order is affirmed.

CURTIN v. KOWALSKY. (S. F. 3,071.)*

JUDGMENTS — ASSIGNMENT — VALIDITY — CONSIDERATION — NECESSITY OF FILING—EFFECT AS AGAINST BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—ACTION —PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by an assignee on a money judgment, where the complaint alleges the assignment, it is not necessary for it to further state that plaintiff was the owner of the judgment at the commencement of the action.

2. In an action on a judgment, evidence of a contract whereby the original judgment creditor transferred to plaintiff all judgments standing of record in his name, in connection with the admitted fact that the judgment sued on was entered prior to the date of the assignment in favor of the original judgment creditor, and the absence of evidence of any previous assignment or transfer, was sufficient to support a judgment for plaintiff.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1044, providing that property of any kind, except a possibility not coupled with an interest, may be transferred, a judgment may be assigned.

4. Under Civ. Code, §§ 1039, 1040, 1083, 1084 defining a transfer, and providing that a consideration is not necessary to its validity, and that it vests in the transferee all the actual title which the transferror then has, to the thing transferred and its incidents, an assignment of a judgment vests in the assignee all the assignor's title, regardless of whether any consideration is paid for the assignment or not; and the assignor has nothing which he can subsequently assign, unless there be left in him some equitable interest by reason of a trust existing in his favor.

5. In an action on an assigned judgment the question whether any equitable interest was left in the assignor after the assignment could not be litigated under a denial of the fact of the assignment.

6. An assignee of the legal title to a judgment is, as to the judgment debtor, the real party in interest, and entitled to sue notwithstanding the existence of a trust between the assignee and the assignor.

7. It is not necessary for the assignee of a judgment to file an assignment or give notice of it to other persons who may be about to take a second assignment, and subsequent assignees, although bona fide purchasers for value, acquire no title as against the original assignee.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco J. H. Dougherty, Judge.

Action by D. A. Curtin against H. J. Kowalsky. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. T. J. Crowley, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from an order granting defendant's motion for a new trial. The action is to recover the sum due upon a money judgment. The complaint alleges that on January 4, 1894, one Joseph E. Shain recovered judgment in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the defendant for a sum of money stated; that the judgment was duly entered on January 4, 1895; that on August 15, 1895, said Shain assigned the judgment to plaintiff, and that it has not been paid, either in whole or in part. The action was begun on December 20, 1899, nearly five years after the entry of the judgment. The answer denies that Shain at the time alleged, or at all, assigned the judgment to the plaintiff. This was the only issue presented for trial. The complaint further avers that the plaintiff "is now the owner and holder" of the judgment, and this is denied by the answer. But it was not necessary for the complaint to state that the plaintiff was the owner or holder of the judgment. Such ownership and holding was the legal result of the assignment, and, that fact having been alleged, it follows as a matter of law that plaintiff thereby became the owner and holder thereof. This condition of ownership is presumed to continue, and it was not necessary to allege that plaintiff was the owner at the time the action was begun. Such an allegation, or its equivalent, is required in actions to recover the possession of specific property, but not in actions to recover on money demands. Pryce v. Jordan, 69 Cal. 571, 11 Pac. 185; Poorman v. Mills, 35 Cal. 121, 95 Am. Dec. 90; Wedderspoon v. Rogers, 32 Cal. 572; Hook v. White, 36 Cal. 302; Monroe v. Fohl, 72 Cal. 570, 14 Pac. 514; Clemens v. Luce, 101 Cal. 436, 35 Pac. 1032.

We think the court erred in granting the motion for a new trial. The plaintiff, upon due proof of its execution, introduced in evidence a contract of assignment bearing date August —, 1895, whereby the original judgment creditor, Joseph E. Shain, "sold, assigned, transferred, and set over" to the plaintiff all the right, title, and interest of Joseph E. Shain "in each and every judgment standing of record in his name." It being admitted by the pleadings that the judgment sued on was given and entered in favor of Joseph E. Shain as alleged, and there being no evidence of any previous assignment or transfer, it necessarily stood of record in his name in August, 1895. It therefore came within the description contained in the contract of assignment, and it follows that the title to the judgment was thereby assigned and transferred to the plaintiff. On the issue presented, this evidence was sufficient to support the finding and judgment.

¶ 3. See Judgment, vol. 30, Cent. Dig. § 1526.

The defendant introduced evidence to prove that after the assignment to the plaintiff Shain had, for a valuable consideration, executed another assignment, purporting to transfer the judgment to H. S. Shain, who had in turn assigned it to R. T. Harding, also for a valuable consideration; and that there was no consideration for the assignment of the judgment by Shain to plaintiff, other than an agreement that plaintiff was to hold and manage this and other judgments as trustee for Shain for certain purposes. The plaintiff did not admit that the assignment to him was not for a valuable consideration, and he introduced some evidence to the contrary. In considering the relevancy and materiality of this evidence it is to be observed that the defendant presented no issue except as to the fact of the assignment; that he did not plead in abatement that another action was pending against him by the other claimant, nor present a cross-complaint asking that the other claimant be required to interplead, nor even to ask that the other claimant be made a party; and he does not claim that he has paid any part of the judgment to any person. The rights of the second assignee are not involved and cannot be adjudged. The simple questions of law are presented whether or not a consideration is necessary to support an assignment, and whether or not such an assignment, if without a valuable consideration, can be revoked, or is annulled by a subsequent assignment to another. Prior to the adoption of the Codes it was held that, inasmuch as a judgment was not assignable at common law, the effect of such assignment was to transfer an equitable totle only, but that such title vested in the assignee all the beneficial interest in the judgment, and gave him the right to enforce it by process in the name of the judgment plaintiff. Wright v. Levy, 12 Cal. 262, 263. It was said to be property, however, which could be purchased, the same as any other species of property. Id. Under the Code there is no limitation upon the power to assign choses in action, including judgments, and it is clear from its provisions that such an assignment carries the legal title to the judgment, and that the transfer of the title does not depend upon the fact of there being a valuable consideration. It is provided that "property of any kind may be transferred, except as otherwise provided by this article" (Civ. Code, § 1044), and the only exception made in the article is that of a possibility not coupled with an interest. A judgment is therefore property which can be transferred. A transfer is declared to be "an act of the parties, or of the law, by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another." Civ. Code, § 1039. It is further provided that "a voluntary transfer is an executed contract, subject to all the rules of law concerning contracts in general; except that a consideration is not necessary to its validity" (Civ. Code, § 1040), and that "a transfer vests in the transferee all the actual title to the thing transferred which the transferrer then has" (Civ. Code, § 1083), and also all of its incidents (Civ. Code, § 1084). The effect of these rules, as applied to the facts of this case, is that the assignment vested in the plaintiff all of the title of Joseph E. Shain to the judgment. Nothing remained in him which could be the subject of a subsequent assignment, excepting such equitable interest, if any, as he might have by reason of any trust that may have existed in his favor. The subsequent assignment would carry such equitable interest, if there was any, otherwise it would be ineffectual. But the question whether or not there was any such equitable interest or trust could not be litigated in this action under the denial of the fact of assignment, if, indeed, it could be litigated at all in the name of the defendant. The plaintiff had the legal right to sue for the amount due upon the judgment, although he held the title as trustee. He held the legal title, and was the real party in interest so far as the defendant was concerned. It was not necessary for the plaintiff to put his assignment on file, or to give notice of it to other persons who might be about to take a second assignment. The other claimant, although a bona fide purchaser for value, did not acquire a title superior to that of the plaintiff. With respect to judgments this court has said: "The rule of caveat emptor—so far as any interest acquired as against third parties is concerned—applies to them in the same manner as in the purchase of any other personal property. If the assignor has no title, they will take none, whether they have notice or not." Mitchell v. Hockett, 25 Cal. 544, 85 Am. Dec. 151. See, also, Southard v. McBrown, 63 Cal. 545; Fore v. Manlove, 18 Cal. 437. The title having passed from Shain to the plaintiff by the assignment, it being an executed contract, there could be no revocation or retransfer effected by the act of Shain alone. His subsequent purported transfer of the same judgment did not affect the title of the plaintiff. It follows that all the testimony relative to the want of consideration and the subsequent transfer was irrelevant and immaterial.

There were some errors assigned in the statement on motion for new trial upon rulings of the court adverse to the defendant with respect to this evidence. As we have reached the conclusion that this entire inquiry was immaterial and irrelevant to the issue as to the fact of the assignment, it will not be necessary to consider these alleged errors, for they could not, in any event, be sufficient to justify the granting of a new trial.

The only other error assigned was the action of the court in overruling an objection to the introduction of the assignment to the plaintiff. The ground of the objection was that it was immaterial and incompetent, that no foundation had been laid, and that no particular judgment was described. There was sufficient proof of its execution. It was manifestly material and competent, and the want of a specific description was supplied by the admitted facts which showed that it came within the terms of the general description. There was no error in the ruling on the objection. We find no ground upon which to support a motion for a new trial.

The order granting a new trial is reversed.

"At my death all the above property and any other property that may be found to belong to me is to go to my wife and to her alone, and I omit intentionally all other members of my family. S. W. Clisby."

The only facts alleged in the appellant's petition as grounds for revoking the probate are, in effect, that one of the numbers appearing in the document was altered, all of the numbers then erased, and the last paragraph written, on a day subsequent to the writing of the first part of the will; but all of this, it is alleged, was done by Clisby himself. A demurrer to the petition was interposed and sustained, without leave to amend, and thereupon the judgment or order appealed from was entered.

Upon the facts stated, which are confessed by the demurrer, it is claimed by the appellant (1) that, on the face of the document, it appears not to have been dated; and (2) that the concluding paragraph was written on a subsequent day.

In support of the former proposition it is urged "that the words and figures 'October 1, 1902,' were not intended by the testator to express the date of the instrument, but merely the date upon which he was the owner of the specified property." But this contention is untenable. There is, indeed, a certain ambiguity in the instrument. For, grammatically, the date used may be regarded either as the date of the memorandum, or as the date of the will. But the difference is immaterial. For, on the former construction, the memorandum being part of the will, its date would be the date of the will also. Nor do we doubt the right of the testator to adopt as the date of his will the date previously written by him. (See Estate of Fay, 28 Cal. Dec. 585.)

Nor is the case affected by the fact alleged that the concluding part of the will was not written on the day the will was commenced. It is a very common thing for men to commence a letter or other document on one day, and to finish it on the next or some subsequent day; and in such case the date, whether written at the beginning, as is usually the case, or at the end, as is sometimes done, is, according to the common and received usage of language, the proper date of the writing; and this is equally true of legal documents, though these do not take effect until completed and delivered. We do not doubt, therefore, that the case comes within the meaning and intention of the enactments concerning olographic wills (Civ. Code, §§ 1276, 1277; Code Civ. Proc. § 1309), which, it is provided, are to be construed according to "the approved usage of the language" (Civ. Code, § 13).

In the argument on this point it is assumed by the appellant's counsel that it appears from the allegations of the petition that the memorandum of property was written by the testator on the date given with "no thought of making a will," and, in effect, that the intention of using it as part of a will was an afterthought. But this, assuming it to be material, is not alleged. All that is alleged is simply that the writing of the concluding part of the will was on a day subsequent to its commencement. Nor is there anything in the petition to indicate that the document probated as a will was not, in intention, "one continuous instrument." Estate of Taylor, 126 Cal. 98, 99, 58 Pac. 454. Whether, were it otherwise, the fact would be material, is another question, which, as in the case cited, we leave undetermined.

Respondent's counsel are also in error in supposing that "it did not appear in the Skerrett Case, 67 Cal. 585, 8 Pac. 181, that the letter annexed to the deed was written at a date other than the date when the deed was made." The contrary appeared from the records before the court. The deed was dated "April 26, 1881," and was acknowledged April 27, and the letter, as appears from its recitals, was written subsequently.

We advise that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; CHIPMAN, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is affirmed: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

HARRIER v. BASSFORD et al. (Sac. 1,270.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1904.)

EXECUTION — ISSUANCE — MOTION—NECESSITY OF NOTICE—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—LIMITATIONS—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—DISCHARGE OF SURETY — HOMESTEAD — APPOINTMENT OF APPRAISERS—NOTICE.

1. As a foundation for a cause of action, a judgment does not become final until six months from the date of its entry, and is not barred until after five years from the date that it becomes final.

2. Code Civ. Proc. § 685, providing that a judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry by leave of the court, although it permits the issuance of the order for execution ex parte, and without notice to defendant, is not repugnant to the constitutional guaranty of due process of law.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, providing that a judgment may be enforced after the lapse of five years from its entry by leave of court upon motion, the issuance of an order for execution is not invalid because made without notice of motion, in the absence of circumstances making the issuance of such order without notice an abuse of discretion, or making it imperative to vacate or reverse the order.

4. Under Civ. Code, § 1543, providing that a release of one joint debtor does not extinguish the obligations of any of the others, the release of a judgment debtor, who was in fact the principal in the obligation for which the judgment was rendered, does not release his joint debtor, who was only a surety, where by the face of the obligation both were ostensibly principals, and the creditor had no notice of the actual relationship existing between them.

5. Under Civ. Code, §§ 1248, 1249, authorizing the court to appoint homestead appraisers upon proof of service upon defendants of a copy of the petition and notice of the time and place of hearing, the court may appoint another appraiser in the event of a vacancy caused by the absence of one of the appraisers originally appointed, without any further notice, and either party may, in case the appointee is unfit, incompetent, or disqualified, move the court to vacate the appointment or set aside the report of the appraisers.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by D. W. Harrier against H. A. Bassford, executor of the estate of J. M. Bassford, deceased, Ida C. Bassford, and another. From an order giving leave to issue an execution on a deficiency judgment, defendant Ida C. Bassford appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Sims, Raleigh Barcar, and E. E. McFarland, for appellant. L. G. Harrier, Jno. M. Gregory, and T. T. C. Gregory, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant Ida C. Bassford appeals from an order of the superior court giving leave to issue an execution on a deficiency judgment entered against her in the action; also from an order denying her motion to set aside the first-mentioned order, and the proceedings taken thereunder; also from an order approving the report of the appraisers appointed to appraise her homestead in proceedings, in accordance with the Civil Code, to sell the same on the execution, and from an order confirming the report of said appraisers setting apart such homestead.

On July 5, 1898, the plaintiff recovered a judgment of foreclosure against certain defendants, including the appellant, Ida C. Bassford. The judgment provided that, if the proceeds of the sale should not be sufficient to satisfy the judgment, a deficiency judgment should thereupon be entered against certain of the defendants, including the said Ida C. Bassford, for the amount remaining unpaid. Thereafter a sale was had, and, there being a balance of $3,280.06 unpaid, a deficiency judgment was entered, as provided in the judgment of foreclosure. On October 12, 1903, upon motion of the judgment plaintiff, and without notice to any of the defendants, the court ordered that an execution issue upon the deficiency judgment for the amount due thereon, less the sum of $400 previously paid. Thereafter an execution was issued in pursuance of the order, and the orders appealed from thereupon followed.

The order directing the execution to be issued was made under the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "In all cases, the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose, founded upon supplemental pleadings; but nothing in this section shall be construed to revive a judgment for the recovery of money which shall have been barred by limitation at the time of the passage of this act."

This section was enacted in its present form, so as to make it applicable to judgments for the recovery of money, on March 9, 1895. The proviso to the effect that it was not to be construed to revive a judgment for the recovery of money is inapplicable to this case, inasmuch as the judgment herein was rendered after the enactment of the section as amended, and therefore it could not have been barred by limitation at the time of the passage of the amended section. Moreover, at the time this execution was issued, the judgment in question was not barred by the statute of limitations. As a foundation for a cause of action it did not become final until six months from the date of its entry. In the case of Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 470, 66 Pac. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290, it was held that an action upon a judgment is not barred until five years have elapsed from the time at which it became final. Adding to the five years provided in the statute of limitations the six months in which an appeal may be taken, and which must elapse before the judgment becomes final, it will be seen that the judgment of foreclosure would not be barred by limitation until the period of five years and six months after its entry. This period had not expired at the time the execution in question was issued.

The principal contention of the appellant is that section 685, in so far as it may be construed to permit an order to be made for the issuance of an execution, upon motion without notice to the defendants, is unconstitutional. We think there is no merit in this contention. The Legislature has the undoubted power to provide that an execution may issue on a judgment at any time after its entry or rendition. It may make the period 5 years, 20 years, or any other definite time, or it may make the right to an execution unconditional for 5 years, and leave it optional with the court to make it upon motion for an indefinite period thereafter. The latter is the course which has been pursued by our Legislature. If this be within the legislative power, it must be equally competent for it to declare that such motion may be made without notice. If it could have fixed the time at 20 years in the first instance, or left it without limitation, it is certainly no greater exercise of power to make the right, after the first 5 years, dependent upon the permission or ex parte order of the court.

There is nothing in the terms of section 685, Code Civ. Proc., which expressly requires the service upon the defendant of a notice of the time and place of making the motion for leave to issue the execution. Ordinarily, process of any kind may be issued without any notice to the opposite party, and the general rule is that notice of application therefor need be given only where there is some statute expressly prescribing it. Such notice is not necessary to constitute that due process of law which is guarantied by the Constitution of the United States. The due process of law there guarantied is obtained by the service of summons on the defendants or their subsequent appearance in the action before judgment. Perhaps in some cases circumstances may appear which would make it an abuse of discretion to make such an order without notice, or which would make it imperative to vacate the order on motion, or reverse it on appeal. But no such conditions are shown. We cannot say that the order for the execution is invalid for want of previous notice of the motion.

It is claimed that the court abused its discretion in ordering the execution, and that the motion of the defendants to set aside the order should have been granted, upon the statement made in the affidavit filed by the appellants in support of the motion, to the effect that the appellant, Ida C. Bassford, was a surety on the original obligation, and that J. M. Bassford, Sr., was the principal therein, and that subsequent to the entry of the deficiency judgment the estate of J. M. Bassford, Sr., then deceased, was released from said deficiency judgment in consideration of the sum of $400. It is claimed that this operates to release the judgment as against the sureties also. The affidavit, however, does not show that the obligee had any notice whatever of the alleged fact that J. M. Bassford, Sr., was the principal, and Ida C. Bassford a surety, on the note upon which the judgment is founded. So far as appears, as to the obligee the note was a joint obligation, and the deficiency judgment must bear the same character. Under the provisions of section 1543 of the Civil Code, a release of one of two or more joint debtors does not extinguish the obligations of any of the others. Conceding, but not deciding, that in any case where a joint, or joint and several, obligation is reduced to judgment, and it is subsequently made to appear that one of the judgment debtors was only a surety as to the other in the original obligation, a release of the principal will discharge the obligation as to the surety, we are satisfied that the principle cannot be applied in cases where it is not shown that the obligee was aware of the relations between the debtors.

Objection is made to the confirmation of the report of the appraisers and to the subsequent proceedings, on the ground that, it having been shown that one of the appraisers first appointed was not present in the county, another appraiser was substituted in his place, without additional notice to the defendants. The court was authorized to appoint the appraisers, in the first instance, upon the proof made of service upon the defendants of a copy of the petition and notice of the time and place of hearing, as provided in sections 1248 and 1249 of the Civil Code. The absence of one of the appraisers from the county caused a vacancy in the board of appraisers. We think the court had authority to appoint another person without further notice. Either party would, of course, have the right to move the court to vacate such appointment, or set aside the report of appraisers, upon a reasonable showing that such appointee was unfit, incompetent, or disqualified. The appellant does not claim that he was in any respect an unfit or improper person, nor that he did not possess the qualifications required by the Code. Upon the showing made, therefore, we do not think the point has substantial merit.

We find no error apparent in the proceedings appealed from. The orders are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

MASON v. LIEVRE. (S. F. 2,894.)

SALE — CORPORATION STOCK — OFFER AND ACCEPTANCE—DELIVERY OF CERTIFICATES—REVOCATION—LIABILITY FOR PURCHASE PRICE—STATUTE.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 1140, providing that the title to personal property sold or exchanged passes whenever the parties agree on a present transfer and the thing is identified, it is not essential to a valid sale of corporate stock that the stock certificates be delivered simultaneously with payment; and where there was an offer to buy without a specific requirement that the certificates should accompany the acceptance, and an acceptance was had with draft for the price, but unaccompanied by the certificates, the buyer could not defeat his liability for the price by a revocation of the sale prior to a tender of the certificates, which was made within a reasonable time.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by J. W. Mason against Isidore Lievre. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. S. Eisner and Reinstein & Eisner, for appellant. Oliver Ellsworth, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Plaintiff sues to recover the sum of $1,040, the alleged purchase price of 500 shares of the Olaa Sugar Company stock, which he claims to have sold to defendant. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and plaintiff had the judgment. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The alleged contract of sale is found in certain letters passing between plaintiff and defendant which, with some explanatory circumstances and facts, constitute the evidence in the case. Plaintiff resided at Hilo, Hawaiian Islands, and defendant resided at San Francisco. Both were merchants, and had had some previous dealings in sugar stock on an occasion when plaintiff was in San Francisco. Plaintiff testified that "the particular transaction involved in this suit was carried on altogether through correspondence." On May 19, 1899, plaintiff wrote defendant the following letter:

"Hilo, H. I., May 19, 1899.

"Mr. Isidore Lievre, 215 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal. My Dear Sir:—I have not yet had time to write you fully as I would like, and to-day being mail-day, you can readily understand my having so much to attend to after a long absence, and will not be able to write you about anything by this mail, except the Sugar Company.

"Before this stock was issued in Honolulu on last Monday, I saw it selling at $1.00 premium, which was 50 per cent. on the amount paid in. I was very sorry that I could not do better by you than I did, consequently feel disposed to assist you in any way that I can. On my arrival at Hilo, I found that the subscribers here had not paid up their assessments for the allotment at Hilo, and that it has been subscribed for three times over, but we are compelled to send the assessments down by this steamer at the latest, and already I find that some of the subscribers are not able to pay up for as much as they subscribed for, and we have no discretion but to have them pay up or cut off their subscription, so there will be some stock left unpaid for. In which event, although it is at a premium, under the circumstances as above described, I will be willing to let you have what I can of it under exactly the same conditions as I took it over, for I shall pay up the assessment of ten per cent. and the stamp duty myself to-day for whatever may be left over, and will allot you some of it if you write me you desire it. The only additional cost to you will be another four cents per share additional for the transfer. In other words you will pay ten per cent. on the par value, and eight cents per share stamp duty, which includes the stamp duty I paid and the one that will be on your stock. Let me hear from you by next mail, as I cannot hold it very long for you, as there are many people here now who want to subscribe, but who have not their names on the list, and they will be glad enough to pay even a premium on the stock.

"[Signed] J. W. Mason."

The par value of the stock was $20 per share. On May 31, 1899, defendant wrote plaintiff in reply as follows:

"San Francisco, May 31, '99.

"J. W. Mason, Esq., Hilo, H. I. Dear Sir:—Confirming my letter of even date, I am now in receipt of your favor of the 19th inst., and would state that I appreciate your kindness in the matter. I will take up to five hundred shares of the assessable stock on the basis mentioned by you, namely, payment of first assessment plus eight cents stamp duty per share. As to the amount of same, you can draw on me at one day's sight for the amount.

"Respectfully yours, Isidore Lievre."

Subsequently plaintiff received a letter from defendant dated June 13, 1899, reading as follows: "I confirm my previous letter concerning the amount of assessable stock I am willing to take, namely, five hundred shares (500.) I would like to ask you to kindly give me information as to what the Olaa Sugar Company is doing."

On June 21, 1899, plaintiff wrote defendant in reply to his letter of May 31 as follows:

"June 21, 1899.

"Mr. Isidore Lievre, 215 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal. Dear Sir:—I have your two favors of the 31st ult., which seem to have been delayed in some way, and note the enclosed copy of your letters to Messrs. Bishop & Co. and B. F. Dillingham.

"I note that you will take up to five hundred shares of assessable stock on the basis mentioned in my letter of the 19th of May, so I am making draft on you as per your request, through our agents, Messrs. Alexander & Baldwin, at one day's sight, for the sum of $1,040.00, which is the first assessment, and eight cents per share stamp duty. Write me how you want the stock issued, and I will have it sent to you by the company.

"[Signed] J. W. Mason."

No other letters were written by plaintiff in reply to the above letters of defendant. It takes about nine or ten days, as testified, for a letter to go from San Francisco to Hilo; delays of three or four days sometimes occur at Honolulu.

Plaintiff testified that immediately upon receiving defendant's letter of May 31st (which was about June 13th) he set aside 500 shares of the sugar company stock for defendant, and on June 21st drew on defendant for the amount mentioned in the correspondence. His agents, Alexander & Baldwin, through whom he drew, were at Honolulu. The draft was presented about July 5th, and payment refused, but for what reason was not stated at the time of refusal, so far as appears. Plaintiff testified: "I allotted and set aside that amount of stock to him. I had a certain amount of stock that I had subscribed for as Mason, trustee, for the benefit of my San Francisco friends, and Mr. Lievre was one of them, and others I can name, to whom I wrote just such letters. I heard from Mr. Lievre as to how many he would take, and I set aside that amount for him. I awaited a reply from him as to how I should have the stock made out. That is the only reason I did not have that (referring to the certificate of stock) sent to him, attached to the draft." Further explaining this omission to send the certificate with the draft, he testified that it was "because he did not tell me how it was to be allotted. In my previous transactions with him he had taken stock in their names" —presumably other persons. At the time plaintiff received defendant's letter of May 31st he held over 4,000 shares, some in his own name and others in his name as trustee. On July 3, 1899, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows: "I hereby revoke my offer to take five hundred shares of assessable stock. I have this day written to my agent at Honolulu, J. C. Cohen, full instructions as to same, and if you go to Honolulu you can interview him, and he will fully explain the matter to you, or if you do not go he will communicate with you direct as to the same."

After defendant had refused to accept the first draft he wrote plaintiff on July 8th, in which he stated that the stock was for a friend who would have taken it, notwithstanding it had fallen off in value, if it had been attached to the draft; "for," defendant wrote, "I would have been in a position to show him that the order for cancellation did not reach in time, and that in the meantime the stock had been delivered, and he would be bound to pay for same."

The court found on sufficient evidence that defendant's letter of July 3d "was mailed and received by plaintiff subsequent to the writing, mailing, and receipt of the aforesaid letters of May 19 and May 31, 1899 (plaintiff's letter and defendant's reply), and subsequently to the writing and mailing of the letter of June 21, 1899" (plaintiff's letter drawing on defendant). After receiving this July 3d letter plaintiff wrote his agents at their Honolulu office, July 20th, sending them 500 shares of the sugar company stock, with directions to have it reissued in the name of defendant, and this certificate bearing the date July 25th, accompanied by a second draft on defendant for the amount first drawn for, was sent forward to the San Francisco office of Alexander & Baldwin, and there is evidence that, upon its being received, the draft, with the certificate attached, was presented to defendant and acceptance refused.

Upon these facts, some of which are specifically found, the court, as conclusions of law, found that plaintiff's letter of May 19th was an offer to sell 500 shares of the stock in question, at the price stated therein; that defendant's letter of May 31st was an acceptance of the offer, and an agreement to buy this number of shares at said price; that by plaintiff's letter of June 21st he only notified defendant that he (plaintiff) had made a draft on defendant for the purchase price; "that the writing, mailing, and receipt of the said letters of May 19th, May 31st, and June 21st constituted a written executed contract of sale by plaintiff to defendant" of said shares for the sum named; and "that on the presentation of plaintiff's said draft on defendant, * * * and the refusal by defendant to accept the said draft, the said sum of $1,040 became thereupon due and owing by defendant to plaintiff"; and, as a further conclusion of law, that plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendant for the sum named, with interest and costs of suit.

Defendant claims that plaintiff's letter of May 19th was not a sufficient offer to sell 500 or any other number of shares of stock, owing to its indefiniteness, and that the only definite offer in the entire transaction was defendant's letter of May 31st, which could be and was withdrawn before the plaintiff legally accepted it. By legal acceptance defendant means and insists that there must have been delivery of the shares at the time the first draft was presented for acceptance, and, as it is conceded that the shares were not then tendered, he had a right to refuse acceptance. Furthermore, that as defendant withdrew his offer, of which plaintiff had notice, before sending his second draft, accompanied by the shares, the transaction was at an end, and he rightly refused acceptance of the shares.

It may be conceded that the letter of May 19th alone lacks in some respects the element of distinctness and certainty essential to a complete offer to sell. But whatever of uncertainty there may be on the face of this letter as to the company referred to or as to the number of shares offered, its meaning was well understood by defendant, as shown by his letter of May 31st, in which he definitely offered to take 500 shares, and by plaintiff's letter of June 21st in reply. By these several letters the minds of the parties were brought into perfect agreement. It is noticeable, and defendant comments on the fact, that the name of the company is not mentioned in the May 19th letter. This is true of defendant's letter of May 31st, and also plaintiff's letter of June 21st; but defendant does not deny, nor can it be doubted, that both parties knew what stock was referred to, for in defendant's letter confirming his letter of May 31st he asks for "information as to what Olaa Sugar Company is doing."

It seems to us too obvious to call for discussion that when defendant made his offer to take 500 shares in response to plaintiff's letter, also authorizing plaintiff to draw on him for the money, and plaintiff thereupon advised defendant that he had drawn on him as requested by defendant, an executed written contract resulted from the correspondence. If the parties had been strangers to each other defendant might with greater reason claim that the stock should have accompanied the draft, and might also have assumed that the shares would come with the draft. On the other hand, as friends, between whom at least one similar deal had occurred, as well as some others, plaintiff might well have assumed that defendant did not expect the stock to be sent with the draft, especially as defendant did not request it to be so sent. There must have been some understanding outside the letters or defendant would not have known to what plaintiff referred in his letter of May 19th; and this would seem quite probable from the fact that plaintiff in writing defendant desired to know how he wanted the stock issued. Plaintiff had paid for the stock just what he was getting for it, although it was then worth a premium. There was no profit to him in the transaction, but it was rather a matter of accommodation to defendant. We do not think that plaintiff failed to send the stock because he intended to reserve, as defendant urges, the jus disponendi, or that the transaction had that effect. In our opinion, plaintiff's letter of June 21st was such a closing of the sale as to have given defendant a right of action for the stock. Indeed, as we understand defendant's position, he does not rely on his retraction of July 3d so much as on the fact that the stock should, in any event, have been tendered with the presentation of the draft. Undoubtedly this would be true if defendant had so directed, for it would then have been one of the express provisions of the contract. But he did not so direct, and the question arises whether it was necessary to a completed sale. Apart from the consideration that, in view of all the facts, plaintiff was not required to send the stock with his draft as might under some circumstances have been the case, we do not think delivery of the shares was essential to the completed sale. This was not the ordinary sale of goods for cash or "cash on delivery," in which payment of the purchase price and the delivery of the goods are conditions precedent to vesting title, nor does it come within the class of cases known as a "trade offer," and may readily be distinguished from Hilmer v. Hills, 138 Cal. 134, 70 Pac. 1080, cited by defendant. Such is the rule generally as to executory contracts, but there was here no condition that the price should be paid before delivery; on the contrary, plaintiff set aside the stock to defendant's use on receipt of his letter and drew on him precisely as directed. It was then too late for either party to retract; the sale was complete and the contract executed. The intention to sell and the intention to buy are both clear and unmistakable from the written expressions of the parties, and whatever significance might attach to the acts of payment and delivery would be in the nature of evidence, and not as of the essence of the contract. But if there remained some doubt on the question of intent from evidence conflicting in its nature, which we do not think there was, the finding of the court must stand. Even where there has been a manifestation of intention, Mr. Benjamin states the rule to be that "the presumption of law is that the contract is an actual sale, if the specific thing is agreed on, and it is ready for immediate delivery." Benjamin on Sales (7th Ed.) § 311. Where the goods have not been specified, or if, when specified, something remains to be done to them by the vendor, either to put them into deliverable shape or to ascertain the price, the contract is executory. In this latter case it is presumed that the parties intended to make the transfer dependent upon the performance of the thing yet to be done, as a condition precedent. Id. But it is added that "of course these presumptions yield to proof of a contrary intent." Id. Here there was nothing remaining to be done by the vendor. He had shares in his own name and as trustee which could have been delivered. The thing remaining to be done was for the defendant to designate how he wanted the shares issued. The cases in which the contracts were held to be incomplete because something remained to be done by the seller before delivery could be made according to the contract "are those where that which remains to be done is something in order to the ascertainment of the price, or to the identification of the property sold, or where the contract is executory, as where the article sold has yet to be manufactured, such a contract being more strictly an agreement to sell than a contract of sale." Tyson v. Wells, 2 Cal. 122.

It was said in Hatch v. Oil Co., 100 U. S. 124, 25 L. Ed. 554: "Standard authorities also show that where there is no manifestation of intention, except what arises from the terms of the sale, the presumption is, if the thing to be sold is specified and it is ready for the immediate delivery, that the contract is an actual sale, unless there is something in the subject-matter or attendant circumstances to indicate a different intention."

Mr. Cook states the law thus: "Generally a sale of stock is attended with an immediate delivery of the certificate therefor, or it is agreed that the certificate shall be delivered at some specified time in the future. If, however, the vendor offers to sell his stock and the vendee accepts the offer, the contract is complete, and binds both parties, although nothing has been said as to the time when the certificate of stock shall be delivered. The law implies that the contract will be performed by a delivery of the certificates immediately or within a reasonable time, and either party may insist upon carrying out the contract." Cook on Stock, etc., § 334.

The office of the sugar company was Honolulu, and had plaintiff sent defendant the shares with the draft it would have been necessary for defendant to return them to Honolulu for reissue in his name if he had desired them to so issue. The rule of our Code is that "the title to personal property sold or exchanged passes to the buyer whenever the parties agree upon a present transfer, and the thing is identified, whether it is separated from other things or not." Civ. Code, § 1140. If title passes in such a case, it cannot be that delivery of the thing, simultaneously with payment, is necessarily of the essence of the transfer. See the subject discussed somewhat in Lassing v. James, 107 Cal. 348, 40 Pac. 534.

It is contended that the findings are not responsive to the issues; that there is a failure to find on material issues; and that the ultimate facts pleaded in the complaint do not necessarily follow from the probative facts found. After what has been said as to the transaction and the liability under what is undisputedly the contract between the parties, we do not deem it necessary to examine at length the objections to the character of the findings or as to whether they conform to the issues. They are findings in part of probative facts and in part ultimate facts, and the conclusions of law are in part more findings of ultimate facts than conclusions of law. We may look to all these to determine whether they are supported by sufficient evidence and are sufficiently responsive to the issues made by the pleadings and support the judgment.

We have examined appellant's points on the objections raised, and his argument in support thereof and respondent's reply thereto, and we find no prejudicial error in respect of any of the objections made.

It is advised that the judgment and order be affirmed.

KREDO v. PHELPS et al. (S. F. 2,899.)

INJUNCTION—GROUNDS—THREATENED TRESPASS—JUDGMENT—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

1. An injunction will not issue primarily to prevent a threatened ouster of one in the possession of real estate, or to prevent a threatened destruction of his furniture. [1]

2. Where a complaint alleged that plaintiff was in the peaceful possession of premises, and that defendants threatened to oust plaintiff therefrom and to destroy and remove plaintiff's furniture, and prayed for an injunction, a finding that defendants locked the door leading to plaintiff's premises, and refused to permit him to enter them, and a judgment enjoining defendants from interfering with plaintiff's occupancy of the premises, and ordering plaintiff to pay defendants certain rent, which was not claimed by defendants in their pleadings, were outside of the issues made by the complaint, and could not be sustained.

Commissioner's Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by H. F. Kredo against O. B. Phelps and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

D. E. Alexander and E. Myron Wolfe, for appellants. P. B. Nagle and Nagle & Nagle, for respondent.

COOPER, C. Appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff. Appellants contend that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the findings are outside of the issues stated in the pleadings. Both contentions will have to be sustained.

The substance of the complaint is that at all times therein named the plaintiff "was in the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of a certain two rooms in a certain house known and designated as No. 937 Post street, in the city and county of San Francisco"; "that while plaintiff was in the possession of said rooms the said defendants wrongfully and unlawfully threatened, and do now threaten, to oust plaintiff therefrom"; "that plaintiff is informed and believes, and therefore alleges, that the said defendants threatened to prevent the said plaintiff from entering said premises by locking the doors of said house, and by barricading the same, so that it will be impossible for the said plaintiff to enter said rooms, and to unlawfully and wrongfully use force and violence against the said plaintiff if he shall attempt to enter said premises; and plaintiff further alleges upon his information and belief, that the said defendants threatened to cause his said furniture to be unlawfully and wrongfully destroyed and removed from said premises, and otherwise injure said plaintiff and his said property, in violation of said lease and the terms thereof; that plaintiff believes that said defendants will commit said acts hereinbefore set forth unless they are restrained by this court."

The complaint concludes with a prayer for an injunction restraining the threatened acts, and restraining the defendants "from interfering with the plaintiff in the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of said premises." It is evident that the object of the complaint is to enjoin the threatened ouster of plaintiff from his rooms, and the threatened destruction of his furniture. It is alleged that defendants threatened to oust plaintiff from the said rooms, and to cause his furniture to be destroyed and removed from the said premises. It is not even alleged that defendants will, unless restrained by the court, commit the threatened acts, but it is alleged that plaintiff believes "that defendants will commit said acts." If we regard the "two certain rooms" as being real estate, and sufficiently described, yet it is alleged that plaintiff is in the quiet and peaceable possession of them. Courts will not issue an injunction to prevent a threatened ouster of one in the possession of real estate when that is the main question before the court. If the party should be ousted, he would have his remedy at law, but the aid of a court of equity cannot be invoked to prevent a mere threatened ouster. If such were the rule, the time of the courts would be taken up in the investigation of imaginary wrongs and idle threats. And so of the threatened destruction of plaintiff's furniture. We know of no case in which the court has enjoined the threatened injury or removal of ordinary personal property simply upon allegation or proof of a mere threat to injure or remove it. There are cases of continued trespass, or of trespasses of such a nature that they will ripen into an easement, or of threatened destruction of property of peculiar value, and other cases where the facts show that the threatened injury will be irreparable, in which courts will grant injunctions, but not in a case of the threatened destruction of furniture. If an injunction could be granted in this case, there is no reason why it should not be granted in case of every threatened trespass either to person or property. We see no reason to depart from the old and well-established rule that an injunction will not lie to prevent a threatened trespass.

In the findings there is much immaterial matter as to the plaintiff's lease of the rooms, the tender of rent by him, and other matters; but it is found that defendants locked the front door leading to plaintiff's room, and, "with great force, refused to permit plaintiff to enter said premises." The court gave judgment that plaintiff is entitled to be restored to the possession of the said premises, and that defendants be "enjoined from in any way interfering with the said plaintiff in the occupancy of the said premises," and that "plaintiff should pay defendants $10 for the rent of said premises." The court thus, in effect, found that plaintiff had been ousted from the possession of the premises, and that he be restored to the possession; and this in face of the complaint, alleging that he was in the quiet and peaceable possession, and the absence of any demand in the complaint for possession. And the $10 rent is ordered to be paid by plaintiff to defendants in the absence of any cross-demand or claim as to any rent due. Courts have been very liberal in sustaining the findings of the trial court upon issues that were attempted to be made by the pleadings, and treated as so made during the trial, where they were of such a nature as to show some legitimate relation to the nature of the action as set forth in the pleadings. But they have not adopted a rule that would, in effect, do away with all pleadings. They have not held that a plaintiff could recover upon a different cause of action developed on the trial by the evidence, with no amendment of the pleadings. They have not held that a plaintiff could recover possession of real estate upon a complaint which alleged that he was in possession, and failed to allege any ouster. The rule is that the plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the cause of action set out in the complaint, and not upon some other which may be developed by the proofs. Schirmer v. Drexler, 134 Cal. 134, 66 Pac. 180, and cases cited therein.

HARLOW et ux. v. STANDARD IMP. CO.

ACTION BY HUSBAND AND WIFE—JOINT OWNERSHIP—NEGLIGENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. As a husband and wife may hold property as joint tenants, tenants in common, or as community property (Civ. Code, § 161), in an action by husband and wife for injuries to their house, evidence that plaintiffs had the house built for them, and that they occupied it, is sufficient evidence of their joint ownership to sustain the action.

2. Evidence that defendant's steam roller, used on the street in front of plaintiffs' residence, was run over their fence and lawn and against their house, is sufficient to sustain a finding by the jury that the injury was occasioned by the negligence of defendant.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by Lloyd C. Harlow and wife against the Standard Improvement Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. H. Whittemore, for appellant. W. H. O'Brien and Chapman & Cliff, for respondents.

HARRISON, C. The plaintiffs seek by this action to recover from the defendant damages sustained by them through its negligence. It is alleged in the complaint that on August 13, 1900, the defendant was engaged in doing certain street work on Kennedy street, in the city of Oakland, in front of the residence of the plaintiffs, making use therefor of a steam roller, and that while so engaged the roller, by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the persons managing the same, ran against the building of the plaintiffs and injured it, and the fences, sidewalk, shrubbery, and lawns surrounding it, to their damage in the sum of $2,000. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for $1,000. From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

At the close of the plaintiffs' case the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that they had failed to establish a joint ownership of the premises. The motion was denied, and this ruling is now assigned by the appellant as error. It is alleged in the complaint that at the time of the occurrence the plaintiffs were, and still are, husband and wife, and the owners of and possessed of the building and lot upon which it stood, and this allegation was denied in the answer. There was no evidence as to the record title of the property, or that it had ever been conveyed to the plaintiffs, or either of them; but there was testimony that the house was built by them, and that they had occupied it for about 10 years. The testimony of Mrs. Harlow that she and her husband had the house built was sufficient evidence of their joint ownership to justify the ruling of the court. Under section 161, Civ. Code, the husband and wife may hold property as joint tenants, tenants in common, or as community property; and, in the absence of any evidence of the source of the moneys with which the house was built, or of the manner in which the property was acquired, there is no presumption that it was community property, or the separate property of either spouse, rather than that it was held by them in joint tenancy or as tenants in common. See Wagoner v. Silva, 139 Cal. 559, 73 Pac. 433. Under section 384, Code Civ. Proc., plaintiffs, as cotenants or tenants in common, are entitled to maintain the action.

The manner in which it appeared that the injury was caused sufficiently sustains the finding of the jury that it was through the negligence of the defendant. Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 549, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146. The case is one in which the maxim res ipsa loquitur is peculiarly applicable.

The offer on the part of the defendant to show that 48 hours after the injury it offered to put the building back in as good condition as it was before, or to defray the expense thereof, was properly refused. The only issues presented for trial by its answer were the plaintiffs' ownership of the property, the negligence of the defendant in causing the injury, and the amount of damage done to the property. The trial was chiefly occupied with the latter issue, upon which a large amount of testimony was given by each of the parties to the action, and the amount of the damage was determined by the verdict of the jury. The amount of the damage sustained by the property was the same, irrespective of the person by whom the repairs should be made; and there is no averment in the answer, nor did the defendant offer to show at the trial, nor does it now claim, that the repairs could have been made by it at any less cost than if made by the plaintiffs, or by whomsoever they might employ. The rule which obtains in an action for damages arising out of the breach of a contract, that it is the duty of the injured party, if within his power, to protect himself against any increase of damage that may accrue after the breach, has no application under the facts of the present case. Here the damage was complete at the time of the injury, and before the offer of defendant, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, the cost of the repairs would be the same whether made by the defendant or the plaintiffs. If for any reason the cost would have been less to the defendant, that was a matter for special defense, which should have been pleaded, as well as made known to the plaintiffs at the time of the offer. The jury were, moreover, instructed that, if it was shown that the plaintiffs could have prevented any part of the loss by prompt repairs, they were bound to do so.

The injury to the house was committed August 13th. Mrs. Harlow testified that they did not remove from the house until September 21st. The present action was commenced September 20th, and the court instructed the jury that the plaintiffs could only recover the actual damage suffered by them prior to the time that the action was commenced. This was, in effect, an instruction that they were not entitled to recover for any damage sustained by reason of being compelled to seek a new residence. Under these instructions, it is not to be assumed that the jury included in their verdict any damage sustained by reason of any delay in repairing the house.

It cannot be held that the verdict was excessive or unsustained by the evidence. It was shown that the cement walk had been broken up, the fence in front of the house demolished, the lawn and shrubbery destroyed, and the house itself struck by the roller with such force that it was displaced from its position upon its foundations, and permanently injured. Testimony was given by several experts that the amount of damage was greater than that awarded by the jury, and, although it was shown on the part of the defendant that a portion of this damage could be repaired for less than the amount of the verdict, the jury were at liberty to consider—what is apparent to any one—that the permanent injury to the building by displacing it from its foundations, breaking its chimneys, and destroying the plastering is a greater damage than the mere cost of patching it up so as to make it serviceable.

The judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed: VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.

JONES v. WALDEN. (S. F. 3,910.)*

ACTION AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—LIMITATION—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION — DECEDENT'S ESTATE—REJECTION OF CLAIM IN PART—EFFECT.

1. The allowance of a claim against a decedent's estate for less than the full amount thereof is a rejection of the rest of the claim.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1498, providing that when a claim is rejected either by an executor or administrator or a judge of the superior court the holder must sue within three months from the rejection if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due, the limitation begins to run from the date of rejection by an administrator.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action by Thomas G. Jones against J. B. Walden, administrator of the estate of James B. Chase, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Abe. Ruef and Fabius F. Finch, for appellant. Frisbie & White, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action against the administrator of the estate of James B. Chase, deceased, to recover $12,180.75 alleged to have been owing from said Chase at the time of his death to plaintiff upon an open, mutual, and current account. Judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The court below held that appellant's alleged cause of action was barred by section 1498 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and we do not see how this conclusion can be successfully assailed. That section is as follows: "When a claim is rejected either by the executor or administrator, or a judge of the superior court, the holder must bring suit in the proper court against the executor or administrator within three months after the date of its rejection, if it be then due, or within two months after it becomes due, otherwise the claim shall be forever barred." The facts which make this section applicable to the case at bar are these: Appellant's claim for the $12,180.75 having been presented to the administrator, the latter, on January 16, 1902, allowed the same for only $343.58, and on said day indorsed his allowance for that amount upon the claim. Afterwards, on February 20, 1902, the judge of the superior court indorsed on the claim a similar allowance for said sum of $343.58. This present action was commenced May 6, 1902, which was more than three months after the said indorsement of the claim by the administrator, but within three months after the said indorsement of the claim by the judge of the superior court.

The allowance of the claim by the administrator for $343.58 was clearly, in law, a rejection of all the rest of the claim. Consolidated Nat. Bank v. Hayes, 112 Cal. 75, 83, 44 Pac. 469. And as the rejection occurred on January 16, 1902, the three-months limitation prescribed by section 1498 commenced to run from that date. The contention that the action of the superior judge on February 20th was necessary to the completion of the rejection is not maintainable. The language of the section is that when a claim is rejected "either by the executor or administrator, or a judge of the superior court," suit must be commenced within three months after "the date of its rejection." When an administrator rejects a claim the rejection is complete and final, and cannot be changed or in any way affected by any future action of the judge. In such case there is no reason for presenting a claim to the judge at all, and it is only where a claim has been allowed by an administrator that there is a necessity of presenting it to the judge, for he may reject it notwithstanding its allowance by the administrator. But a claim may be conclusively rejected by either the administrator or the judge, and when there is a rejection by either the statute commences to run from the date of such rejection.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MEAD. (Cr. 1,157.)

PROSTITUTION—CONNIVANCE OF PROSTITUTE'S HUSBAND—PROSECUTION—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY—MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT—EVIDENCE—REMARKS OF COUNSEL—COMMENT ON DEFENDANT'S TESTIMONY.

1. St. 1891, p. 285, c. 206, makes it a felony for any man to connive at or permit the placing of his wife in a house of prostitution, or to allow the wife to remain there. Pen. Code, § 1185, declares that an objection to the sufficiency of an indictment which is waived by a failure to demur will not be sufficient to justify an order for arrest of judgment. Section 950, subd. 2, and section 959, subd. 6, provide that an indictment must contain the statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary language. By section 957 the words used in an indictment are to be construed in their usual acceptance in common language. By section 1012 an objection that an indictment is not certain as to the circumstances of the offense is waived by a failure to demur. Section 960 provides that no indictment is insufficient and that no judgment can be affected by reason of any defect in matter of form which does not prejudice a substantial right of the defendant, and by section 1258 the Supreme Court must give judgment without regard to technical errors or defects. Held, that a conviction under St. 1891, p. 285, c. 206, would not be reversed on appeal because the indictment did not charge that defendant, in permitting his wife to be placed in a house of prostitution, did so for the purpose of prostitution, where the objection was not made by demurrer, but by motion in arrest.

2. Where on a prosecution under St. 1891, p. 285, c. 206, making it a felony for one to permit his wife to remain in a house of prostitution, etc., defendant's wife testified that she had previously been in "quite a few" houses of prostitution, one of which was a house in M., it was not error for the court to exclude a question put to her as to whether she had been an inmate in a house of prostitution at M. conducted by her sister, since the question was immaterial.

3. On a prosecution under St. 1891, p. 285, c. 206, making it a felony for one to permit his wife to remain in a house of prostitution, etc., evidence that the house in question contained 12 rooms, commonly known as "cribs," each one of which was occupied by a different woman as a place of prostitution for herself alone, and that defendant's wife occupied one of them for that purpose, amounted to a showing that she was in a "house of prostitution," within the statute.

4. Pen. Code, § 1323, declares that the neglect or refusal of a defendant to be a witness cannot be used against him on the trial. On a prosecution under St. 1891, p. 285, c. 206, making it a felony for one to permit his wife to remain in a house of prostitution, etc., defendant did not testify as to whether he and his alleged wife had been actually married, but he testified that on going ashore from a man-of-war at one time he saw her in a saloon; that she said she had done wrong, and asked him to take her back again; that he saw her again some weeks later; that they met another man, and the three spent several hours drinking; that he promised to take her back; and engaged a room and stayed all night with her, and the next thing he knew she was in a house of prostitution. Held, that as the jury might have inferred that defendant was taking her back to live with him as a paramour, or that he was condoning her offense as a husband, it was not error for the district attorney to comment on the failure of defendant to deny that the woman in question was his wife.

5. On appeal in a criminal case a portion of appellant's brief, "The court erred in refusing defendant's proposed instructions, Nos. 3, 6, and 7 (folios 40–44, inclusive)," is not an argument, and does not justify any consideration of errors supposed to be presented thereby.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Fred Mead was convicted of conniving at, consenting to, and permitting his wife to be placed in a house of prostitution, and he appeals from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. C. Daly and E. B. Power, Deputy Atty. Gens., and Lewis F. Byington, Dist. Atty., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of conniving at, consenting to, and permitting his wife to be placed in a house of prostitution, as defined by the act of 1891 (St. 1891, p. 285, c. 206), and appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The first error that is assigned is the denial of his motion in arrest of judgment made upon the ground that the information is defective. The provisions of the act defining the crime, so far as applicable, are as follows: "Any man who connives at, consents to, or permits the placing or leaving of his wife in a house of prostitution, or allows or permits his wife to remain therein, shall be guilty of a felony," etc. The information charges that the defendant at the time and place stated "did then and there willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously connive at, consent to, and permit the placing and leaving of one Gertie Raymond Mead, then and there and at all times herein mentioned the wife of said Fred Mead, in a house of prostitution, situate," etc. The contention of the defendant is that this statute is not to be construed literally so as to forbid a husband to place his wife in a house of prostitution, or permit her to remain therein, for an innocent purpose, as a cook or seamstress for instance, but only to forbid the placing or leaving her therein for the purposes of prostitution, and that when construed in this way the crime is not complete unless it is alleged and proven that the wife was left in the house of prostitution with the intention on the part of the husband that she shall herself act as a prostitute. It may be conceded for the purposes of this case that if the objection had been raised by demurrer for uncertainty the information would be fatally defective. But where there is no demurrer, and the defect is sought to be raised solely by motion in arrest of judgment, we think a different rule should prevail. Section 1185 of the Penal Code declares that an objection to the sufficiency of the information which is waived by failure to demur will not be sufficient to justify an order for the arrest of judgment. Under the provisions of the Code an information must state the acts constituting the offense "in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended" (section 950, subd. 2); and if it is sufficient to withstand this test it is not subject to attack either by general demurrer or by motion in arrest of judgment. See, also, section 959, Pen. Code, subd. 6. The words used are to be construed "in their usual acceptance in common language," except technical phrases defined by law. Section 957, Pen. Code. We think it must be admitted that a person of common understanding, construing words according to their usual acceptance in common language, would understand that a man who was charged with "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously conniving at, consenting to, and permitting" the placing of his wife in a house of prostitution was charged with placing her there for the purpose of prostitution, and not in the innocent capacity of a cook or seamstress. The words "willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously" must be given some effect in construing such language, and they certainly would exclude an act which by law was innocent. The utmost that can be said in criticism of this information, therefore, is that it may not be direct and certain as to the particular circumstances of the offense. Such an objection is waived by a failure to demur. Pen. Code, § 1012.

A motion in arrest of judgment is made after the trial. In this case the record contains the evidence, and it shows that there was no pretense on the part of the prosecution that the defendant would be guilty if the wife was placed in the house of prostitution for innocent purposes only. The chief effort of the prosecution was to show that she was there for the purposes of prostitution, and that the defendant had knowledge of the purpose, and not only passively consented thereto, but actively procured her to be there. If the defendant before the trial had presented a demurrer to the information, and had then urged the defect therein which he now suggests, there would have been an opportunity for the court to have directed an amendment of the information, curing the defect. Instead of raising the question at that point in the case, he seeks to gain an advantage by taking the chances of an acquittal upon the trial, and, after conviction, attempting to get a new trial by reason of the defect which he should have urged before. It is very clear that he was not in any respect prejudiced on the trial by the supposed defect in the information. Section 960 of the Penal Code provides that no information is insufficient "nor can the trial, judgment or other proceeding thereon be affected by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits." And by section 1258, Pen. Code, this court must give judgment "without regard to technical errors or defects which do not affect the substantial rights of the parties." In view of these provisions, we do not think the judgment should be reversed for the alleged defect in the information, even if we concede that the language used does not with certainty state all the facts constituting a public offense.

2. When the wife of the defendant was testifying as a witness the court refused to allow the defendant's attorney on cross-examination to ask if, prior to the time she went to the house in question in this case, she had not been an inmate of a house of prostitution at Martinez conducted by her sister. This ruling is assigned as error. The defendant's argument is that the question was asked in order to show that she had previously been an inmate of a house of prostitution, and would therefore be more likely to enter the house in question of her own volition, without being influenced by fear of her husband. At the time the court made this ruling there had been no testimony that fear of her husband had caused her to enter the house of prostitution. Such testimony as there was on the subject of fear was brought out by the defendant's counsel upon subsequent cross-examination. Therefore we cannot say that the court erred in excluding the testimony. But the fact really sought to be elicited by the question was immaterial. Immediately before the question was asked the witness had testified that she had previously been in "quite a few" houses of prostitution, one of which was a house in Martinez, and the purpose of the question was manifestly to ascertain whether or not this house in Martinez was conducted by her sister. It having been shown that she had previously been in several houses of prostitution, the entire purpose for which the defendant contends had been accomplished, and the mere question whether or not the particular house in Martinez had been conducted by her sister was wholly immaterial.

3. It is contended that the verdict is against law, because the court instructed the jury that a house of prostitution is one in which "two or more women reside and engage in illegitimate sexual intercourse for money"; and, further, "a single room may constitute a house of prostitution"; and that the evidence shows that the defendant's wife occupied a single room alone. The theory is that the state is bound by the definition of the law given by the court in its instructions, whether they be right or wrong, and that if the crime proven by the evidence does not measure up to the standard fixed by the court in its instructions the verdict is against law, and there must be a new trial. We do not think it is necessary to decide whether this theory is correct or not.

The evidence, however, shows that the house in question contained 12 rooms, commonly known as "cribs," each one of which was occupied by a different woman as a place of prostitution for herself alone, and that the wife of the defendant occupied one of them for that purpose. We hold that, under these circumstances, defendant's wife was in a "house of prostitution," within the meaning and intent of the statute under consideration, and hence the verdict was not against law. The fact that the court instructed the jury that the house must be occupied by two or more women would not justify this court or the court below in granting a new trial because there was no proof that a particular room of the house was occupied by more than one woman, if the evidence was otherwise sufficient to justify the verdict.

4. There is the usual claim that the rights of the defendant were prejudiced by misconduct of the district attorney in his closing argument. The misconduct consisted in commenting upon the alleged failure of the defendant to deny that the woman who was placed in the house of prostitution was his wife. Section 1323, Pen. Code, declares that the neglect or refusal of the defendant to be a witness cannot be used against him on the trial. It may be conceded that under this section in general it is not proper for the district attorney to comment on the effect of the failure of the defendant to testify upon any subject connected with the trial, although he may have been a witness and may have testified on other subjects. But the record in this case does not show that the defendant failed to testify on the subject, as his counsel claims. There had been testimony on the part of the prosecution satisfactorily showing that a legal marriage ceremony had been performed between the defendant and the witness Gertrude Mead, and that they had thereafter lived together after the manner of husband and wife. This was sufficient prima facie proof that they did sustain that relation. The defendant, while he did not testify expressly on the question whether or not they had been actually married, did testify to several circumstances which would justify the inference that they were living together meretriciously, and not as husband and wife. Thus, he testified that, after coming ashore from a man-of-war about May, 1900, he saw her in a saloon conducted by her sister, and that they had a few drinks together, after which he left her for a time and came back, and had some more drinks with her and went to bed; that he went with her to see her mother and visit her aunt, and was with her pretty much all night; that she said she had done wrong, and asked him to take her back again, promising to conduct herself like a lady and behave and lead a decent life, and that she thought it best for her to go back with him again, and that if he would take her back she would lead a different life; that he saw her again some five weeks later, and went from her mother's home down town with her, where they met a man named Rogers, and the three of them went around town for several hours, drinking at several places, and that she again asked him to take her back, and that he promised her to take her back provided she would live decent and quit drinking; that she got drunk that very night, and he was going to quit her again; that he engaged a room and stayed all night with her; that he rented a room with the intention of making her behave herself, and that after they commenced living together she behaved herself about a week, and then began carousing and drinking, and the next thing he knew she was in a crib; that he had not had anything to do with her for about three weeks previous to his arrest. Under this testimony the jury might have inferred either that he was taking her back to live with him again as a paramour, or that as a husband he was condoning her offense and taking her back to live with him as his wife. Under this very equivocal testimony of the defendant, himself, if there was any contention on the part of the defense that the defendant was not her husband, there was no impropriety in the district attorney commenting upon the fact that he had made no express denial of the fact. If the jury should take one of the possible inferences, the effect would be that he had, by his testimony as a whole, denied by implication that she was his wife. If the other inference were adopted, the effect would be that his testimony would be considered as an admission of their marital relations. The prosecution was justified in calling the attention of the jury to the vague character of his testimony on the subject, and the absence of an explicit denial.

5. The last point made by the defendant is as follows: "The court erred in refusing defendant's proposed instructions Nos. 3, 6, and 7 (folios 40 to 44, inclusive)." We cannot dignify this portion of the brief by styling it an argument. It does not justify any consideration of the errors supposed to be presented thereby.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ABNER DOBLE CO. v. KEYSTONE CONSOL. MIN. CO. (S. F. 3,086.)*

PLEADING—DEFECTS—CURE—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 469, provides that no variance shall be deemed material unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice, when the court may order the pleadings to be amended on terms; and section 475 prohibits a reversal for any error not substantially injuring the party complaining, and that there shall be no presumption that error is prejudicial, or that injury was done by error shown. Held that, in the absence of a showing that any objection or exception was taken to any of the evidence on the ground of variance, it would be presumed on appeal that sufficient evidence was introduced to justify the findings and judgment.

2. Where plaintiff's pleadings disclosed that plaintiff sued for a balance on an account, which included as credits to defendant three certain notes, credited as payments on account, and plaintiff claimed that after crediting such notes there still remained due the balance sued for, a defect in defendant's cross-complaint, relating to the amount claimed by defendant to be due from plaintiff by reason of such notes, alleged to have been executed by defendant to plaintiff for its accommodation, in that it did not allege nonpayment of the amount defendant claimed to be due, was cured.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by the Abner Doble Company against the Keystone Consolidated Mining Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jesse W. Lilienthal, Wm. F. Gibson, and Frohman & Jacobs, for appellant. Edward Lynch, for respondent.

VAN DYKE, J. The plaintiff corporation sued the defendant corporation for the sum of $1,527.29 as a balance due for work, material, and money which it furnished said defendant. The bill of particulars furnished by the plaintiff to the defendant on its demand showed charges amounting to $8,094.27 and credits for cash and allowances of $6,566.98, leaving as a balance the amount sued for. In the answer and cross-complaint filed by the defendant it is claimed that the charges in the bill of particulars aggregating $4,752.93 were made for reconstructing and transforming the compressor at the Keystone mine, and that this amount should be disallowed because the plaintiff did not fulfill its contract as to the efficiency which the compressor would have when transformed, as guarantied by plaintiff, and its alteration had rendered the compressor worthless. It was further claimed by the defendant that the four promissory notes given by said defendant to the plaintiff, amounting to $5,200, were so given upon a written agreement that they would be applied upon the amount of goods sold and to be sold to the defendant mining company, and, if they should overpay the amount due the plaintiff company the balance was to be repaid to the defendant company at its option; and the defendant alleges that these notes were negotiated and transferred by the plaintiff to the Anglo-Californian Bank, Limited, and that the defendant paid them, except $750, which it was liable for, and would be compelled to pay. Defendant also claimed that it had been damaged to the extent of $2,000 by being deprived of the use of a compressor since its alteration, and in said amended cross-complaint defendant demanded judgment against the plaintiff for $3,257.14, with legal interest thereon from May 14, 1895.

In its decision the court found, in substance, that the transformation of the air compressor was a failure, and that the plaintiff did not in any particular comply with its contract in that regard, and that defendant advanced to plaintiff three promissory notes, amounting to $4,000, on the agreement between the parties that the notes should be applied in payment on account for goods sold and to be sold to the defendant, and, in the event that they overpaid the account, the balance was to be repaid to the defendant at its option. The court further found that the defendant owed the plaintiff $3,375.09 for goods sold and delivered, and which were not connected with the compressor transaction, and that the defendant had paid and advanced to the plaintiff $6,566.85, leaving a balance due defendant of $3,191.89, which should be returned by plaintiff by virtue of the agreement between the parties already referred to, and that the defendant should have judgment for that amount, with interest at the legal rate from May 14, 1895, together with the further sum of $1,046, as damages sustained by the defendant through the failure of the plaintiff to perform its contract. On these findings judgment was entered accordingly on November 23, 1899, in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff for $5,203.89 and costs. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment so entered December 8, 1899, upon the judgment roll. The transcript thereof was filed in this court February 8, 1902. Plaintiff's opening brief on this appeal was filed April 15, 1902; respondent's points and authorities May 23, 1902, and appellant's reply brief June 23, 1902.

In the points and authorities on behalf of appellant the greater portion is devoted to the consideration of the alleged error in awarding judgment to the defendant in excess of the amount demanded in the prayer of the amended cross-complaint. The prayer was for judgment in the sum of $3,257.14, with legal interest thereon since May 14, 1895, amounting at the date of the entry of the judgment to the sum of $4,289.65, whereas the judgment in fact as entered was for $5,203.89. By a supplement to the transcript herein, filed January 5, 1903, it appears that after the entry of the judgment under consideration the plaintiff moved for a new trial in the court below, whereupon said court, upon said motion coming on to be heard, granted an order that, unless defendant should consent to a reduction of the judgment to the sum of $3,257.14, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from May 14, 1895, and costs of suit, a new trial would be granted, and that defendant thereupon consented to such a reduction, and accordingly said superior court made and caused to be entered an order making said reduction in the judgment theretofore entered, and directing the clerk of said court to enter said reduction in the judgment book and make appropriate reference to said correction, and that plaintiff's motion for a new trial was thereupon denied. The stipulation contained in said supplement to the transcript shows that the said reduction was thereupon entered in the judgment book of said court on November 26, 1902, and on December 24, 1902, plaintiff filed and served its notice of appeal from said judgment as modified, and gave an undertaking on appeal in due form. And it was further stipulated that, in order to avoid the necessity of printing again the matter already appearing in the transcript filed on appeal from the judgment before its reduction, said transcript might stand for the transcript on appeal from the judgment as reduced, together with the matter contained in the stipulation, and that it be considered together with the briefs already filed and the oral argument which counsel might desire to make, and that, as the superior court had already reduced the judgment to the amount demanded in the amended cross-complaint and answer, "the appellant withdraws his objection to said judgment on the ground that it exceeded the amount demanded in the amended cross-complaint and answer, and which said objections are contained in points 1 and 2 of its opening brief, and no objections are made to the form of the order or manner of entry of the same reducing said judgment."

Point 3 of appellant's brief is the only remaining portion applicable to the appeal from the judgment as modified, and this is based upon the contention that the amended cross-complaint furnishes no basis for the judgment. It is objected on the part of appellant that there is a variance between the finding and the pleadings, in that it is alleged in the amended cross-complaint that the defendant was damaged in the sum of $2,000, being the value of the use of the air compressor in the condition it was prior to the making of the alteration by the plaintiff, whereas the finding is that his damage was for money expended for railroad freight, costs of hauling material, brick, and for labor used in transforming the compressor, and for the cost of restoring it to its original condition. Further, it is claimed that there is no averment in the amended cross-complaint of the nonpayment of the sums of money claimed to be due defendant from plaintiff.

There is no bill of exceptions or statement brought up in the transcript. The respondent, in his brief, states that a bill of exceptions containing the testimony and part of the documentary evidence given at the trial—and some of an important character to respondent—was taken away from the clerk's office by the plaintiff in October, 1899, and by said plaintiff claimed to have been lost. However that may be, there is nothing now before the court showing that any objection or exception was made to any of the evidence introduced at the trial, and we must presume, therefore, that sufficient evidence was introduced to justify the findings and judgment, as all presumptions and intendments are in favor of the judgment. "No variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Whenever it appears that a party has been so misled the court may order the pleadings to be amended, upon such terms as may be just." Code Civ. Proc. § 469. "No judgment, decision, or decree shall be reversed or affected by reason of any error, ruling, instruction, or defect, unless it shall appear from the record that such error, ruling, instruction, or defect was prejudicial, and also that by reason of such error, ruling, instruction, or defect the said party complaining or appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury, and that a different result would have been probable if such error, ruling, instruction, or defect had not occurred or existed. There shall be no presumption that error is prejudicial, or that injury was done if error is shown." Code Civ. Proc. § 475. "It is unfair for a party to withhold an objection founded upon a defect, which, if pointed out in time, might be remedied, until it is too late to correct the defect, thereby inducing an opponent to rely upon his pleading as sufficient in order that he may have a fatal objection. Such course is a fraud upon justice, and prevents a fair trial. It is therefore not tolerated." Greiss v. State Investment Company, 98 Cal. 242, 33 Pac. 195. In Treanor v. Houghton, 103 Cal. 54, 36 Pac. 1081, it is said: "That the omission in the complaint would have been fatal in the face of a special demurrer is settled by the cases quoted supra, and by many others to which we might refer. The question, however, is, can appellant, after verdict, raise the question here for the first time?" Then, after quoting from Chitty on Pleadings, this court continues: "The difficulty experienced in many cases of this character is to determine whether or not the omitted fact or facts were proven at the trial. In the present instance we are met with no difficulty of this character. The cause having been tried by the court, and the facts found, it appears affirmatively by the record that what was omitted in the complaint was supplied without objection at the trial." And the same may be said in reference to the case at bar, as already stated. In Chitty's Pleading, vol. 1, page 705, quoted in Treanor v. Houghton, the rule is stated as follows: "The second mode by which defects in pleading may be in some cases aided is by intendment after verdict. The doctrine upon this subject is founded upon the common law, and is independent of any statutory enactments. The general principle on which it depends appears to be that, where there is any defect, imperfection, or omission in any pleading, whether in substance or form, which would have been a fatal objection upon demurrer, yet, if the issue joined be such as necessarily required on the trial proof of the facts so defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted, and without which it is not to be presumed that either the judge would direct the jury to give, or the jury would have given, the verdict, such defect, imperfection, or omission is cured by verdict. The expression 'cured by verdict' signifies that the court will, after a verdict, presume or intend that the particular thing which appears to be defectively or imperfectly stated or omitted in the pleadings was duly proven at the trial." If the portion of the cross-complaint relating to the amount claimed to be due from the plaintiff to the defendant by reason of the three notes executed by defendant to the plaintiff for its accommodation is defective because of the failure to allege nonpayment of the amount the defendant claims to be due, that defect is sufficiently disposed of by the original complaint and the plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint, taken in connection with the copy of the plaintiff's account set forth in the defendant's answer. These pleadings show that the plaintiff sues for a balance alleged to be due plaintiff on an account which includes as credits to the defendant the three notes referred to, they being credited as payments on the account; that they were accepted as payments; and that the plaintiff in fact claims that, after crediting the same, there still remained due plaintiff the balance sued for, and does not claim that there should have been any items in the account for any supposed payment of the amount claimed in the cross-complaint; in other words, that the plaintiff does not really claim that there ever was any such payment to be denied by a formal allegation of nonpayment. The alleged error is, therefore, without substantial merit, and would by no means justify a reversal of the judgment. It is a familiar rule that defects in a pleading may be cured by averments in the pleadings of the opposite party. Vance v. Anderson, 113 Cal. 536, 45 Pac. 816; Daggett v. Gray, 110 Cal. 172, 42 Pac. 568; Schenck v. Hartford etc. Ins. Co., 71 Cal. 28, 11 Pac. 807; Cohen v. Knox, 90 Cal. 266, 27 Pac. 215, 3 L. R. A. 711; Pomeroy on Remedies and Remedial Rights, § 579.

The judgment, as modified, is affirmed.

WITTMAN v. POLICE COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 3,015.)

CERTIORARI—WHEN LIES.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1068, providing for a review on certiorari when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions exceeds its jurisdiction, and there is no appeal or other adequate remedy, that writ does not lie to review the action of a police judge in ordering or summoning a jury, pursuant to section 230, for the trial of a misdemeanor case.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Certiorari by George W. Wittman against the police court of the city and county of San Francisco and George H. Cabaniss, judge. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

John J. Barrett, for appellant. P. F. Dunne and J. A. Hosmer, for respondent.

GRAY, C. This is a certiorari proceeding in which the trial court gave the plaintiff judgment annulling an order of defendant which directed the sheriff of the said city and county to summon 40 jurors for the trial of the plaintiff on a charge of misdemeanor then regularly pending before the defendant police court. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The writ of certiorari, otherwise denominated the writ of review, is an extraordinary remedy, and lies only "when an inferior tribunal, board or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board or officer, and there is no appeal, nor in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy and adequate remedy." Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc. It is provided in section 230, Code Civ. Proc., as follows: "When jurors are required in any of the justices' courts or in any police or other inferior court, they shall, upon the order of the justice or any one of the justices where there is more than one, or of the judge thereof, be summoned by the sheriff, constable, marshal or policeman of the jurisdiction." In the regular course of the misdemeanor case pending before the herein defendant police court, the defendant therein having demanded a jury, it became necessary for the judge of said court to construe said section 230 for the purpose of determining whether it gave him any discretion as to which of the officers mentioned the venire should be directed. He seems to have concluded that it did give him a discretion, and exercised that discretion in favor of the sheriff. The construction of the section and the issuance of the venire were not only matters within the jurisdiction of the police judge, but were absolutely necessary to the further progress of a case in which it is admitted that the police court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter as well as of the person of the defendant. To what officer the venire should run was a question that it was the necessary duty of the police judge to decide. It is not necessary for us to say, and we do not here even intend to intimate, whether he decided the question correctly in directing the venire to the sheriff. If he decided it incorrectly, it was only an error that might have been waived without invalidating any subsequent judgment in the action; and, if not waived, it might also have been reviewed as an error of law on appeal from any judgment that might have followed. It may not be amiss in this connection to say that there is nothing in the petition for this writ to show that the summoning of the jury by the sheriff was not waived or consented to by petitioner, but, so far as we can gather from the petition, the case was continued from time to time after the jury was summoned, and it is not shown that any objection was made in the police court at any time on account of the sheriff having summoned the jury. The writ should have been refused for the dual reason that the order of which the annulment was sought was clearly a matter within the jurisdiction of the police judge, and, if any error was involved in the making of it, the defendant in the action had an adequate remedy by appeal. Bennett v. Wallace, 43 Cal. 25; Valentine v. Police Court, 141 Cal. 615, 75 Pac. 336.

This court has held in two well-considered cases that the denial of a jury altogether in a misdemeanor case was but an error of law, and that the justice's court did not in such denial exceed its jurisdiction. Ex parte Miller, 82 Cal. 454, 22 Pac. 1113; Powelson v. Lockwood, 82 Cal. 613, 23 Pac. 143. If an order denying a jury trial altogether is not in excess of jurisdiction, it is difficult to see how an order merely directing what officer shall summon persons from whom to select a jury can be said to be in excess of jurisdiction. In the still later case of In re Fife, 110 Cal. 8, 42 Pac. 299, also well considered, it is said: "A jury may be waived in any civil case, and it is not contended by any one that the refusal of a demand for a jury in a civil case affects the jurisdiction, or is anything more than an error; and as a jury may, under the Constitution, be waived 'in all criminal cases not amounting to a felony,' a jury is not a necessary constituent part of a court for the trial of a misdemeanor, and the refusal of the court to allow a jury on such a trial is mere error. This principle will be found to be established by the general authorities, but, as it has been definitely declared by decisions of this court, we need look no further."

We advise that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the court below to deny the petition of plaintiff in every particular.

MURPHY v. MURPHY. (S. F. 3,027.)

JUDGMENT — ACTIONS— PLEADINGS—FINDINGS —INTEREST—PRESUMPTIONS—CALCULATION.

1. In an action on a judgment a complaint alleging "that said Queen's Bench Division of said High Court of Justice had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said action and of the parties thereto," and further alleging that said judgment "was duly given, made, and entered in and by" said court, sufficiently alleged the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment, in the absence of a demurrer.

2. Where a complaint in an action on a judgment alleged that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action and of the parties thereto, and that the judgment was duly given, made, and entered in and by said court, findings that the allegations of the complaint were true sufficiently showed the jurisdiction of the court by which the judgment was rendered.

3. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, an English judgment will be presumed to have drawn interest at 7 per cent., the same as a domestic judgment.

4. In an action on an English judgment, an allegation of the complaint that on the date of the judgment "the value of said judgment in lawful money of the United States of America was $7,055" sufficiently alleged the value of the judgment.

5. In an action on an English judgment, where the complaint alleged the value of the judgment in American money on the date of its rendition, and asked interest on that amount at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from said date, and the court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, the judgment to be rendered was properly calculated from the figures and allegations of the complaint.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Nora Helen Gertrude O'Neill Murphy against Bertham Samuel Joseph Finniston O'Neill Murphy. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bishop & Wheeler (William Rix, of counsel), for appellant. Elliott McAllister and Frank H. Powers, for respondent.

GRAY, C. The action is based upon a judgment made and entered in favor of plaintiff against defendant in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice of the Supreme Court of Judicature in England on the 11th day of November, 1898, for the sum of £1,454 4s. The plaintiff obtained judgment, from which the defendant appealed.

1. There was no demurrer to the amended complaint. The appellant attacks it, however, upon the ground that it fails to state facts constituting a cause of action, in that it contains no facts showing that the English court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action or of the person of the defendant. The complaint contains the following allegations in this behalf: "That said Queen's Bench Division of said High Court of Justice had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of said action and of the parties thereto." It also avers that said judgment "was duly given, made, and entered in and by" said court. Certainly, in the absence of a demurrer, this was sufficient on the subject of jurisdiction in the English court. Dore v. Thornburgh, 90 Cal. 64, 27 Pac. 30, 25 Am. St. Rep. 100. The findings are that all the allegations of the complaint are true, and hence the findings also sufficiently show the jurisdiction of the court in which the judgment here sued on was rendered.

2. The allegation of the complaint as to the value of the judgment is: "That upon said 11th day of November, A. D. 1898 [the date of the English judgment], the value of said judgment * * * in lawful money of the United States of America was, to wit, seven thousand and fifty-five dollars." The complaint also alleged that no part of said judgment had been paid, and that the judgment remained "wholly unpaid, and in full force and effect." The law of England on the question of interest, as on every other question, will, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, be presumed to be the same as the law of this state. Wickersham v. Johnston, 104 Cal. 407, 411, 38 Pac. 89, 43 Am. St. Rep. 118. The judgment, being of a given value when rendered is presumed to have drawn interest at the rate of 7 per cent., and nothing having been paid on it, the value of the judgment at the date of the commencement of this action, as well as at the date of the judgment herein, was a mere matter of figures, to be calculated with mathematical certainty from the allegations of the complaint. The prayer of the complaint was for $7,055, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from said 11th of November, 1898, the date of the English judgment. The complaint was entirely sufficient as to allegations of value of the judgment, and the findings following it were also entirely sufficient, and fully support the conclusions of law and the judgment herein for $8,284.13, which judgment was properly calculated from the figures and allegations of the complaint; all of which were found to be true.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

ROHRBACHER v. AITKEN et al. (S. F. 3,028.)

CONSIDERATION FOR NOTE—COMPROMISE OF LEGAL PROCEEDINGS.

1. There having been a shortage in the account of plaintiff's deceased husband as executor of an estate, the dismissal of proceedings against his co-executor, and refraining from presenting a claim against the estate of plaintiff's deceased husband, is a sufficient consideration for plaintiff's note for the amount of shortage.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. C. Sloss, Judge.

Action for the cancellation of a note by Mary S. Rohrbacher against John R. Aitken and J. C. Cullen. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for appellant. John R. Aitken in pro. per., and also for respondent J. C. Cullen.

COOPER, C. This action was brought to obtain the cancellation of a promissory note upon the ground that the maker had received no consideration therefor, and to enjoin the holder from attempting to realize upon certain shares of stock pledged to him as security for said note. Upon the findings judgment was entered for defendants, and this appeal is from the judgment and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The case turned upon the question as to whether or not there was a good and sufficient consideration for the note. The trial court found that "there was a good and sufficient consideration therefor moving from the said defendant, John R. Aitken, to the said plaintiff." The promissory note is presumed to have been executed for a sufficient consideration, and all presumptions are in favor of the finding of the court. We are of the opinion that the evidence supports the finding. Philip Rohrbacher, the husband of plaintiff, prior to his death, had been a joint executor with one Ehmann of the will and estate of one Merz. After his death, in April, 1897, it was discovered that there was an apparent shortage on the part of deceased in the funds of the Merz estate of about $5,000.

Defendant Aitken is the assignee of a three-fourths interest in the estate of Merz. In September, 1898, two of the heirs of the Merz estate, assignors of defendant Aitken, petitioned the court having jurisdiction to suspend the powers of the surviving executor, Ehmann, and to revoke his letters testamentary, and thereupon a citation was issued and an order made "temporarily suspending the powers of the executors of said estate, and directing said executors to show cause on the 12th day of September, 1898, why they should not be removed as executors of said estate." Pending the hearing on the citation Mr. Louis F. Dunand, who was attorney for plaintiff in the estate of her deceased husband, had investigated the matter of the shortage in the Merz estate, and had been engaged in negotiations with Mr. Asher, the attorney for defendants, as to said shortage. Dunand testified: "She examined the figures, and I communicated the facts to Mrs. Rohrbacher. One day Emma Rohrbacher, a daughter, stated that she preferred that she, her two daughters, and Mrs. Rohrbacher should pay the money by the execution of this note. * * * Mrs. Rohrbacher was the executrix of her husband's estate. * * * The lady and her child wished to pay the obligation of their father to the estate of Merz. * * * The daughter stated that she did not want her papa to owe any money; that when any money came out of her father's estate she would be willing to contribute her share; and Mrs. Rohrbacher stated that she would see the other sisters, and that if they wished to contribute she would give us an answer. At the next interview they were perfectly satisfied. * * * Our conversations were with reference to settling the amount of the deficit. The note was signed four or five months after negotiations had been commenced." Plaintiff testified: "I signed the note and agreement submitted to me. It was claimed that there was a shortage in the Merz estate, and, as I didn't want any scandal, or anything, I thought if I got anything out of my husband's estate, and my daughter's, we decided to settle that matter rather than to have any scandal." Defendant Aitken testified: "The consideration for the note was the dismissal of the proceedings against Mr. Paul Ehmann—the waiving of the claim against him. The consideration was the dismissal of the citation against Ehmann."

Plaintiff was represented by her counsel in all the negotiations and investigations as to the shortage of her deceased husband as executor of the Merz estate. She consulted her daughters, and fully investigated the matter. After such investigation, and with the consent of her attorney, she executed the note and agreement. The citation against the surviving executor Ehmann was thereupon dismissed, and the matter regarded as settled. The defendants changed their position upon the faith of the note and agreement. It may be that now they would be unable to collect from the co-executor. Where legal proceedings have been instituted, and the parties after investigation, in the absence of fraud, make a compromise agreement, and the proceedings are in consideration thereof dismissed, the dismissal of the proceedings constitutes a consideration for the agreement. The parties cannot afterwards make the agreement depend upon the question as to whether or not the party could have prevailed in such proceeding. If so, no compromise agreement would be valid. Such agreements, in the absence of fraud, are favored and sustained by the courts, because they put an end to litigation, and tend to produce peace and good will. Plaintiff, having faith in her attorney, and wishing to sustain the reputation of her deceased husband, knowing all the facts, made the agreement and signed the note. Good faith and honesty now require that she keep the contract she has made. She made the contract and note in March, 1899. She did not commence this action until September, 1899. The action was not tried until May, 1901. It was not necessary for defendants to have presented a claim against the estate of plaintiff's deceased husband. The claim was settled by the personal obligation of plaintiff. If she desired the estate of her deceased husband alone to be responsible, she should have taken that position before she signed the note. The principles herein stated have been applied by the courts in many cases. They were applied in a case where the husband died leaving a note unpaid, and having transferred all his property to his wife, who in turn transferred it to her daughter, and the mother and daughter gave a new note to the creditor of the deceased husband. Whelan v. Swain, 132 Cal. 389, 64 Pac. 560. And where a note and mortgage had been executed by the husband and wife, the husband died, and the claim of the mortgagee was proven against the estate, the wife and children executed a new note and mortgage upon the same property. Humboldt Sav., etc., Soc. v. Dowd, 137 Cal. 408, 70 Pac. 274. It was there said: "The mortgagors, after executing the note and mortgage in extension of a debt which was a legal charge upon their property, will not now be heard to say that their act was without consideration. If their sense of right and justice does not impel them to pay the note so made by them, the court, as a matter of law, will compel them to pay it."

In Conn. Life Ins. Co. v. McCormick, 45 Cal. 580, it was held that a mortgage executed by a married woman upon her separate property to secure money due and owing by her husband was valid. In the late case of Farmers', etc., Bank v. De Shorb, 137 Cal. 693, 70 Pac. 771, it is said: "It is the well-settled rule that a married woman may mortgage her separate property for the debt of her husband." See, further, Walker v. Dixon Crucible Co., 47 N. J. Eq. 342, 20 Atl. 885; McNulty v. Cooper, 3 Gill & J. 214; Shipman v. Lord, 58 N. J. Eq. 581, 44 Atl. 215. We have carefully examined the case of Chaffee v. Browne, 109 Cal. 211, 41 Pac. 1028, relied upon by appellant, and are not disposed to extend its doctrine beyond the facts therein stated, though it is not in conflict with what is here decided. There the mortgage was given by a married woman to secure the pre-existing debt of her husband. No extension of time was given, and nothing was given up or surrendered. "The wife received nothing, the husband received nothing, the creditor parted with nothing." (As to the effect of Chaffee v. Browne, see McDonald v. Randall, 139 Cal. 252, 72 Pac. 997.) In this case the creditor parted with his right to pursue the proceedings instituted by his citation. Six months' time was given by reason of the note. The plaintiff kept the question as to her husband's shortage in his capacity as trustee from being openly investigated in such proceeding.

We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; HARRISON, C.

KELLOGG v. LOPEZ. (S. F. 3,022.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—ACCOMMODATION PAPER—CONSIDERATION—CONTRIBUTION—NATURE OF CAUSE OF ACTION.

1. Where defendant and other stockholders of a corporation made and indorsed a note for the accommodation of the corporation, in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, at one time and as part of one transaction, whereupon the note was discounted and the money was received and used by the corporation, defendant and his comakers were merely sureties of the corporation, and, as such, entitled, by the terms of Civ. Code, § 2848, to contribution from each other.

2. Under Civ. Code, § 2831, defining a surety as one who, at the request of another, and for the purpose of securing to him a benefit, becomes responsible for the performance by the latter of some act in favor of a third person, or hypothecates property as security therefor, persons who execute and indorse a note for the accommodation of a corporation of which they are members are primarily liable for their individual proportion of the debt, and secondarily liable as sureties for the proportions owed by the others.

3. Under Civ. Code, § 1605, providing that any prejudice suffered or agreed to be suffered by another as an inducement to the promisor is a good consideration for a promise, the signing of accommodation paper by joint makers thereof is a sufficient consideration to support each other's promise to pay his proportion of the paper, but the secondary liability of such joint makers as sureties for the others' proportion of the obligation in case of their default is without consideration and invalid.

4. Where sureties are such not only upon equitable principles, but by the legal effect of their contract, a suit for contribution can be maintained in assumpsit on the implied contract by the surety satisfying the obligation; but where there is an express promise to pay there is always, to the extent that there is a consideration, a legal cause of action which will prevail except to the extent that grounds for equitable relief are affirmatively shown by defendant.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by C. R. Kellogg against R. E. De B. Lopez. From an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gavin McNab, for appellant. Chapman & Clift and Martin Stevens, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Suit on a promissory note for the sum of $1,500, with interest, etc. The note runs from the defendant Lopez to H. F. Anderson as payee. It was indorsed by the latter to the Bank of British Columbia, and upon payment by Anderson was, by his direction and for his use, assigned by the bank to the plaintiff. The defense set up in the answer is, in effect, that the note was signed by Lopez for the accommodation of Anderson, and that it was without consideration. The verdict and judgment was for the defendant. The appeal is by the plaintiff from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal question involved in the case is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, with relation to which the defendant's answer may be regarded as setting up two defenses: The one, that he signed as security for Anderson only (Civ. Code, § 2832); the other, that there was no consideration for his promise (Civ. Code, § 1550). These defenses are, in effect, identical, but they rest on different principles, which should be distinguished.

With regard to the former, there was no evidence in the case tending to show that Lopez signed the note for the accommodation of Anderson. But the facts proven by the defendant were, merely, that Anderson and Lopez and one Stackpole were stockholders of the San Mateo Coursing Association, a corporation, and made and indorsed the note for the accommodation of the association; that this was done in pursuance of an agreement to that effect, at one time and as part of one transaction; that the note was then delivered to an agent of the association to be discounted for its use, and that the money was received and used by the association. Upon this state of facts it is clear, at least in this state, that in equity—where "the form of the instrument may be * * * disregarded"—the parties to the note are to be regarded as mere sureties of the association, and as such entitled to contribution from each other. Reynolds v. Wheeler, 10 C. B. N. S. 564; McDonald v. Whitfield, 8 App. Cases, L. R. 744–5; Machado v. Fernandez, 74 Cal. 362, 16 Pac. 19; Leeke v. Hancock, 76 Cal. 127, 17 Pac. 937; Civ. Code, § 2822; and see, also, Deering v. The Earl of Winchelsen, 2 Bos. and Pul. 271, 273; Powell v. Powell, 48 Cal. 236; Norton v. Coons, 3 Denio, 132; s. c. 6 N. Y. 33; 1 Story's Eq. Jur. §§ 492–3; and Civ. Code, § 2848. The case, therefore, differs materially from the case pleaded; and the question is thus suggested, whether the facts proven were relevant to the issue presented by the answer. For if not, there was, with regard to the allegation that the note was made for the accommodation of Anderson, a total failure of proof.

The solution of this question will depend upon the nature of the reciprocal rights and obligations of the sureties between each other, disregarding their common relation to the principal debtor. Thus viewed, in such a case as we are considering each surety is primarily liable for his proportion of the debt, and for the balance as surety for the others. Civ. Code, § 2831; Bouvier's Law Dic. "Suretyship." As to his own part of the debt, therefore, he is not, as to his fellows, a surety, but a principal debtor. Thus, in the case before us, Lopez, in terms, agreed to pay to Anderson or order the whole of the debt, but in effect his agreement was to pay, unconditionally, his proportion of it, and the balance only upon the default of the others, and to the extent of this primary obligation the note precisely expresses the promise. As to the balance of the amount named in the note, the proofs show that Lopez was surety only for Anderson and Stackpole, and hence to that extent the note is invalidated. But as to his principal obligation the effect of the note is not varied nor its validity affected. The facts proved were therefore relevant to the issue, and all that can be said is that the defendant failed to prove his case in part; that is to say, he proved only that he was surety for Anderson for a third of the debt, and for Stackpole for another third, but as to the remaining third he failed to make out his case.

The same result must also be reached if we consider the defense as a plea of want of consideration. As to two-thirds of the note for which Anderson and Stackpole were primarily liable, there was no consideration moving to the defendant, and to that extent his promise was invalid. But as to his own part of the debt the incurrence of like obligations by Anderson and Stackpole constituted a "prejudice suffered or agreed to be suffered (by them) as an inducement" for the defendant's promise, and was therefore a sufficient consideration. Civ. Code, § 1605.

The suit, it may be observed, is not a suit for contribution merely. It is a suit on defendant's express promise to pay, to which the defense interposed has either wholly or partly failed. The case, therefore, differs from the case of contribution between sureties who are such not only upon equitable principles, but by the legal effect of their contract. In the latter case the suit for contribution can be maintained in assumpsit on the implied contract by the surety satisfying the obligation, but, it is said, cannot be maintained by him as assignee of the original contract. But in a case like the present, on an express promise to pay, there is always, to the extent there is a consideration, a legal cause of action, which remains unaffected except to the extent that the grounds for equitable relief are affirmatively shown by the defendant; and here the defendant has partly, if not wholly, failed to make out such equitable defense.

We advise that the order appealed from be reversed.

FRITTS v. CHARLES, Justice of the Peace.

(S. F. 3,909.)*

MISDEMEANORS — ARREST —WARRANT—JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—ISSUANCE—MANDAMUS—RIGHTS OF PRIVATE CITIZENS.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1086, providing that a writ of mandate will not be issued except on the application of the party beneficially interested, a private citizen was not entitled to such writ to compel a justice of the peace to issue a warrant of arrest for an alleged misdemeanor committed by another in unlawfully playing a game of chance with a slot machine, where there was nothing to show that its operation constituted an injury to plaintiff different in kind from the injury to the general public.

Commissioners' Decision. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; Hiram S. Tuttle, Judge.

*Rehearing denied December 29, 1904.

Application for a writ of mandate by Joseph Fritts against S. W. Charles, as justice of the peace. From a judgment denying the application, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Jas. H. Campbell, Dist. Atty., for appellant. S. W. Charles, in pro. per. Louis O'Neal and Owen D. Richardson, amicus curiæ.

COOPER, C. Defendant is a justice of the peace in Palo Alto township, in Santa Clara county. Plaintiff filed an affidavit with said justice in which he alleged that a misdemeanor had been committed by one Levin, by unlawfully playing and conducting a "certain game played with a device known as a slot machine; said machine being supplied with a certain amount of money, and being operated by placing therein a nickel and turning a crank; the person placing said nickel therein securing thereby a chance of getting a much larger sum of money from said machine upon turning said crank." The defendant refused to issue a warrant for the arrest of Levin for the reason that, in his opinion as justice aforesaid, the said criminal complaint or affidavit did not state facts sufficient to show that any public offense had been committed. Thereupon this application was made to the superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as justice, to issue a warrant for the arrest of Levin. The court denied the application for the writ, and plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

It is not necessary to pass upon the question as to the sufficiency of the complaint in the justice's court. The writ of mandate will not be issued except upon affidavit on the application of the party beneficially interested. Code Civ. Proc. § 1086. The plaintiff is not the party beneficially interested, within the meaning of the statute. If a misdemeanor has been committed, the law provides machinery for the arrest and prosecution of the party who committed the misdemeanor. If the officers of the law fail to do their duty where the rights of the public are involved, the law provides a remedy in such case. It is the settled rule that a private individual can apply for this remedy only in those cases where he has some private or particular interest to be subserved or some particular right to be preserved or protected by the aid of this process, independent of that which he holds with the public at large. In Marini v. Graham, 67 Cal. 130, 7 Pac. 442, the petitioner asked for a writ of mandate to compel the superintendent of public streets to abate an alleged public nuisance. The writ was denied, and the court said in speaking of the rights of the applicant: "The facts upon which he relies as the basis of his action to enforce an alleged private right in himself affirmatively show that the obstruction in the sidewalk of which he complains is not more injurious to himself than it is to the inhabitants at large. Any injury or annoyance which he suffered from it may be greater in degree, but it is not different in kind from that sustained by the public. Therefore he receives from it no special injury for which he is entitled in law to a private action, * * * or in a special proceeding to obtain a writ of mandate." See, also, Linden v. Alameda County, 45 Cal. 6; Ashe v. Board of Supervisors, 71 Cal. 236, 16 Pac. 783; People ex rel. Wirt v. Budd (Cal.) 47 Pac. 594; Mitchell v. Boardman, 79 Me. 469, 10 Atl. 452.

In this case there is nothing to show that operating the machine in which a person, by placing a nickel therein, "secures a chance of getting a much larger sum of money from said machine upon turning said crank," injures plaintiff in any manner different from the general public. He is not compelled to put a nickel in the machine and turn a crank, but, if he should do so, according to the complaint, he "secures a chance of getting a much larger sum from the machine."

The judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed: VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.

In re TRAVER'S ESTATE. (Sac. 1,275.)

BURK et al. v. NORTON et al.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — EXPENSES OF ADMINISTRATION—FROM WHAT FUND PAYABLE.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 1560, provides that, if testator by his will designates the estate to be appropriated for the payment of debts and administration expenses, they must be paid out of the appropriated estate so far as it is sufficient. Section 1562 provides that, if the estate appropriated is insufficient, any portion of the estate not disposed of by will must be appropriated for that purpose. Held, that where testator died having disposed of only one-half of his estate by will, and without having made any provision for the payment of debts and expenses, they were to be paid out of the intestate estate.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Charles Traver, deceased. From a decree ordering the payment of debts and expenses of administration out of the portion of the estate as to which deceased died intestate, Mary E. Burk and others, heirs at law of deceased, appeal. Affirmed.

Albert M. Johnson and Hiram W. Johnson, for appellants. S. Solon Holl, Holl & Dunn, Arthur C. Huston, and Holl & Powers, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. Charles Traver died in Sacramento county in 1901, leaving a will made August 5, 1897. At the time this will was made his wife was living, and by its terms he bequeathed all his property to her during her life. He then provided, after reciting that all the property was community property, and that the will was only intended to convey that portion of it over which he had testamentary capacity, that "at the death of my wife it is my will that one-half of the property hereby given, devised, and bequeathed to my wife during her lifetime shall descend and go to Lott D. Norton, Charles T. Norton, and Russell Day, Jr., in equal proportions." And then further provided that: "If my wife dies before I do, in that event I give, devise, and bequeath one-half of the whole of my property to Lott D. Norton, Charles T. Norton, and Russell Day, Jr., or, in the case of the death of either of them, to their heirs by right of representation." These were the only provisions of the will disposing of his estate.

The testator's wife died before he did, the effect of which was to vest in him the entire community property, only one half of which was disposed of under his will; as to the other half he died intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law to succeed to the same, among others, the appellants George W. Traver, a brother, and Mary E. Burk, the daughter of a deceased sister.

The will was duly admitted to probate, the estate consisting solely of real property. In due course of administration a petition for distribution came on for hearing, and the court determined thereon that the testator had made testamentary disposition of but one half of his estate, and that as to the other half he had died intestate. It accordingly distributed one half thereof to the respondents as devisees under the will, and the other half to the appellants and others, as his heirs, according to the law of succession; but further decreed that all the debts of deceased, and the expenses of administration of the estate, should be borne by, charged to, and paid by that portion of the estate which the testator had not disposed of by his will, and which had descended to these appellants and others, as his heirs at law, thus exempting the portion of the estate devised by the will to the respondents from the payment of any of these charges.

It is from this latter portion of the decree that this appeal is taken by some of the heirs at law, and the correctness of the decree of the court charging the undevised portion of the estate with the payment of the debts and expenses of administration is the only question presented for determination, and must be solved by an examination of the provisions of our Codes upon the subject.

While our attention is directed to sections 1562 and 1643 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to section 1359 of the Civil Code, as bearing upon the question, we are of the opinion that the matter is settled by the provisions of section 1562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, considered in connection with section 1560 of the same Code. The other sections referred to—while applicable to some extent—are not directly to the point, and are discussed by counsel upon both sides more particularly upon the question whether expenses of administration are to be treated as included within the debts of the estate referred to in these sections.

But, under the construction which we think must be given to sections 1560 and 1562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, cited above—particularly the latter—we do not think it of any moment to a determination of the main point in controversy on this appeal to discuss that question, or to consider the other sections at all.

It is provided by section 1560, above referred to, that if the testator makes provision by his will or designates the estate to be appropriated for the payment of his debts, expenses of administration, or family expenses, they must be paid according to that provision, or out of the appropriated estate as far as the same is sufficient. Section 1562 provides that: "If the provision made by the will, or the estate appropriated therefor, is insufficient to pay the debts, expenses of administration, and family expenses, that portion of the estate not devised or disposed of by the will, if any, must be appropriated and disposed of for that purpose, according to the provisions of this chapter."

The testator, Traver, made no provision by his will for the payment of the debts or expenses of administration, nor did he designate or appropriate any portion of his estate for that purpose. The will in no manner referred to any of these matters. It was entirely silent upon the subject. Now, as we construe the sections just referred to, according to the first, permission is granted to the testator to himself declare by his will what portion of the estate should be used for the payment of the enumerated charges, and the property so designated shall be devoted to that purpose. By the second, if insufficient appropriation is made, the law makes the selection, and the undevised portion of the estate must be appropriated or disposed of for that purpose. Both sections deal with the same subject-matter, namely, the payment of debts, expenses of administration, and family expenses, and, in declaring what portion of the estate shall be used for that purpose, contemplate the existence of either of two general conditions—an ample appropriation for that purpose by the testator, or insufficient appropriation. And while it is true that section 1562 speaks of an "insufficient" appropriation, we do not think that the section should be construed so as to hold that it could only apply in cases where the testator had actually made some, but still an inadequate, appropriation of property from which to make payment. This, in our judgment, would be placing too narrow and restricted an interpretation upon the section, and one not in harmony with the apparent purpose of its enactment. The main purpose of this section apparently is to fix the class of property which shall be disposed of to meet payment, from whatever cause the necessity for its disposition arises, whether from inadequate appropriation for that purpose, or on account of an entire failure of appropriation.

Section 1560 was intended to apply where ample and sufficient appropriation had been made in the will, and, in our opinion, section 1562 was intended to apply in all other cases, no matter from what the insufficiency sprung—whether because the appropriation was too small, or because there was none made.

The fair meaning of the language of the section that, "If the * * * estate appropriated therefor is insufficient to pay its debts, expenses of administration," etc., resort shall be had to that portion of the estate undisposed of for their payment, is that where no estate is appropriated by will, or that which is appropriated is inadequate, such resort shall be had. Where a will fails to make any appropriation to pay the debts and charges against the estate, there is clearly an insufficient appropriation for that purpose. The absence of all appropriation is certainly an insufficient one.

We are of the opinion that the court properly charged the debts and expenses of administration against the property undisposed of by the will, and which descended and was distributed to the appellants as heirs at law of the testator, and the decree appealed from is thereby affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; McFARLAND, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

CITY OF OAKLAND v. SNOW et al. (S. F. 2,955.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — OFFICERS — OFFICIAL BOND—DEFALCATION—ACTION—CHARTER —CONSTRUCTION — TRIAL — FINDINGS — EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—SUFFICIENCY.

1. The charter of the city of Oakland (St. 1889, p. 533) § 42, provides that all fees and other moneys collected by any officer of the city, except the city engineer, shall be paid into the city treasury. Section 44 (page 533) provides that the compensation of the auditor and assessor shall be $3,000 per annum. Section 195 (page 569) provides that no officer shall receive any salary or compensation for any service unless specially authorized by law or by the charter. Section 137 of article 8 (page 558) provides that the general laws concerning the levy and collection of taxes for state and county purposes shall govern in levying and collecting city taxes, and that the officers of the city shall have the same "powers and duties" as county officers, but makes no reference to compensation. Held, that a contention that an incumbent of the office of auditor and assessor is entitled to compensation above the salary of $3,000 per annum as assessor, because of the powers and duties conferred on him by section 137, is untenable, especially as the provision of law relating to the collection of taxes and the compensation of assessors is applicable only to certain counties, under Const. art. 11, § 5, requiring the compensation of county officers to be paid in proportion to duties.

2. Under the charter of the city of Oakland (St. 1889, p. 514), there is no enumeration of the several offices of the city, but article 2, headed "Elections," enumerates the officers to be elected, among which is "an auditor, who shall be ex officio assessor." In the article on the "Executive Department," section 40 (page 531) is entitled "Auditor and Assessor," and declares that the auditor shall be ex officio assessor, and then prescribes his duties as assessor and as auditor. Section 44 (page 533), entitled "Salaries of Officers," declares that the compensation of the auditor and assessor shall be $3,000 per annum. In an action against the official and surety on his bond for an alleged defalcation as city assessor, it appeared that he had been duly elected "auditor and ex officio assessor"; that he filed an oath of office, and acted as auditor and ex officio assessor for two years; that the city council fixed his bond at $10,000; that thereafter the bond in suit was executed, reciting his election to that office, and binding the obligors for the faithful performance of the duties thereof. Held, that a contention that the bond is void because, under the charter, there is no office of auditor and ex officio assessor, is untenable.

3. The office of assessor is a distinct office from that of auditor, but the duties are required to be discharged by the same person; and hence a contention in an action on the bond of an incumbent of the office of auditor and ex officio assessor that the offices are distinct, and that, though the bond be a valid obligation as to the office of auditor, it did not cover the duties of assessor, and that, as the complaint charged only a violation of duty as assessor, there can be no recovery, is without merit.

4. A finding in an action against the official and the surety on his bond for a defalcation as assessor that the official collected money "as assessor," or "as ex officio assessor," is of the same legal import; and the finding that he "failed to perform the official duties of such office of ex officio assessor" is equivalent, under the charter (St. 1889, pp. 531, 533, 534) §§ 40, 44, 45, to a finding that he failed to perform that portion of the duties of the office to which he was elected, and for which the bond was given.

5. Whether in such action the official was entitled to compensation under the charter (St. 1889, pp. 531, 533, 534, 558, 569) §§ 40, 42, 44, 45, 137, 195, for his services in the collection of taxes, is a question of law; and hence an allegation in the answer that the incumbent retained the moneys sued for, because of his right to such compensation, did not make an issue of fact requiring a special finding.

6. The declaration of the auditor and assessor prior to his election that he intended to claim commissions on the sums collected as assessor did not confer on him a right to the commissions.

7. The fact that he previously retained commissions on sums collected as assessor did not confer on him a right to the commissions, as against the provisions of the charter.

8. The fact that some of the city officials had approved of his act, or consented thereto, gave him no such right.

9. Nor the fact that it was a matter of common notoriety.

10. In an action against a city auditor and ex officio assessor on his bond, where the amount which he collected was shown, and the amount which he paid into the treasury during the term of his office was also shown, and there was neither allegation in the answer, nor proof on the part of defendants, that any further amount had been paid, a finding that the excess of the amount paid in by the official had been appropriated to his own use was sustained by the evidence.

11. Where the official, in an action on his bond, answered, admitting that he and the surety executed the bond in suit, and the surety, in its answer, admitted that the official, as principal, and it, as surety, made and signed a certain bond, and that the official took the bond away—not, however, setting forth the character of the bond—but, on the ground that it had no information or belief on the subject, denied that the bond relied on in the complaint correctly set forth the bond signed by it and the official, without alleging wherein it was incorrect, the answers were equivalent to an admission of the execution of the bond in all respects according with the one counted on by plaintiff, except the omission or misspelling of some immaterial word.

12. In an action on an official bond of a municipal officer, the inability of the plaintiff to produce the bond at the trial and its loss were shown. The official testified that he signed an official bond for the period in question, with the other defendant as surety. A witness, who was mayor, testified that the official gave him the bond, and that witness gave it to the city clerk, by whom it was copied into the register of official bonds. The copy was introduced in evidence. Held sufficient, together with the presumption that official duty has been regularly performed, to show a delivery of the bond to the city by the official.

13. The bond of an officer of a municipal corporation is a valid obligation, as against the official and his surety, without any approval by the mayor or city attorney.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; S. P. Hall, Judge.

Action by the city of Oakland against Roland W. Snow and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Coogan and C. H. Wilson, for appellants. James A. Johnson, City Atty., and Seymour W. Conlan, Asst. City Atty., for respondent.

HARRISON, C. The plaintiff seeks by this action to recover from the defendants, upon a bond executed by them for the faithful performance by the defendant Snow of his official duties, the sum of $1,868.32, alleged to have been received by him in his official capacity during his term of office and appropriated to his own use. Snow held the office of "auditor and assessor" of the plaintiff for two years, during the time for which the bond was given, and the moneys which the plaintiff seeks to recover are a portion of the taxes upon personal property collected by him by virtue of his office. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed therefrom, and also from an order denying a new trial.

The collection of the moneys by Snow is not controverted, but the appellants claim that he has the right to retain the amount sued for, as the commission allowed by law for their collection. On the other hand, the plaintiff insists that it was his duty to pay them into the treasury immediately upon their collection. The correctness of the judgment depends upon the construction to be given to various provisions of the charter of the city of Oakland (St. 1889, p. 514).

1. Section 44 of the charter (page 533) provides: "The compensation of officers and employees of the city shall be per annum as follows: * * * Auditor and assessor three thousand dollars." And section 195 of the charter (page 569) declares: "No office shall be created nor shall any person be employed in any capacity, nor shall any officer, clerk or employee receive any salary or compensation for any service of any kind unless the same is specially authorized by law or by this charter." Section 42 (page 533) declares: "All fees and other moneys received or collected by any officer, agent or employee of the city (excepting only such fees as the city engineer may be authorized by ordinance to collect) shall be paid by such officer, agent or employee each month, or as much oftener as the council may require, into the city treasury for the use of the city." Under these provisions, it is very clear that unless there is some law or some provision in the charter by which the defendant Snow is specially authorized to receive some compensation for his official services as such officer, other than the salary above provided, he was not authorized to retain any moneys collected or received by him, but was required to pay them into the city treasury. The provision that "all moneys collected by any officer of the city shall be paid by such officer into the city treasury for the use of the city" is as comprehensive and as exclusive of any right to retain any portion of such moneys as is the provision of the charter of San Francisco, considered in Dodge v. City and County of San Francisco, 135 Cal. 512, 67 Pac. 973.

The appellants, however, contend that, in addition to his salary, he is entitled, under the provision of section 137 of the charter (page 558) to compensation for his services in collecting taxes upon personal property at the rate of 6 per cent. upon the amount so collected. That section is as follows: "Except as in this article otherwise provided, the assessment of property taxable in the city for municipal purposes, the equalization of assessments and collection of taxes, and the sale of property for unpaid taxes, and the redemption of property sold for taxes, shall be made and had at the same time and manner, and with like effect as now or may be hereafter provided by law for the assessment of property, equalization of assessments, levy and collection of taxes, and sale of property for unpaid taxes for state and county purposes and redemption thereof; and all provisions of law applicable to such assessment, equalization, levy, collection and sale for state and county purposes are hereby applied to and shall be the law governing such assessment, equalization, levy, collection and sale for municipal purposes; and the respective officers of the city shall have, possess, and perform the same powers and duties in all matters concerning revenue and taxation for municipal purposes as are by law conferred or imposed upon county officers in matters concerning revenue and taxation for state and county purposes; and to that end: First. All powers and duties so by law conferred or imposed upon the county assessor, are hereby conferred and imposed upon the city assessor. * * * Sixth. All powers and duties so conferred or imposed upon the county clerk or county auditor are hereby conferred and imposed upon the city clerk and city auditor."

By this section the framers of the charter, instead of setting forth in detail the several steps to be taken for raising revenue for the city, adopted certain provisions of the general laws of the state upon the same subject. They have provided that the provisions of the general laws which may from time to time be prescribed for taking certain proceedings in levying and collecting taxes for state and county purposes shall be the law governing such proceedings in levying and collecting taxes for municipal purposes, and that the said proceedings in reference to municipal taxes shall be taken "at the same time and manner and with like effect" as may be prescribed by law for such proceedings in reference to state and county taxes, and that in taking these proceedings the officers of the city shall have the same "powers and duties" as are by law given to county officers in matters concerning taxation for state and county purposes.

The incorporation into a statute of the terms of a prior statute merely by reference thereto is governed by the same principles in interpretation as govern the interpretation of statutes, the primary object in all cases being to ascertain and carry out the intention of the Legislature. Mr. Endlich says (Interpretation of Statutes, § 73), "The words of a statute are to be understood in the sense in which they best harmonize with the subject of the enactment and the object which the Legislature has in view;" and again, in section 101, states as the rule, "An act adopting another by reference does not adopt it beyond the purposes of the new act." Mr. Sutherland (Statutory Construction, § 241) says, "The application of particular provisions is not to be extended beyond the general scope of the statute unless such extension is manifestly designed;" and in section 257 says, "By the adoption of another statute, only such portion is in force as relates to the particular subject of the adopting act." The rule was stated by Ashurst, J., in Rex v. Justices of Surrey, 2 T. R. 510, to be that "all the general powers and provisions given and made in acts in pari materia are to be considered as incorporated into the new statute, but that such provisions as are always considered as special provisions shall not." And in Williams v. Ellis, 6 Q. B. Div. 176, it is said, "Where the words employed by the Legislature do not directly apply to the particular case, we must consider the object of the act." See, also, Queen v. Badcock, 6 Q. B. 787; Jones v. Dexter, 8 Fla. 276; Matthews v. Sands, 29 Ala. 136; Succession of D'Aquin, 9 La. Ann. 400.

There is nothing in section 137 aforesaid by which any officer of the city is "specially authorized" to receive compensation for his services, nor does the section make any reference to the compensation of officers. Article 8 of the charter, in which this section is contained, is headed "Revenue and Taxation," and the manifest purpose of the framers of the charter in inserting this section therein was to provide a mode for raising revenue for the city from taxes upon property. The purpose of giving to the proceedings in reference to municipal taxes "like effect" to that given in the same proceeding in reference to state and county taxes, and the clothing of municipal officers with the same "powers and duties" in reference thereto as are given to county officers, is that by these proceedings a valid lien or charge for the tax may be imposed upon the property assessed, and that the officers may have ample authority for enforcing the collection of the tax. It would be an unwarranted as well as an unnatural construction to hold that by the use of these terms the framers of the charter intended to make any provision for the compensation of the officers.

Neither can the clause in the section declaring that all the provisions of law applicable to the collection of taxes for state and county purposes shall be the law governing such collection for municipal purposes be construed as authorizing the municipal officers to receive compensation for their services in reference thereto. There can be no presumption that it was intended to incorporate into the charter the provisions of law upon any subject other than those which are therein enumerated. By designating certain proceedings connected with taxation, in reference to which it has adopted the provisions of the general law applicable thereto, there is necessarily excluded from such adoption any provision applicable to proceedings not designated; and it is not to be held that by specifying the "collection" of taxes it has also adopted a provision of law for the compensation of officers for their collection, even though such provision for compensation is found in the same statute with the law for the collection of taxes. There is no necessary connection between the collection of taxes and the compensation of officers for their collection, nor do the provisions of law "applicable" to their collection presumptively include a provision for such compensation. These provisions for the collection of taxes are directed to the relation between the officer and the taxpayer, and create the "power and duty" of the officer in reference to the collection of the tax.

The provisions of law applicable to the levying and collection of taxes are found in the Political Code, but the provisions for the compensation of officers are not contained in that Code. Section 3829 of this Code, under which the appellants claim the right to compensation, does not itself fix the compensation, but refers to the county government act for the purpose of ascertaining whether any compensation for such services shall be received. This section is not to be held as containing any provision of law applicable to the "collection" of taxes merely because it is found in a chapter relating to that subject, but its character is to be determined by the purpose which is expressed in it, and that purpose is limited to the compensation for the collection of taxes which is contained in the county government act. By reference to section 215 of the county government act (St. 1897, p. 572, c. 277), it is seen that in a majority of the counties of the state compensation is allowed, but that in some counties the assessor is not entitled to any compensation for this service.

It cannot, therefore, be held that any portion of this section of the county government act was incorporated into the charter of Oakland by reason of the terms of the above section 137. Not only is there not in it any general provision of law applicable to the collection of taxes, but the provision therein for compensation upon which the applicants rely is not operative throughout the state, but is a special provision fixing the compensation of the assessor in certain counties. It was enacted by the Legislature in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution (article 11, § 5) requiring the compensation of county officers to be regulated "in proportion to duties," and, as it cannot be determined that the provision for those counties in which compensation is allowed is more entitled to consideration than the provision for those in which it is denied, it cannot be held that any portion of the section is available to the appellants.

2. It appears from the record herein that at the city election in 1897 the appellant Snow received a majority of the votes cast "for auditor and ex officio assessor," and was declared elected to that office, and that a certificate declaring that he was duly elected auditor and ex officio assessor of the city of Oakland was issued to him by the city clerk; that he thereafter took and filed an oath that he would faithfully discharge the duties of auditor and ex officio assessor of the city of Oakland to the best of his ability, and that he acted as auditor and ex officio assessor of the city of Oakland from April 5, 1897, to April 1, 1899; that the common council of the city fixed the bond to be given by the "auditor and ex officio assessor" at $10,000; that thereafter, and before entering upon the duties of the office, he executed to the city of Oakland a bond, with the other appellant herein as surety, in which, after reciting that the appellant Snow was on the 8th day of March, 1897, elected to the office of auditor and ex officio assessor in and for the city of Oakland, they bound themselves in the penal sum of $10,000 that he would well and faithfully perform all official duties required of him by law, and would well and faithfully execute and perform all the duties of such office of auditor and ex officio assessor required by any law to be enacted subsequent to the execution of the bond.

It is contended by the appellants that under the charter of Oakland there is no office of "auditor and ex officio assessor," and for that reason the bond sued upon is void; and they have cited certain cases in support thereof which arose where the appointment of the officer was made without any authority therefor, or where the office itself had never been authorized by law. It may be conceded that a bond given for the faithful performance of the duties of an office that has no existence would not create any obligation. If there is no office, there can be no official duty to perform, and no violation of official duty. The cases cited by the appellant upon this point are therefore inapplicable to a case where the bond sued upon has been given for the faithful performance of the duties of a legally existing office by one who has been properly appointed or elected thereto.

It is further contended by the appellants that under the charter of Oakland the offices of auditor and assessor are distinct; that, if it be assumed that the bond in question is a valid obligation for the faithful performance by Snow of his duties as auditor, it does not cover his duties as assessor; and that, as the complaint charges only a violation of his duty as assessor, there can be no recovery upon the bond. The cases cited by the appellants in support of this proposition arose where there were two legally existing and separate offices held by the same individual, and it was held that, in the absence of a statute making his bond given for one office cover his duties and liabilities in both, his bond would cover only his defalcations in the office for which it was specifically given. In the revenue act of 1854 (St. 1854, p. 108, c. 63) the Legislature provided that in the several counties of the state the sheriff should be the tax collector; and it was held in People v. Edwards, 9 Cal. 286, that, inasmuch as the Constitution required a tax collector and sheriff to be elected in each county, it had thereby created the two offices, and, although the Legislature might provide that the same person should perform the duties of each office, it could not abolish either of the offices, and that the two offices were not by such provision blended into one. See Lathrop v. Brittain, 30 Cal. 684. It was under this provision of the Constitution that it was held in People v. Ross, 38 Cal. 76, that the bond given by the defendant as surety did not cover his defalcation as tax collector. In the county government act (St. 1883, p. 315, c. 75, § 57) the Legislature specifically named the auditor and assessor as distinct officers of the county, but authorized the board of supervisors of any county to elect to consolidate the duties of the two offices. Section 59, however, provides that when they are so consolidated the person elected must give the bond required for each office.

There is no enumeration in the charter of Oakland of the several offices of the city, but article 2, headed "Elections," which enumerates the officers to be elected, provides, "At each general election there shall be elected: * * * An auditor who shall be ex officio assessor." In the article upon the "Executive Department," section 40 is entitled "Auditor and Assessor," and declares, "The auditor shall be ex officio assessor," and then prescribes the duties required of him "as assessor," and his duties "as auditor." Section 44, entitled "Salaries of Officers," declares: "The compensation of officers and employees of the city shall be per annum: * * * The auditor and assessor three thousand dollars." Section 45, entitled "Official Bonds," declares: "Every officer provided for by law shall, before entering upon the duties of his office, file an official bond in such sum as the council may direct." Under these provisions, it must be held that the charter of Oakland has not created the office of assessor as a distinct office from that of auditor, but that, by requiring the duties of such functionaries to be discharged by the same person, it has created a single office for the purpose of discharging those functions, which is styled in the charter "auditor and assessor"; that, as there is no office of assessor distinct from the office of auditor, Snow was not required to give a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties as auditor, and another and separate bond for his duties as assessor, but that the bond set forth in the complaint was sufficient, and applies to all of the duties required of him by virtue of his official position, and covers his defalcations in the moneys collected by him as charged in the complaint and found by the court. See People v. Leet, 13 Ill. 269.

The designation of Snow in the instrument as "auditor and ex officio assessor," instead of "auditor and assessor," is a trivial and harmless misdescription, which does not affect the validity of the obligation. The charter itself declares that the auditor shall be ex officio assessor, and whether he styles himself "auditor and assessor," or "auditor and ex officio assessor," is immaterial. He is none the less assessor because he is only ex officio assessor, and being styled in the instrument "auditor and ex officio assessor" is the same in legal effect as if styled "auditor and assessor." The bond that is given is the obligation of the individual whose duty it is to perform the duties of the office in his official capacity. The moneys collected by Snow were received by him by virtue of the official position to which he had been elected, and they are public moneys belonging to the city. In so holding, there is no infringement of the rule that a surety is entitled to stand upon the strict letter of his bond. The provision of the charter defining the duties of the officer are read into the bond, and are to be construed in connection with it. The obligation of the surety is not extended beyond the fair import of the terms which it has employed in the instrument, but the meaning of those terms is to be construed in accordance with recognized rules for the interpretation of contracts. See People v. Breyfogle, 17 Cal. 504.

Upon the same consideration, the objection of the appellants that the findings do not support the judgment must be overruled. Findings, as has been often decided, are not to be subjected to the test of a special demurrer, but any ambiguity or uncertainty in them is to receive such construction as will sustain, rather than defeat, the judgment rendered thereon. The office of "auditor and assessor," which was held by Snow, required of him the faithful performance of all the duties which the charter required of the incumbent of that office, irrespective of the particular designation of such duties, or the capacity in which he was required to perform them; and the bond which was given by him extended to all of the duties required of him by virtue of his official position, whether these duties are required of him "as auditor" or "as assessor." The finding of the court that he collected the money "as assessor," or "as ex officio assessor," is of the same legal import; and the finding that he "failed to perform the official duties of such office of ex officio assessor" is equivalent to a finding that he failed to perform that portion of the duties of the office to which he was elected, and for which the bond was given. Whether Snow was entitled to compensation for his services in the collection of taxes is a question of law, and the allegation in the answer of the defendants that he retained the moneys sued for by reason of such right did not make an issue of fact which required a special finding, but is the question to be determined upon a consideration of the entire case.

3. There was no error in excluding the evidence offered on behalf of the defendants for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff had consented that Snow might have the compensation claimed by him. It was not competent for the city to consent to a violation of its charter, nor could the acquiescence of its officers confer upon Snow a right to compensation which the charter forbids him to receive. His declaration prior to his election that he intended to claim the commission, or the fact that he previously retained like commissions, or that some of the city officials had approved of his act or consented thereto, or that it was a matter of public notoriety, did not, as against the provisions of the charter, confer upon him a right to the commissions. The plaintiff could not be estopped from claiming the money collected by him by reason of an erroneous interpretation of the provisions of the charter by its officials. The objection in the brief of the appellants to the action of the court in striking out the portion of the answer of Snow relative to this issue evidently results from an inadvertence of the record. Although the court did at an early stage of the case, upon motion of the plaintiff, strike this clause out, it afterwards, before the trial of the cause, vacated this order.

4. The finding that Snow had failed to pay into the treasury the amount for which the judgment was given is sustained by the evidence. The amount which he collected was shown, and the amount which he paid into the treasury during the term of his office was also shown. There was no allegation on the part of the defendants, or evidence in their behalf, that any further amount had been paid. The fact that he collected this amount of money in excess of the amount paid in by him sustained the finding that he appropriated it to his own use. The finding that the bond was executed and delivered to the plaintiff was fully sustained by the evidence and the admission in the pleadings. Snow, in his answer, admits that he and the surety company executed it; and the surety company, in its answer, admits that Snow, as principal, and it, as surety, made and signed a certain bond, and that Snow took the bond away. It does not set forth the character or form of this bond, but, upon the ground that it has no information or belief upon the subject, denies that the bond set forth in the complaint correctly sets forth the bond signed by it and Snow, but does not allege wherein it is incorrect. Its averment in this respect is equivalent to an admission of the execution of a bond in all respects according with that set forth in the complaint, except the omission or misspelling of some immaterial word. Upon the same grounds it denies the delivery of the bond to the city by Snow. The inability of the plaintiff to produce the bond at the trial and its loss were clearly shown. Snow testified that he signed an official bond for that year, with the other defendant as surety. Mr. Thomas, who was mayor, testified that Snow gave him the bond in question, and that he gave it to the city clerk, by whom it was copied into the register of official bonds. This copy was introduced in evidence. To this testimony must be added the presumption that official duty has been regularly performed. The bond was a valid obligation of the defendants without any approval by the mayor or city attorney.

We advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

PARKE & LACY CO. v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO. (S. F. 3,090.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 5, 1904.)

CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION—PAST SERVICES—EVIDENCE—PLEADING.

1. Where, in an action on a contract for commission for services rendered in procuring a government contract, the case was tried as if the fact of the continued efforts of plaintiff as required by the contract was at issue, defendant could not on appeal raise the question of the insufficiency of the complaint in averring that plaintiff complied with its agreement to continue in its efforts to secure the contract.

2. Where, in an action on a contract for services rendered in procuring government work, defendant introduced evidence that plaintiff had done nothing under the contract, it was not error to admit letters written by plaintiff after the making of the contract, not as evidence of the truth of their contents, but as evidence of acts tending to rebut defendant's evidence.

3. Where, in an action on a contract for services rendered in procuring government work, a witness testified that plaintiff had not paid or given anything to defendant either before or at the time of the contract, and there was no pretense by plaintiff that there was any consideration for the contract other than its services in procuring the government work, it was not error to sustain an objection to a question asked the witness as to whether defendant received any consideration for the contract.

4. Where one rendered services in procuring for a contractor government work, without expectation of receiving any compensation therefor unless the work was procured, a contract thereafter made, which provided for payment on the work being procured, was a contract which merely put into a written form what was agreed on as to the future contingent compensation, and was not open to the objection that the past services furnished no consideration for the promise to pay in the future therefor.

R. Percy Wright, for appellant. H. A. Powell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action to recover of defendant $1,750, alleged to be the balance due of a commission of 5 per cent. on $70,000, arising out of the written contract between plaintiff and defendant set out in the complaint. Judgment went for plaintiff as prayed for, and, from the judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals. Each party is a corporation.

The written contract above mentioned was executed on the 24th day of April, 1896. It recites that plaintiff, "party of the first part," through its agents, Richardson & Kelton, in Guatemala, has been acting as agent for the defendant, "party of the second part," to secure to the latter a contract with the government of Guatemala for furnishing a hydraulic dredge, and also a contract for the dredging in whole or in part of the harbor of Istapa for said government, and that said contracts are likely to be awarded to the party of the second part. The contract then proceeds as follows: "Now therefore: In consideration of the services already rendered by the party of the first part, and such further services as it may render in the matter, and for other good and valuable consideration, the party of the second part hereby agrees that in the event that the said contracts, or either of them, are awarded to the party of the second part, either direct or through any other person or contractor, it, the said party of the second part, will pay unto the party of the first part a sum equal to five (5) per centum of the total gross moneys received by the party of the second part on account of said contract or contracts. Said payments to be made to the party of the first part as payments are made to the party of the second part, and are to be in full compensation to the party of the first part for its time, trouble and expense in respect to the said contracts. The party of the first part agrees to continue in its efforts to secure the said contracts for the party of the second part, and to do everything in its power towards this end." It is then averred in the complaint that the said contracts were awarded to defendant by the government of Guatemala on or about the 29th day of July, 1896; that defendant had received on said contracts the sum of $70,000, and had paid one-half of the said 5 per cent. thereon, to wit, $1,750, and no more, and has refused to pay any of the balance thereon; and judgment is prayed for the $1,750 remaining unpaid. The court found these averments to be true, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the balance of $1,750, and the evidence amply supports the findings.

*Rehearing denied January 4, 1905.

The answer contains an averment that the agreement of plaintiff was to influence the officers of the government of Guatemala corruptly, or in some improper way, and it seems to be contended by appellants that on account of this contemplated improper influencing of said officers the contract was void as being against public policy; but the court found that this averment was not true, and the finding is fully justified by the evidence.

Appellant contends for a reversal of the judgment upon the ground of the insufficiency of the complaint, because, as is claimed, there is no averment that after the execution of the written contract on June 24, 1896, respondent complied with its agreement to "continue in its efforts to secure the said contract." It is doubtful if such an averment was necessary, considering the fact that, after what respondent had already done, it was to receive the 5 per cent. if the contract should be secured "either direct or through any other person or contractor." But, at all events, the case was tried as if the fact of the continued efforts of respondent was at issue, and appellant introduced a considerable amount of evidence tending to show that respondent had not done anything of value toward securing the contracts from the government of Guatemala after the date of the contract between appellant and respondent of April 24th. There was no demurrer to the complaint. There was an objection made by appellant to a letter offered in evidence by respondent, because it was dated after April 24, 1896; but that was in rebuttal, and after the appellant itself had introduced evidence tending to show that respondent had done nothing after that date. We think that as to this point the case is within the rule, cited in numerous decisions, that when a case has been tried on the theory that a certain issue was before the court, the point that the issue had not been properly presented in the pleadings will not be heard on appeal.

There was no error in admitting certain correspondence between respondent, who resided in San Francisco, and its agents, Richardson & Kelton, at Guatemala. Appellant had introduced evidence to the point that respondent had done nothing in the matter of procuring contracts from Guatemala, and the ruling of the court was that the letters were admissible, not as evidence of the truth of their contents, but merely as acts tending to refute the evidence of appellant that respondent had done nothing about the matter of procuring the contracts. Moreover, these letters were shown to appellant, and answers from respondent to its agents at Guatemala were in great part dictated by appellant. This correspondence, both before and after the 24th day of April, was admissible; for in the answer it was denied that there was any consideration whatever for the contract, and appellant's evidence had been to the point that respondent had not done anything in the premises either before or after the date of the contract. For the same reason it was not error to admit testimony that other letters were written pertaining to the dredging contract, although the letters themselves were not formally introduced. They were in court, subject to appellant's inspection.

There was no prejudicial error in sustaining respondent's objection to the general question, asked by appellant of a witness, whether the appellant ever received "any consideration for the agreement of April 24, 1896." The witness had already testified that the respondent had not paid or given appellant anything either before or at the time of said agreement, and there was no pretense by respondent that there was any consideration for the contract other than its alleged services in procuring the dredging contracts from Guatemala. Therefore the only question before the court touching the consideration was as to respondent's said services, and each party had full opportunity to present its evidence on that issue, and the appellant could not have been prejudiced by the ruling.

Appellant contends that, even if respondent rendered any services before the execution of the written contract of April 24th, they were past services, and did not furnish any consideration for appellant's promise to pay in the future 5 per cent. of the moneys which should be received from Guatemala; but we do not think that this contention is maintainable. It goes upon the theory that a past executed consideration will not support any promise different from that which the law implies—which is a promise to pay in præsenti, on request—and that an executed consideration will not support a promise to pay in future. Whatever may be said of this rather abstruse doctrine, it is not applicable to the case at bar. Here, as appears from the testimony, it was not expected that the respondent was to receive any compensation unless the dredging contracts were secured; and by the contract of April 24th the parties merely put into a permanent written form what they then finally agreed upon as to the future contingent compensation.

There are no other points calling for special notice, and we see no reason for reversing the judgment or the order denying a new trial.

In re BLAKE'S ESTATE. BROWN v. BROWN et al. (L. A. 1,545.) (Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1904.) Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; J. W. Taggart, Judge. Judicial settlement of the estate of Anna S. C. Blake, deceased. From a judgment in favor of Allen A. Brown and others, Philip King Brown appeals. Affirmed. Richard C. Harrison, for appellant. Richards & Carrier, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The situation briefly is this: Both sides agree that whatever rights appellant has come from the decree of partial distribution. His title is absolutely fixed by that. The decree of final distribution does not purport, in terms, to affect this property and this right, but it merely makes provision for whatever undiscovered property in the estate there may be. If, by any chance, any part of this Miradero estate should ever fall into the residue of the estate, the decree of final distribution would operate upon that. If not, it would not operate. That is a matter for future consideration, and is to be governed wholly and entirely by the terms and language of the decree of partial distribution under which this appellant takes. Therefore the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

DE LEONIS v. WALSH. (L. A. 1,504.) (Supreme Court of California. July 18, 1904.) In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Waldo M. York, Judge. Action by M. E. C. De Leonis against E. E. Walsh. Order of submission on points and authorities entered nunc pro tunc. For opinion in department, see 73 Pac. 813. Dunnigan & Dunnigan, for appellant. H. H. Appel and Horace Bell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following order having been made on June 6, 1904, and not having been entered, it is ordered that the same be now done nunc pro tunc as of date of June 6, 1904: "The appellant moves to submit the case upon his points and authorities, upon the ground that the respondent had failed to file points and authorities within the time allowed therefor under rule 5 [64 Pac. viii]; and upon the said motion it is ordered that the said cause be entered upon the submission calendar provided for in rule 3 [64 Pac. viii]."

PEOPLE v. MASON. (L. A. 1,451.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1904.) Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; E. S. Torrance, Judge. Proceeding by the people against Alfred D. Mason. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed. F. D. Brandon and Edwin A. Wells, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Geo. A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Cassius Carter, Dist. Atty, for the People.

PER CURIAM. This case is in principle similar to that of People v. Norris (L. A. 1,336, just decided) 77 Pac. 998; and, on the authority of that case, the judgment is affirmed.

POTTER v. STATE. (Sac. 1,194.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 19, 1904.) In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; G. W. Nicol, Judge. Action by Robert P. Potter against the state. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the state appeals. Affirmed. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State. J. B. Curtin, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought under the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 646, c. 214), entitled "An act authorizing suits against the state on claims or demands arising under an act entitled 'An act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps,' approved March 31, 1891 [St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198], and regulating the proceedings therein." Judgment went for the plaintiff in the court below, and the defendant appeals therefrom on the judgment roll alone. The action is the same in character as that of Bickerdike v. State (just decided, Sac. No. 1,237) 78 Pac. 270, and the complaint is substantially the same as in that case. The points presented on behalf of the appellant here were also urged in that case, and the opinion filed therein fully answers and disposes of appellant's contention in that case here. On the authority of Bickerdike v. State, the judgment herein is affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO LAW & COLLECTION CO. v. STATE. (Sac. 1,278.) (Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1904.) In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge. Action by the San Francisco Law & Collection Company against the state. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, the state appeals. Affirmed. See 74 Pac. 1047. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Geo. A. Sturtevant, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Devlin & Devlin, of counsel), for the State. T. Carl Spelling, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff obtained a judgment against the defendant in an action brought under the provisions of an act of the Legislature authorizing suits against the state on claims arising under "An act fixing a bounty on coyote scalps," approved March 31, 1891 (St. 1891, p. 280, c. 198). From that judgment, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. These appeals present no points which were not advanced and insisted on by appellant in an appeal theretofore taken in the same character of action entitled Bickerdicke v. State (Sac. No. 1,237, which has just been decided) 78 Pac. 270. The similar objections urged herein are there fully discussed and disposed of adversely to the appellant; and, on the authority of that decision, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte ZABALA et al. (Cr. 1,207.) (Supreme Court of California. Dec. 5, 1904.) In Bank. Application by P. E. Zabala and J. J. Wyatt for writ of habeas corpus to be directed against H. V. Trafton, sheriff of Santa Cruz county. Petitioners discharged. C. F. Lacey, for petitioners.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioners were in the custody of the sheriff under an order adjudging them guilty of a contempt of court. It is conceded that the return to the writ does not sustain the jurisdiction of the court to make the order. The petitioners are discharged from custody.

AMBROSE v. HYDE. (S. F. 3,045.)

ACTION FOR RENT—EVIDENCE—CONVERSATIONS.

1. In an action for rent plaintiff cannot recover, the evidence not showing an express contract to rent the premises for the period sued for, there being no evidence of the value of the use and occupation, and, if there was a tenancy by operation of law by reason of a holding over, there being no evidence of what was the rent under the previous lease.

2. In an action for rent, conversations between plaintiff and the person who had formerly rented the premises to defendant, and between them and third persons, relative to rental thereof, are not admissible against defendant, who was not present at such conversations, and knew nothing about them.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thomas F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Thomas Ambrose against F. A. Hyde. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Morgenthal, for appellant. Leon Samuels, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff sought in this action to recover the sum of $500, in which amount he alleged the defendant was indebted to him on October 1, 1899, for rent of certain grazing lands in Contra Costa county for the year commencing October 1, 1898. The answer of the defendant was a denial of all the allegations of the complaint. Judgment went for defendant, and from it and an order denying his motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

The court made a general finding in favor of defendant, which was, in effect, that he was not indebted to the plaintiff on October 1, 1899, or at any other time, in any sum whatever, and this finding is attacked as not sustained by the evidence. As far as this point relates to the testimony in the case bearing directly upon any negotiations for the rental of this property entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, but little discussion is necessary. The only evidence in the case bearing upon it was that of the parties to the action themselves. The plaintiff testified that the defendant, in his office in San Francisco, October 1, 1898, made a verbal agreement with him to rent the land for a year at a rental of $500. This defendant denied, claiming that he positively declined to rent for a year (he was then in possession of the property), but made overtures to plaintiff for a lease of three or five years, and, being unable to secure it, left the premises. In this conflicting condition of the evidence the lower court credited the testimony of the defendant, and, as so credited, it justified the finding of the court, and under the well-recognized rule the finding is conclusive upon us.

Appellant contends, however, that the evidence shows that the defendant became a tenant of the premises under him for the year alleged by operation of law, and hence that the finding is not sustained by the evidence, but is contrary to it. On this point the evidence shows that the premises alleged to have been leased were, at all the dates involved in this controversy, owned by one Dr. Posey, the plaintiff having a mortgage on them. In 1897, Dr. Posey being away, his wife leased the premises to some third parties for a term to end October 1, 1898, and from these parties the defendant sublet them for a few months towards the close of the term, and was in possession when negotiations were opened between plaintiff, who had authority from Dr. Posey to rent the place and apply the rents on his mortgage, and the defendant, relative to a further lease. Pending these negotiations the defendant remained in possession of the premises and occupied them for several months after the yearly lease under which he sublet had expired, and it is from this continued occupation that plaintiff insists that by the operation of law (section 1161, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.) the lease was renewed for a year upon the same terms as the lease for the previous year. This section creates a presumption of law merely, and it is always permissible for either of the parties to a lease to show circumstances tending to rebut the legal implication arising thereunder from continuous occupation of the premises after the expiration of the original term. To what extent, however, the negotiations between plaintiff and defendant in the present case, looking to a lease for several years instead of for one year, was effective to rebut this presumption, or whether the section has any application to the facts in the case at bar under respondent's contention that it has not, we are not called on to determine, because, assuming that the section does apply, still there is not a particle of evidence in the case to show what the terms of the previous lease were as to the amount of rental to be paid under it. All that appears is that Mrs. Posey made a lease for less than a year to certain parties from whom the defendant sublet, but what rent the original lessees agreed to pay, or the defendant under them, is nowhere mentioned in the record, nor from the evidence can any fair or reasonable inference be deduced upon the subject. There is nothing to show that the rental for the previous year was $500, or any other sum whatever. In fact, it is apparent from the record that the case was tried upon the theory that there was an express contract with the defendant to rent the premises for a year from October 1, 1898, for $500, and this was the point to which the evidence was mainly addressed. The matter of the previous lease arose incidentally in the case. Nothing was shown as to the amount of rent agreed to be paid under it, and hence the claim of a tenancy by operation of law for another year, and liability for the same rental sum as was provided to be paid in the former lease, is presented on this appeal without any evidence appearing in the record as to what the previous rental was, and the absence of this essential evidence is fatal to the claim.

Appellant insists that the evidence in the case shows that he was entitled to a judgment for at least some amount against the defendant. While it is not very clear upon what theory this claim is based, we will assume that it is asserted upon the ground that, as the defendant remained in possession for some months after the lease under which he had sublet had expired, he was, at least, liable for the value of the use and occupation of the premises for the period of time he remained on them subsequent to the expiration of that lease. The conclusive answer to this claim, on the merits, is that he offered no proof whatever on that subject. He now insists that a statement contained in a letter written by the defendant to him that he was ready to pay the rental for the time he used the place supports his contention. But the strongest effect that can be given to this statement is that it was a direct acknowledgment by the defendant of his liability for rental during that period; a liability which the law fixed upon him independent of his acknowledgment. There was no statement in the letter as to what that rental was, or rather as to what defendant considered was the value of the use and occupation of the premises during the term defendant occupied it. This was the essential matter to be proven, and plaintiff failed to make any proof of it. He not only did not attempt to offer any competent evidence upon the subject, but, when defendant sought to offer it strenuously and successfully objected to its being accepted.

Appellant presents several rulings of the court sustaining objections to questions asked of witnesses by him, and striking out testimony on motion of respondent, and assigns them as error. These rulings were so clearly right that it would serve no useful purpose to particularly refer to them. Mentioned generally, they applied to purported conversations and communications between Mrs. Posey and the appellant concerning the rental of the premises to the defendant, and Mrs. Posey's conversations with persons who applied to her to rent them. The testimony showed that the defendant was not present at any of these conversations, and was not advised of any of the communications, nor did he know anything about them. Under these circumstances the conversations and communications between plaintiff and Mrs. Posey were not admissible against defendant, and, as this was the ground upon which the testimony was stricken out, it was properly done. The conversations with third parties relating to rental by them of the ranch were not admissible for any purpose, and the objections to the questions which involved that matter were properly sustained. There are a few minor points in this same line which we do not think of any moment, and which we therefore do not discuss.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

HABEAS CORPUS—EXTRADITION—FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE—DECISION OF FEDERAL COURT.

1. On habeas to prevent extradition of one charged with an offense against the laws of another state, the regularity of the proceedings before the extradition are not reviewable.

2. The decision of the United States Supreme Court as to what constitutes a fugitive from justice, within Const. U. S., is binding on a state court.

In Bank. Application by George E. Letcher for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed against Garret Fox, fire marshal of the state of Ohio, and George W. Wittman, chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco, to prevent petitioner's extradition to the county of Williams, in said last-named state. Denied.

Samuel G. Tompkins, D. W. Burchard, and John B. Kerwin, for petitioner. C. G. Nagle and Nagle & Nagle, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The indictment charges a public offense within the statute of the state of Ohio. The regularity of the proceedings had before the extradition are not reviewable by us in this proceeding.

Upon the proposition as to whether or not the petitioner is a fugitive from justice, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, that question seems to be absolutely decided against petitioner's contention by the Supreme Court of the United States in Roberts v. Reilly, 116 U. S. 80, 6 Sup. Ct. 291, 29 L. Ed. 544, and the decision of that court upon this constitutional question is absolutely binding upon this tribunal. Whether or not the facts in the case of petitioner are such as to call for a modification of the views expressed in Roberts v. Reilly is a question which can only be decided by the federal courts whose writs and processes are open to petitioner.

The petitioner is remanded.

MARTIN v. BARRY. (S. F. 3,097.)

TROVER—CONVERSION—EVIDENCE.

1. Evidence in trover held insufficient to go to the jury on the question of conversion by defendant.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; E. D. Ham, Judge.

Lippitt & Lippitt, for appellant. J. P. Rodgers, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. The action was trover to recover the value of certain 30 tons of hay and also damages for pursuit of the property. At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for a nonsuit. His motion was granted, and judgment was entered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The grounds of the motion for nonsuit were: First, that there is no evidence connecting defendant in any way with the hay; second, that plaintiff offered in evidence certain proceedings in the justice's court of Petaluma township, Sonoma county, showing that defendant had obtained a judgment against the plaintiff for the whole of the hay involved, and plaintiff therefore has no interest in the hay.

John Zenoni, plaintiff's assignor, testified that he was in possession of a ranch, which he had leased for one year from defendant and her son, William Barry, dated September 29, 1896; that the rental was payable in cash, and was fully paid for the year; that he raised a crop of hay on the land, part of which he sold, and that on August 26, 1897, he had 25 bales remaining, on which day one Brush, constable of Petaluma township, served certain papers on him, and took all the hay and put it in the keeping of one Tom Barry, who was defendant's son; and that he (Zenoni) never got the hay back (nor did his assignee, as elsewhere appeared), but the hay was left on the ranch, and was there after the lease expired. Plaintiff next introduced in evidence certain papers in an action brought in the justice's court of Petaluma township, wherein Julia Barry, defendant herein, was plaintiff, and John Zenoni, assignor of plaintiff herein, was defendant. These papers were introduced presumably to show that Mrs. Barry took the hay from Zenoni, and by what means. The action was claim and delivery to recover possession of the same hay as is here in question. Plaintiff introduced the complaint, answer, and undertaking. No affidavit, as required by the statute, appeared among the papers, and none was introduced, nor was its absence explained. Plaintiff also introduced the summons in the action, which was returned duly served on August 26, 1897. Plaintiff next introduced what is entitled, "Transcript on Appeal Offered in Evidence," which apparently is followed by the entries in the justice's docket in Julia Barry v. John Zenoni. It shows: Complaint filed August 26, 1897. Undertaking on claim and delivery of personal property filed August 26, 1897. Summons and demand issued and handed to G. M. Brush, constable, August 26, 1897. Summons returned and filed August 27, 1897, "with the following indorsement," which shows personal service on defendant Zenoni by delivering a copy of the complaint attached to the summons. Answer filed August 31, 1897, and trial set for September 8, 1897, by agreement, on which day the cause was tried, and "after argument by respective parties the action was then submitted to the court, and after due consideration the court found judgment for plaintiff," and judgment was entered. "Done in open court this 18th day of September, 1897. N. King, Justice of the Peace." There is nothing in the justice's docket to show that the cause was in fact appealed. The caption, "Transcript on Appeal, Offered in Evidence," is not evidence that there was an appeal. George Brush, constable of Petaluma township, testified that he went to the Barry Ranch, and, being asked who sent him there, testified: "I got the papers at the justice's court. I do not know that anybody sent me out there, particularly." Being asked what papers he got at the justice's court, he replied: "Well, I got the summons and the writ of attachment." He was asked whether he meant "writ of attachment or claim and delivery," and replied: "When I first went out there, it was a writ of attachment." He made no further explanation, and his testimony remained in this condition. Being asked what he did after he got to the ranch, he replied: "I went out there and attached the hay, and I believe I attached some 200-odd bales. I put a keeper in, and I took the hay in my possession and put the keeper in. * * * I did not turn it over to anybody. I had no authority to do that. * * * I do not know what became of it." He testified that he saw it afterwards in November on the ranch when one of the Barrys was in possession of the ranch. He testified that he did not turn it over to defendant, Mrs. Barry. Mrs. Barry testified that the hay was put in her barn; that "the mice and rats eat it up. It got wasted away since that time. Q. Did you use any portion of it? A. No, sir; not a stalk. I have no stock, and never used a stalk of it." She testified that she and her two sons owned the place. "When the hay was first put in the barn, it was not baled. It was loose, and then he took it out and baled it. It was put back in the barn after it was baled because he was about to take it away. My sons put it back—Thomas and William." Asked who was on the ranch then, she replied: "I was not there at all." This is all the evidence in the case.

There is evidence that the hay belonged to plaintiff when taken by the constable, and, if the suit had been commenced against the officer, a different case would be presented. Construing the evidence strongly against defendant, on her motion for nonsuit, we yet cannot see that it connects her with the taking of the hay. The constable insisted that he took the hay under writ of attachment, and, if he was mistaken in this, the plaintiff failed to show it. No affidavit on claim and delivery was shown, on which the plaintiff or her attorney might have indorsed a direction to the constable to take the property. Code Civ. Proc. § 511. So far as we know from the transcript, there was no affidavit filed in the replevin case. The docket of the justice showed no affidavit. No inference can be drawn from Mrs. Barry's testimony that the constable took the hay by her direction, or that she personally had anything to do with it before, at the time of, or after the taking by the constable. As the evidence stood when the case was submitted by plaintiff, there was no cause of action proven against defendant.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

CONTRACTS — PERFORMANCE OF SERVICES—IMPLIED AGREEMENT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—TRIAL—FINDINGS.

1. In an action to recover for services rendered in effecting a settlement of certain actions then pending, evidence examined, and held to sustain a finding that defendants did not engage the services of plaintiff, nor employ him in said settlement, nor request him to perform the services.

2. In an action for services rendered, a finding that they were not rendered at the request of defendants negatives the fact of an implied request, as well as of an express request, and was sufficient, without finding the person to whom the services were rendered.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by George B. Merrill against Andrew J. Gunnison and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. B. Merrill, in pro. per. (John H. Miller, of counsel), for appellant. Orrin K. McMurray and Campbell, Metson & Campbell, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The action is to recover the value of services alleged to have been rendered by plaintiff for the defendants in effecting a settlement and compromise of certain actions then pending, in which one T. I. Bergin was plaintiff, and Florence B. Moore was defendant, and in which the defendants here were attorneys for the defendant Moore. The court found that the defendant did not engage the services of plaintiff, nor employ him, in said settlement and compromise, nor request him to perform the services. The appellant admits that there was evidence to sustain a finding that there was no express request by defendants to the plaintiff to perform the services, but he insists that the uncontradicted evidence establishes facts from which the law will imply both a request and a promise to pay. The facts from which it is claimed that this request must be implied are that plaintiff performed the services in question with the knowledge and assent of the defendants, that the services were beneficial to the defendants, that defendants have received the benefits, that the circumstances were such that the defendants had good reason to believe that plaintiff expected defendants to pay him for the services, and that they, without objection, permitted him to render the services, and did nothing to disabuse his mind of the expectation that they would pay him, or to let him know that they supposed he was acting for Mr. Bergin in the matter of the compromise. That there was some evidence tending to establish these facts cannot be denied. But on the other hand, there was evidence which, either by direct statement or fair inference, tended to show that the defendants had reasonable cause to believe, and did believe, that the plaintiff was engaged by Mr. Bergin to perform the services in connection with the compromise; that the defendant Bartnett was the only one of the defendants who had any talk with plaintiff, and that the matter of the suit was first mentioned between plaintiff and Bartnett in two conversations which came up casually, or at least without design on the part of Mr. Bartnett; that the suggestion of a compromise came from the plaintiff; that there was nothing in the subsequent negotiations to indicate to the defendants that plaintiff was not acting in the matter at the instance and on behalf of Bergin; that they all the time supposed they were dealing with him as the representative of Bergin; and that their intention in stating to him from time to time what Mrs. Moore would pay in settlement was to inform him as Bergin's agent, and not to authorize him, as their agent, to communicate the offers to Bergin. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that defendants had reason to believe that plaintiff expected them to pay him for his efforts in aid of the compromise, or that it was not reasonable for them to suppose that he was acting for

*Rehearing denied January 9, 1905.

Bergin, or that it was incumbent on them to inform him that they did not consider themselves to be his employers. The case is not the same as where one knowingly permits another to work for him under such circumstances that it would be unreasonable to suppose he was employed by a third person. Here there was good reason to suppose plaintiff was acting for the opposite party to the negotiation, and the plaintiff's own conduct was at least equivocal on that subject. We do not mean to say that there was not evidence contrary to these facts. But it is the province of the trial court not only to weigh the testimony which is in direct conflict, but also to determine between conflicting inferences and deductions which may reasonably be drawn from the direct testimony given and the circumstances proven. In view of this well-known rule, we cannot hold that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

It is also claimed that the decision is against law, for the reason that the court does not find the person or persons to whom the services were rendered. The finding that the services were not rendered at the request of defendants includes a negation of the fact of an implied request as well as of an express request, and means that there was no request, either express or implied. The findings must be so construed that they will support the judgment, where such construction is reasonable. As it thus clearly appears that the services were not rendered under circumstances which would make the defendant legally liable to the plaintiff for their value, it was not necessary for the court to find whether or not they were rendered to or for some other person, or whether or not the plaintiff voluntarily rendered the services to the defendants, without expectation of remuneration from them.

The order is affirmed.

HAGER v. ASTORG et al. (S. F. 3,110.)

MORTGAGES — FORECLOSURE — PARTIES—GRANTEE OF UNRECORDED DEED — CESTUI QUE TRUST — ORDER OF SALE—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, providing that no person holding a conveyance from the mortgagor, which is not recorded at the commencement of the action to foreclose, need be made a party to the action, it is immaterial that plaintiff in the action knows of an unrecorded conveyance.

2. Though, when a mortgage was given, the mortgagor held the property in trust to the knowledge of the mortgagee, yet the trust having been terminated, before the action to foreclose, by an unrecorded deed to the cestui que trust, the latter, like any other holder of an unrecorded deed, is, under Code Civ. Proc. § 726, an unnecessary party to the action.

3. Matters necessarily adjudicated by a decree of mortgage foreclosure cannot be questioned, in ejectment for the mortgaged premises by the purchaser at mortgage sale, by the grantee of an unrecorded deed, the decree, by provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 726, being as conclusive against him as though he had been a party to the foreclosure action.

4. The order of sale in a foreclosure action is at most erroneous, and not void, because not having the seal of the court attached; and so the sale thereunder, as well as under a certified copy of the decree of foreclosure, cannot be collaterally attacked.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; R. W. Crump, Judge.

Action by V. A. Hager against A. Astorg and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant A. Astorg appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Sheridan (Geo. D. Shadburne, of counsel), for appellant. H. V. Keeling (Henry H. Reid, of counsel), for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an action in ejectment to recover a tract of land in Lake county, to which plaintiff obtained a sheriff's deed under a sale upon foreclosure of a mortgage executed to her by the defendant M. Astorg. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff against all the defendants, but the defendant A. Astorg alone appeals, and does so both from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The main point on this appeal arises under the following facts: On April 27, 1898, the defendant M. Astorg executed the mortgage above referred to to the plaintiff, who immediately had it recorded. Subsequent to such recordation, and on June 2, 1898, said M. Astorg deeded the mortgaged premises to the appellant, A. Astorg. On January 12, 1900, the plaintiff commenced an action to foreclose the mortgage, making of these parties M. Astorg alone a defendant. When the foreclosure proceedings were commenced, the conveyance from M. Astorg to A. Astorg had not been recorded, and was not recorded until after the decree of foreclosure had been entered. Appellant set up these facts in his answer, and further averred that plaintiff, at the time she commenced her action of foreclosure, knew that the conveyance of the premises had been made by M. Astorg to him, and that he was then sole owner, but that she failed to make him a party defendant in the foreclosure proceedings. Upon the trial appellant sought to make proof of this knowledge of plaintiff of the existence of the conveyance to him when she filed her complaint to foreclose, but on objection of the respondent the court decided that this evidence was inadmissible, and whether the ruling of the court was correct or not is the important question to be now determined.

The lower court was undoubtedly of the opinion that, as the conveyance to the appellant was not recorded when the foreclosure proceedings were commenced, it was immaterial whether plaintiff had actual knowledge of its existence or not; that she was required to make those persons defendants only whose conveyances appeared of record at the time she instituted her foreclosure suit. We are satisfied that this view was correct under the Code and the authorities. It is provided by section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure that: "No person holding a conveyance from or under the mortgagor of the property mortgaged, * * * which conveyance * * * does not appear of record in the proper office at the time of the commencement of the action, need be made a party to such action; and the judgment therein rendered, and the proceedings therein had, are as conclusive against the party holding such unrecorded conveyance * * * as if he had been made a party to the action." The language of this section is not open to construction. It plainly declares that it is unnecessary to make any person a party to an action of foreclosure, whose conveyance from the mortgagor, subsequent to the mortgage, is unrecorded at the time the action is commenced, while at the same time it binds such person by the decree in the action as conclusively as though he had in fact been made a party to the suit. The element of actual knowledge of the existence of such conveyance, in the absence of its recordation, is not within the terms of the section. The presence or absence of the subsequent conveyance upon the record in the proper office when the action is commenced is the exclusive test as to whether the holder thereof need or need not be made a party defendant, so as to bind him by the foreclosure decree. This is the only test in foreclosure proceedings which the law furnishes, and under the section above quoted it is not necessary to make such holder of an unrecorded conveyance a party defendant, even though the mortgagor may have actual knowledge of the existence of such conveyance when the foreclosure suit is commenced. He need only look to the appropriate records, and make parties to the action those alone whose subsequent conveyances appear thereon. This section, above quoted, was under consideration in the case of Aldrich v. Stevens, 49 Cal. 678, and this was the view there taken of the meaning of its provisions, and that decision has since remained undisturbed. See, also, Hawes, Parties to the Action, § 7. It necessarily follows from these considerations that the court properly excluded all evidence attempted to be offered as to knowledge upon the part of plaintiff, when she brought her action to foreclose, of the existence of the unrecorded subsequent conveyance to appellant.

Appellant further averred in his answer that at the time the mortgage was made by M. Astorg the plaintiff knew, and that it was the fact, that the said M. Astorg held the legal title to the premises in trust for appellant; and he sought on the trial to prove these facts under a contention that as beneficiary under the trust, and as the real party in interest, it was necessary for the plaintiff to make him a party defendant in the foreclosure suit, in order to bind him by the decree, and complains on this appeal because he was not permitted to introduce evidence to show these facts. Without discussing the legal aspect of this proposition, it is sufficient to say that other averments in appellant's answer show that the trust he claimed existed had been terminated almost two years before the foreclosure suit was begun by a conveyance from the trustee, M. Astorg, to himself, of such legal title; so that when the suit to foreclose was commenced appellant was not a beneficiary under any trust, but was the holder of a legal title by an unrecorded conveyance thereof, and for that reason, as far as the necessity for making him a party, came within the provisions of section 726, above cited.

Additional points are made by appellant in his brief concerning the action of the lower court in precluding him from proving other alleged defenses by sustaining objections of respondent to inquiries directed to that end. These defenses were that the foreclosure suit had been prematurely brought, because the note sued on was not then due; also involving some question as to the amount of interest due at that time, and a claim that plaintiff had agreed to release M. Astorg from all liability on the note and under the mortgage, and to hold the appellant solely responsible therefor. But these were all matters which were involved in the foreclosure suit—who was liable upon the note, and in what amount, and whether the note was due so as to authorize the foreclosure of the mortgage given to secure its payment—and these matters were necessarily adjudicated by the decree of foreclosure, and hence were not thereafter open to question by the appellant, who, by the section of the Code of Civil Procedure above cited, was conclusively bound by that decree.

There is but one further point in the case requiring consideration. In proving her title to the premises in dispute the plaintiff introduced in evidence the judgment roll in the foreclosure proceedings, together with the order of sale, return thereon, and the sheriff's deed of the land. The order of sale, while properly signed by the clerk, did not have attached to it the seal of the court, and appellant objected to its introduction in evidence on that account. The court admitted it, and this is assigned as error. It appears that this order of sale, properly signed by the clerk, but without the seal of the court attached, was delivered to the sheriff, and under it the sale was made. The order itself contained a complete copy of the decree of foreclosure, duly certified to by the clerk, with his signature and the seal of the court attached. The direction in the order of sale itself in the case at bar, which is not attacked save for want of a seal, consists of a direction to the sheriff to sell the property as provided by law, apply the proceeds of the sale to the satisfaction of the judgment, and to do all things according to the terms and requirements of the judgment and the provisions of the statute. But all these directions are equally provided for in the certified copy of the decree itself, which is incorporated in the order of sale, so that the recitals in the order aside from the decree amount to nothing more than a reiteration of the provisions of that decree. The contention of the appellant, as we gather it (because he makes this point by way of addenda to his brief with a reference to some authorities, but without discussing the matter), is that the validity of this order of sale is to be governed by the requirements of section 682 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relative to writs of execution. That section provides that such writs shall, among other things, be sealed with the seal of the court. Appellant contends that the failure to place the seal of the court on the order of sale rendered it void, and as bearing upon this point he cites from the decisions of this court the case of O'Donnel v. Merguire, 131 Cal. 527, 63 Pac. 847, 82 Am. St. Rep. 389. But that case did not involve the question of the absence of a seal, but the failure of the clerk to authenticate the writ with his official signature, which failure, it was held, rendered the execution void. Whether the absence of a seal would have the like effect upon the validity of a writ of execution as the failure of the clerk to attach his official signature thereto we are not called on to determine, because we are satisfied that, as far as its absence from an order of sale is concerned, it would only render the process erroneous. Aside from this, it may well be questioned whether the power of the sheriff to sell under a foreclosure decree is to be tested by the same rule which governs his power under a writ of execution issued upon a money judgment, as was the case in O'Donnell v. Merguire, as appears from a recital of the facts in Merguire v. O'Donnell, 139 Cal. 7, 72 Pac. 337, 96 Am. St. Rep. 91. Upon a money judgment it is, of course, clear that there can be nothing in the terms of the judgment authorizing a sale of property to satisfy it, and the only authority which the sheriff can obtain to do so must be by virtue of a valid writ of execution issued by the clerk and placed in his hands for that purpose. His authority to sell can be derived solely under the writ. His authority to sell under a foreclosure proceeding is, however, derived from the decree, and the specific directions to sell which it contains. As was said in Spaulding v. Howard, 121 Cal. 197, 53 Pac. 564, in discussing this subject: "The sheriff, under the Code of Civil Procedure, proceeds with the sale by virtue of the decree and such direction as the court may give. Code Civ. Proc. § 726. The proceedings follow by analogy sales upon execution, but not necessarily so. The power to sell comes from the statute and the decree." But, be this as it may, we are satisfied that as to an order of sale issued under a decree of foreclosure the omission of the seal of the court therefrom renders the process erroneous merely, and this view is supported by the case of Newmark v. Chapman, 53 Cal. 559. In that case the only process under which the sheriff made the sale was a certified copy of the decree of foreclosure, and hence there was involved in that case a more serious question as to the validity of the sale than is presented here. In the case cited there was no order of sale at all; in the case at bar there was a defective one. In Newmark v. Chapman the court, while holding that the process under which the sale was made, though erroneous, was not void, said: "The process under which the mortgaged property was sold was only a copy of the judgment issued and attested by the clerk. It did not conform to sections 682 and 684 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it did not purport to have been issued in the name of the people, nor was it directed to the sheriff, nor did it direct him to execute the judgment. * * * The process was erroneous; but was it, for the defects above mentioned, void? The judgment itself directed the sheriff to do all that process, issued in the most formal and regular manner, could have directed him to do. If the process was amendable by supplying the above-mentioned defects, it was not void, for void process cannot be amended; and, if it was amendable, it will be treated in this proceeding as having been amended—that is to say, it cannot be attacked collaterally." If, then, in the case cited, the process under which the sale was made, consisting solely of a certified copy of the decree, was erroneous merely, as the court there held, in the case at bar there is less ground upon which to base a claim that the process here involved was void, because not only was this sale made under a certified copy of the decree of foreclosure, but also under an order of sale, which, at most, was defective in matter of form. We are satisfied from an application of the above authority alone that the process under which the sale in question here was made was not void, but merely erroneous, and that, as to the appellant, who was bound by the decree in the foreclosure suit, as declared by section 726, supra, and who is now in this proceeding collaterally attacking the sale made under it, the process under which sale was had was sufficient authority to the sheriff to sell and convey the premises mortgaged.

PARKE & LACY CO. v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO. (S. F. 3,090.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1905.)

In Bank. On motion for rehearing. Denied.

For opinion in department, see 78 Pac. 1065.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing and from the judgment. The complaint was fatally defective on general demurrer for want of facts in failing to allege performance by plaintiff of its stipulation to continue its efforts to secure the contract, and want of facts is a defect never waived by failure to demur. Nor was the action tried or even decided upon any understanding or assumption that continued effort on the part of plaintiff was an issue in the case. If it had been, the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, but it closed its case in chief without a word of evidence on the point; resting upon the theory of the complaint and of the argument here, viz., that the mere award of the contract, with or without effort on the part of the plaintiff, entitled it to the 5 per cent. The best proof of this is the fact that there is no finding by the court of anything more than the bald allegation of the complaint. The judgment, in short, is not only unsupported by the complaint, but equally without support in the findings. If, as assumed in the opinion of the department, the issue was imported into the case by the act of the defendant in introducing evidence to the effect that no services were rendered after the execution of the contract, then there was a material issue as to which the evidence was conflicting, and no finding upon it. How can a judgment be sustained without any finding upon a material issue?

1. An order denying a motion for relief from default in not serving within the statutory period a notice of intention to move for a new trial is appealable.

ALPERS et al. v. BLISS. (S. F. 2,888.)

DISMISSAL—POWER OF JUDGE—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION—APPEALABLE ORDERS.

1. Mere written requests to the clerk of the court for dismissal of an action, filed among the papers in the case, not being orders of court, are not appealable; and hence an order refusing to vacate the same is not appealable.

2. An order denying a motion to vacate and set aside a judgment of dismissal is not appealable.

3. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 956, providing that on an appeal from a judgment the court may review any intermediate order or decision excepted to which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, except a decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken, and section 647, providing that any decision or order necessarily affecting the judgment is deemed excepted to, an order striking out a pleading is reviewable on appeal from a judgment of dismissal.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581 (1), giving a plaintiff the absolute right to dismiss his action at any time, provided a counterclaim has not been made or affirmative relief sought by cross-complaint or answer of defendant, an action may be dismissed, notwithstanding the filing of a cross-complaint, where at the time of the dismissal the cross-complaint has been stricken from the files by the court, acting within its authority.

5. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 442, giving to a defendant who may seek affirmative relief "against any party the right to file a cross-complaint at the time he files his answer," and section 389, providing that, when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must order them to be brought in, and, to that end, may order amended and supplemental pleadings or a cross-complaint to be filed, an order made by a judge and filed with the clerk on an ex parte application, without notice to the plaintiff, granting leave to file a cross-complaint and make other parties named therein defendants to the action, in view of the direct provisions of section 937, may be vacated, without notice, by the judge who made it.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Charles Alpers and another against George D. Bliss and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, Bliss appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Graves (Geo. W. Chamberlain, of counsel), for appellant. Black & Leaming and George E. De Golia, for respondents.

HARRISON, C. This action was brought in 1878 by Charles Alpers and Laura A. Mowry against 18 defendants for the partition of a tract of land in San Francisco. The plaintiffs, in addition to setting forth facts authorizing a judgment for the partition of the tract, alleged that they had for a long time occupied and made improvements upon a particular lot within the tract, less in extent than that to which they were entitled, and asked that in the partition that lot be set off to them. George D. Bliss, one of the defendants named in the action, demurred to the complaint, and on February 7, 1879, his demurrer was overruled, and 10 days' time given him within which to answer. No further step appears to have been taken in the action by any of the parties thereto until March 1, 1901, when Bliss filed an answer to the complaint, in which he denied that the plaintiffs had any interest in the tract of land, and alleged that he was the owner in fee of the specific parcel thereof described in the complaint. On that day the judge of the superior court, upon the ex parte application of Bliss, made an order, which was filed with the clerk, granting him leave to file in the action a "supplemental and cross complaint" against the plaintiff, Alpers, and Louisa Rabe Barroilhet and the National Fertilizing Company —the last two not having been named as defendants in the original complaint—and directing that these two be made defendants in the action.

In the cross-complaint thus filed, Bliss alleged that the plaintiffs had no interest in the tract of land described in the complaint, and set forth certain facts tending to show that in February, 1888, he had become the owner in fee of the specific parcel of land claimed by the plaintiffs, and also alleged that subsequent to the commencement of the action the plaintiffs had conveyed all their interest in the property which was the subject-matter of the action, and that the same had become vested in Louisa Rabe Barroilhet, one of the persons made defendant in the cross-complaint. He also alleged that the National Fertilizing Company, the other defendant brought into the action by the cross-complaint, "claims some interest in the premises, which, if any, is subordinate and subject to" his interests. He also alleged that the plaintiffs, Charles Alpers and Laura A. Mowry, were for a long time in the wrongful occupation of the premises, and that the rents, issues, and profits of the premises during such occupation were $5,000, and that he had suffered damage in the sum of $5,000 by reason of their withholding the same. He therefore prayed judgment for the possession of the premises, and that he be declared the owner thereof, and recover $5,000 for rents, issues, and profits, and $5,000 for damages.

May 17, 1901, upon motion of the plaintiff Alpers, the court made and entered in its minutes an order vacating and setting aside the previous order granting leave to file a supplemental and cross complaint, and thereafter the said cross-complaint was by its order stricken from the files of the court. Afterwards, on the same day, the plaintiff Alpers presented to the clerk of the court a written request to dismiss the said action on his part, which was filed among the papers in the case, and he also entered an order to like effect in the order book of the clerk of said court; and on May 20th George B. Mowry, as administrator of the estate of Laura A. Mowry, who had been substituted as a plaintiff in the action in the place and stead of Laura A. Mowry, the original plaintiff, since deceased, presented a written request to the clerk of the court to dismiss the said action upon his part, which was filed among the papers in the case; and he also entered an order to like effect in the order book of said clerk. May 22, 1901, the clerk entered a judgment of dismissal of said action on the part of the plaintiffs, in accordance with the said requests. Thereafter Bliss gave notice that he would move the court "to vacate and set aside the purported dismissal of said action by the plaintiff Alpers on the 17th day of May, 1901, and also the purported dismissal of said action of the 20th day of May, 1901, by George B. Mowry, as plaintiff in said action, as the successor of Laura A. Mowry, one of the original plaintiffs," and would also at the same time move the court to vacate and set aside the judgment of dismissal entered in the action May 22, 1901. Upon the hearing of this motion the court made and entered in its minutes an order denying the same. From this order and the aforesaid judgment the present appeal has been taken; the appellant stating in his notice of appeal that he appeals "from the order made and entered in the minutes of said court on the 17th day of June, 1901, denying the motion of the defendant George D. Bliss to vacate and set aside the purported dismissal of said action by the plaintiff Charles Alpers filed on the 17th day of May, 1901; also from the order denying the motion of defendant George D. Bliss to vacate and set aside the purported dismissal of said action on the 20th day of May, 1901; also from the order denying the motion of the defendant George D. Bliss to vacate and set aside the judgment of dismissal entered on the 22d day of May, 1901; and also from the judgment of dismissal entered on the said 22d day of May, 1901, and from the whole thereof."

1. The "purported dismissals" of the action by the plaintiff Alpers on May 17th and of the plaintiff Mowry on May 20th were merely written requests by them to the clerk for a dismissal of the action, filed among the papers in the case. As they were not orders of the court, there could be no appeal from them, and they are not subject to review by an appellate court; and, being thus nonappealable, the order of the court refusing to vacate or set them aside is also nonappealable. Harper v. Hildreth, 99 Cal. 265, 33 Pac. 1103.

2. Neither is the order denying the motion to vacate and set aside the judgment of dismissal appealable. All of the matters presented by the appellant for consideration by the court upon that motion were a portion of its own records in the action, and existed before the order was entered. "It is settled that, when a judgment or order is itself appealable, the appeal must be taken from such judgment or order, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside." Goyhinech v. Goyhinech, 80 Cal. 409, 22 Pac. 175; Harper v. Hildreth, supra; Mantel v. Mantel, 135 Cal. 315, 67 Pac. 758.

3. There remains to be considered the appeal from the judgment. Section 956, Code Civ. Proc., provides that upon such appeal the court may review "any intermediate order or decision excepted to, which involves the merits, or necessarily affects the judgment, except a decision or order from which an appeal might have been taken." An order striking out a pleading necessarily affects the judgment, and, under section 647, Code Civ. Proc., is deemed excepted to, and, under the provisions of the above section 956, may be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment.

The right of the plaintiffs to have the action dismissed, and the authority of the clerk to enter the judgment of dismissal, depend upon the condition of the pleadings at the time the plaintiffs made the request for such dismissal. Section 581 (1), Code Civ. Proc., gives to a plaintiff the absolute right to dismiss his action at any time, "provided a counter-claim has not been made or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of defendant." Thompson v. Spraig, 66 Cal. 350, 5 Pac. 506. At the time the plaintiffs made their request to the clerk the cross-complaint had been struck from the files under the order of the court, and at that time the only pleading on file in the action on his part was his answer, in which he made no demand for affirmative relief. The plaintiffs' right to dismiss the action was therefore absolute, if the court was authorized to make the order striking the cross-complaint from the files.

The provision of section 442, Code Civ. Proc., giving to a defendant who may seek affirmative relief "against any party" the right to file a cross-complaint at the same time that he files his answer, is limited to cases in which he seeks affirmative relief against a "party" to the action. This section does not give him a right to file a cross-complaint for affirmative relief against one who is not already a party to the action, or bring new or additional parties into the action by including them in his cross-complaint as defendants thereto. He cannot bring a new party into the action without an order of the court therefor.

Section 389, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "The court may determine any controversy between parties before it when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversy cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court must then order them to be brought in, and to that end may order amended and supplemental pleadings, or a cross-complaint to be filed and summons thereon to be issued and served." This section does not give the court power to bring into the action for determination a controversy between the defendant and strangers to the action, which is irrelevant to the action between the parties already before it, except for the purpose of making its determination of the controversy between the parties already before it complete, and without prejudice to the rights of others. The defendant cannot inject into the action a controversy between himself and an outsider, even though it affects the property to which the action relates, unless some party already before the court is interested in or will be affected by the determination of such controversy. "The controversy" named in the concluding member of the above-quoted sentence is "any controversy between the parties before it" named in the first clause, and includes a controversy presented by a cross-complaint as well as that presented by the original complaint. Winter v. McMillan, 87 Cal. 256, 25 Pac. 407, 22 Am. St. Rep. 243; Mackenzie v. Hodgkin, 126 Cal. 591, 59 Pac. 36, 77 Am. St. Rep. 209. See, also, East Riverside, etc., v. Holcomb, 126 Cal. 315, 58 Pac. 817; Boskowitz v. Thompson (Cal.) 78 Pac. 290. In either case the "other parties" who may be brought in must be persons whose presence is essential to the complete determination of a controversy between parties who were already before the court. It is "to that end" that the court is authorized to order a cross-complaint to be filed, and a summons thereon to be issued and served. It was evidently in view of these principles that before filing the cross-complaint herein the appellant obtained an order granting him leave to file it, and making the "other parties" therein named defendants in the action. This order, however, was made upon the ex parte application of the appellant, and without any notice to the plaintiffs, and was not made by the court, but was made by a judge of the court and filed with the clerk.

Section 937, Code Civ. Proc., provides: "An order made out of court without notice to the adverse party may be vacated or modified without notice, by the judge who made it; or may be vacated or modified on notice, in the manner in which other motions are made." It may be assumed that, when plaintiffs moved to vacate the order granting leave to file the cross-complaint, the judge made a more careful examination of the pleadings than was given when the order was made. Upon such examination, and finding that under its allegations the interest of the appellant in the property described in his cross-complaint was not acquired by him until more than nine years after the commencement of the action; that he had neglected for more than thirteen years thereafter to assert any right thereto as against the plaintiffs; that after the commencement of the action the plaintiffs had transferred all their interest in the property, and that the same was then vested in Mrs. Barroilhet; that he did not allege that the plaintiffs, or either of them, were in possession of the property described in his cross-complaint, or made any claim thereto; that the right to the possession of the property claimed by him is a controversy between him and Mrs. Barroilhet, in which no other party to the action is shown to be interested; that the only affirmative relief sought by him against the plaintiffs, or either of them, is a money judgment for the value of the rents and profits of the property during the period it was in their occupancy; that, as the action is for the partition of the property described in the complaint, and is not brought upon any "contract" or "transaction," the affirmative relief thus sought does not affect the property to which the action relates; that neither of these "other parties" named as defendants in the cross-complaint are necessary parties for the complete determination of this controversy—the court might very reasonably conclude that the order had been inadvertently made, and that the plaintiffs should have had an opportunity to be heard before it was made, and therefore that it should be vacated. If so, its action in vacating the order was authorized by virtue of the above section 937, Code Civ. Proc. Fremont v. Merced Mining Co., 9 Cal. 19; Borland v. Thornton, 12 Cal. 440; Coburn v. Pacific Lumber & Mill Co., 46 Cal. 31; Wiggin v. Superior Court, 68 Cal. 398, 9 Pac. 646.

The motion was addressed to the judicial discretion of the court, and we cannot say that there was any abuse of this discretion in granting it. It was, however, granted "without prejudice"; thus leaving to the appellant the right to renew his application upon notice to the persons entitled thereto, and upon the hearing of such application to establish his right, if it existed, to file a cross-complaint.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

MERNIN v. CORY. (S. F. 2,963.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1904.)

MALPRACTICE—NEGLIGENCE — INSTRUCTIONS — EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against a dentist for malpractice in extracting a tooth it is proper to take into consideration the fact that plaintiff's injuries were aggravated by a delay on the advice of defendant in consulting a physician and obtaining treatment.

2. Where the instructions in an action against a dentist for malpractice, taken as a whole, clearly inform the jury that carelessness or unskillfulness must have attended all the alleged acts of defendant in order to render him liable, it is not necessary to repeat those words in every paragraph of the instructions.

3. Where plaintiff claimed, in an action against a dentist for malpractice, that after the acts complained of there was a "clicking" or disagreeable sound made by the movement of the jaw, the refusal to allow defendant to show by numerous witnesses that they were similarly afflicted was proper, plaintiff not claiming that the condition could be produced only by a dental operation.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by Gertrude Mernin against B. E. Cory. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. K. Harris and W. D. Turner (Goodfellow & Eells, of counsel), for appellant. F. B. Cook and A. P. Black (Frank Short, of counsel), for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of the malpractice of the defendant as a dentist. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $2,000, and judgment was rendered for that amount. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

We do not see any sufficient ground for maintaining appellant's contention that the verdict was not supported by the evidence. There is no room for doubt that the extraction of one of plaintiff's teeth by defendant resulted in serious and permanent injury to plaintiff's jaw, and, while the question whether or not this injury was caused by the careless and unskillful conduct of defendant when extracting the tooth is one about which there might well be different conclusions drawn from the evidence, still it cannot be truly said that there was no material evidence supporting the conclusion at which the jury arrived on that subject. If the jury believed the testimony of plaintiff, they could not well avoid finding the malpractice averred.

The main contention of appellant is that there should be a reversal on account of an instruction No. 4 given the jury at the request of respondent. The facts out of which this litigation arose commenced with an attempt of appellant on or about October 15, 1899, to extract a tooth from the lower jaw of respondent. Respondent testified, in substance, that while appellant claimed that he had extracted the whole of the tooth, he had, in fact, broken and mutilated the same, and had left part of the root in the jaw; that she so informed appellant at the time, but that he insisted that he had taken it all out; that the jaw became much inflamed, and very painful; that she visited appellant a number of times, and complained to him that part of the root was still in the jaw, but that he declared that this was not so, and that the inflammation and pain would soon subside; that afterwards appellant admitted that part of the root did so remain, and on November 10th extracted the same, but in doing so he first carelessly and unskillfully took hold with his instrument of the jaw itself, instead of the root, and, as described by respondent in detail, inflicted grave and permanent injury to plaintiff's jaw; that her jaw continued to get worse, so that at times it became fixed, and she could not open her mouth; that she frequently visited appellant, and asked him to treat it; that he said there was nothing serious the matter; that she repeatedly asked him if she should not have her jaw examined and treated by a physician or surgeon, and he repeatedly advised her not to do so, and that, if she did so, she would make herself a laughing stock; that, relying on such advice, she postponed consulting a physician or surgeon for a long time, and that when afterwards she did consult a physician, and was treated at a hospital, it was too late for her to receive much benefit from such treatment. In view of this and other evidence the court gave the said instruction No. 4, which is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that defendant advised plaintiff not to consult a surgeon or secure medical treatment after her jaw was injured by defendant, if you find the same was carelessly and negligently injured by defendant, and that plaintiff relied thereon, and did not consult a physician or surgeon for a number of weeks after such injury, and that by reason of such delay plaintiff's injuries were aggravated and made worse, and that it was more difficult or impossible to treat or cure such injuries of plaintiff, and that thereby such injuries became and are permanent and cannot be cured, and the same has affected the general health of plaintiff, and she has become and is sick and disordered and unable to work or perform labor, or support herself by her own labor and work as she did prior to such injuries, if you find that she did so work and support herself before she was injured by defendant—then I instruct you that you may take all such matters into consideration in fixing the damage incurred by plaintiff by such acts."

It is first contended that this instruction No. 4 was erroneous, because it was not the duty of appellant, being merely a dentist and not a general physician or surgeon, to give the kind of advice asked by respondent. We do not think that this contention is maintainable. While a dentist may be qualified for his profession without being learned in the general science of therapeutics, he certainly should have such knowledge of the very bone out of which he extracts a tooth as to enable him to understand whether it had been so injured as to require treatment beyond his skill. It was also contended that the instruction is erroneous because it does not expressly state that the advice was carelessly or unskillfully given. But, in the first place, the court in other parts of its charge, both at the request of appellant and on its own motion, fully and in various forms instructed the jury that, even if respondent's injuries resulted from the acts of appellant, still respondent could not recover unless such acts were carelessly or unskillfully done. For instance, the jury were instructed: "Should the evidence fail to show that defendant did not exercise ordinary skill, care, and prudence in the work which he did for plaintiff, then you must find a verdict for the defendant." Also: "You should also bear in mind that the contention of plaintiff that there was a lack of skill or care on the part of defendant is a fact which the law requires the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence, the same as any other fact or facts in the case, and the jury would not be justified in finding this as a fact upon mere surmises or assumptions." Also: "If the plaintiff sought the services, care, and skill of the defendant for dental work, and the defendant accepted her employment to do such work, the law only required of him the possession of such skill and learning in his profession, and only requires of him in the performance of his work such ordinary care and skill as is ordinarily possessed by a person following such profession, and if you find from the evidence in this case that the defendant at the time he performed services for the plaintiff did possess skill and learning, and that in his services rendered to the plaintiff, in all the work performed for her by him, he exercised that skill and care and good judgment, then you must find a verdict for the defendant, even if you should also find from the evidence that the plaintiff suffered injuries and pain after such services were performed for her, even if caused by the work of the defendant." These instructions clearly informed the jury that carelessness or unskillfulness must have attended all the alleged acts of appellant in order to make him liable, and there was no necessity of repeating them at every part of the instructions. Moreover, if the facts stated showed malpractice, the use of adjectives or adverbs to expressly characterize such malpractice as careless or unskillful would add nothing to the statement.

It is contended also that the instruction was erroneous because it is averred in the complaint that the conduct of defendant referred to in the instruction was willful, and intended to deceive, while the instruction does not include the element of willfulness, etc.; but this averment of willfulness was superfluous, unless respondent had claimed punitive damages, and the proof of want of reasonable care or skill was sufficient to maintain the action without any evidence of the willfulness.

After the alleged acts of malpractice, respondent had a "popping" or "clicking" of the jaw—a disagreeable sound made by a movement of the jaw. Respondent testified that this clicking commenced immediately after the alleged acts of appellant, claiming that it was produced by said acts. Appellant offered to call several witnesses to testify that each of them had a clicking jaw. The court sustained an objection to the proposed testimony, and it is contended that this ruling was prejudicial error. We do not think that this contention is maintainable. In addition to the general objection to the introduction of special instances of this kind and the remoteness of the proposed testimony, its purpose could only have been to show that a number of persons had this peculiar condition of the jaw, which had not been produced by the cause to which respondent attributed her condition. But it was abundantly shown by the evidence that this condition may be produced by various causes, and there was no claim or pretense by respondent that it could be produced only by a dental operation. We think, therefore, that the court properly refused to have its time taken up by listening to the sound of a lot of clicking jaws, for such a spectacle would have added nothing to the elucidation of any real points at issue in the case.

The two contentions above noticed are the ones mainly relied on. We see nothing in any of the other points made for a reversal which calls for special notice, and it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, no one of them is tenable.

sion and commenced making improvements thereon, which continued six months thereafter, and aggregated $500; that the plaintiff gave no notice whatever, or made any indication, of her claim to the property until the commencement of the action, nearly three years after her return from Canada, and after being informed of the whole transaction. If the plaintiff did not approve of the transaction on the part of her husband, it was her duty, when informed of the same, to promptly repudiate what had been done by her husband in the premises. Instead, however, it appears that no notice whatever was given, or steps taken, to inform the defendant that she disapproved of the transaction, until the commencement of the action, nearly three years after becoming acquainted with all the facts. It is laid down as one of the maxims of the law that "he who can and does not forbid that which is done on his behalf is deemed to have bidden it." Civ. Code, § 3519. In Quick v. Milligan, 108 Ind. 419, 58 Am. Rep. 49, 9 N. E. 392, the appellant, in conjunction with her husband, signed and acknowledged a conveyance of her interest in the land in question to one Etchison, and sent such conveyance to her sister, with instructions to deliver it only upon the condition that he pay the amount of the purchase money in question. In violation of these instructions, however, the sister delivered the deed to the grantee named in it, without the payment of the purchase money. In that case it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiff, that the deed, having been delivered in violation of the condition imposed by the said plaintiff, did not become effective. The court, after admitting to the full extent the abstract proposition as stated to be correct—that a deed delivered in escrow is not effective if placed in the hands of the grantee in violation of a condition upon which the person who holds in escrow is authorized to deliver it—however, decided the case against the appellant and in favor of the defendant, the purchaser from Etchison, on the ground of estoppel, to wit, that, where one of two innocent persons must suffer, he through whose agency the loss occurred must sustain it (citing a number of authorities to that effect).

In Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, 70 Pac. 175, the plaintiffs owned a tract of land near Redlands and the defendants owned a tract near Downey, and exchanged deeds for the same on December 1, 1898, in pursuance of a verbal agreement previously entered into. On the night of November 30, 1898, a house which stood on defendants' land was destroyed by fire, but it was found that at the time the deeds were exchanged the parties believed that the dwelling was on the land; that the existence of the dwelling house was an inducement to the plaintiffs and a part of the consideration moving to them in the transaction, and that, had plaintiffs known of the destruction of the house, they would not have made the exchange. On December 19th plaintiffs served notice of a rescission and demanded a reconveyance, but prior to that time, and after the exchange of the deeds, defendants had placed permanent improvements on the land taken by them of the value of $359, and expended $18 for cultivating and irrigating said lands, and $40 paid to the plaintiffs' intestate, and one of the parties who made the exchange, for fertilizing material left on the premises conveyed to the defendants. The court below held that, although the plaintiffs had the right to rescind in view of the mutual mistake, they were yet estopped by subsequent conduct; that the acts and conduct of plaintiffs' intestate indicated that he did not intend to rescind, and rather encouraged the defendants in the work performed and expenditures made, adding: "These things created an equitable estoppel, because it is unconscionable for a party to permit another to so improve property obtained in such a bargain, and then claim the property and improvements, even were he to pay the costs of the improvements;" and this court, after citing a number of authorities bearing upon the question of estoppel, affirmed the judgment.

In Alexander v. Welcker, 141 Cal. 302, 74 Pac. 845, the note and mortgage sued on were executed by the defendant (appellant) and her husband in his lifetime—W. T. Welcker—the title to the mortgaged premises being in the appellant alone. The court finds that, after executing the mortgage with her husband, she exacted a promise from him as to the delivery of the note and mortgage at the time she intrusted the same to him, but that he never at any time informed the mortgagees (under whom plaintiff claimed) of the promise he had made to defendant, and they had no notice or knowledge thereof. It was contended in that case by the appellant, as here, that there was no legal delivery of the mortgage to the mortgagees. This court, however, in the opinion affirming the judgment, says: "Under the circumstances, the appellant is clearly estopped from denying the delivery of the mortgage."

The reasons for the application of the old rule of equitable estoppel are equally as cogent in the case at bar.

WILLEY v. BENEDICT CO. (S. F. 2,944.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—SERVICE OF PROCESS—SHERIFF'S RETURN—MOTIONS TO QUASH—RECORD—APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT.

1. Under St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, § 1, requiring foreign corporations to designate an agent for the service of process, and to file such designation with the Secretary of State, in which case process may be served on the agent, or, if no person is designated, on the Secretary of State, a return reciting service on the Secretary of State, but failing to state that there was no designation of an agent on file, is insufficient to confer jurisdiction over the corporation, and cannot be aided and rendered sufficient by a certificate of the Secretary of State, attached to the summons as returned, showing that the corporation had not made the required designation.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 670, providing that in case of judgment by default the judgment roll consists of the summons, with affidavit of proof of service, the complaint, with memorandum indorsed thereon of defendant's default, and a copy of the judgment, a certificate of the Secretary of State, attached to a summons served on him for a foreign corporation, under St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94, § 1, providing for such service in case no person is designated by the foreign corporation as an agent for the service of process, is not a part of the record, and cannot be looked to, on a motion made on the record to quash the service and return, to supply an omission of the return to recite that the corporation had not designated an agent for the service of process.

3. Where affidavits offered on the hearing of a motion did not appear either in full or in substance in the transcript, the refusal of the court to admit them in evidence cannot be considered on appeal.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Charles G. Willey against the Benedict Company, a corporation. From an order vacating a service of summons and setting aside a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Franklin P. Bull, for appellant. Rigby & Rigby and Wal. J. Tuska, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The plaintiff, as assignee of one Lea Bleakmore, on December 22, 1900, brought an action in the superior court of San Francisco against the defendant, a foreign corporation, to recover the value of personal services alleged to have been rendered it by Bleakmore, and had certain property of the defendant attached. Summons was issued, directed generally to "The Benedict Company (a corporation)," and delivered to the sheriff of Sacramento county, who in due time returned that he had served it upon the defendant, "a foreign corporation doing business in the state of California, defendant therein named, by handing to and leaving with C. F. Curry, Secretary of State of the state of California, a copy of said summons," having attached thereto a copy of the complaint. On March 14, 1901, the default of the defendant having been theretofore entered, on motion, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against the defendant for $3,488.75, the amount claimed. On April 19th following, the defendant, appearing specially for that purpose, and upon due notice given, moved the court to vacate the service of the summons and complaint, and to set aside the default and the judgment entered, on several grounds, one of which was that the court had acquired no jurisdiction of the person of defendant, as there had been no legal or valid service on it of the summons and complaint. This motion was based, and its hearing had, solely upon the record in the case; and, the court having thereafter granted the order as prayed for, plaintiff appeals.

While, as stated, several grounds were urged in the lower court in support of the motion to quash the service of the summons and vacate the judgment, and they are all equally insisted on here to sustain the order, we think the matter may be disposed of upon a consideration of the question, solely, whether the return of the sheriff, under which jurisdiction of the defendant was assumed, was sufficient in law to give the superior court jurisdiction of defendant. If not, the order of the lower court must be affirmed.

The service of the summons was made, and its sufficiency is attempted to be sustained, under the provisions of section 1 of an act amending "An act in relation to foreign corporations," passed in 1899 (St. 1899, p. 111, c. 94), which provides, in effect, that every foreign corporation doing business in this state shall, within a specified time after commencing business here, designate some person residing in the state, upon whom process may be served, and file such designation in the office of the Secretary of State, in which case it shall be lawful to serve the process upon such designated person, and, in the event no such person is designated, then service shall be made on the Secretary of State. It will be noted that this provision is a radical departure from the ordinary method of procedure whereby jurisdiction is obtained over a defendant, and for that reason, having due regard for the protection of the personal and property rights of a defendant, before a court can assume jurisdiction of him under the substituted process it provides for, a strict compliance with its provisions must be insisted on. It is said "substituted service in actions purely in personam is a departure from the rule of common law, and the authority for it must be strictly followed. Therefore the existence of the conditions upon which the validity of such service depends must be shown affirmatively by the return, and cannot be inferred." 18 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 932.

Now to apply this rule to the substituted service of the summons in the case at bar, as the return of the sheriff discloses it to have been made: It will be observed that section 1 of the statute above referred to requires every foreign corporation doing business in this state to designate, by filing such designation in the office of the Secretary of State, a person upon whom process may be served, and when so designated the process shall be served on him; and it then declares that where no such person is designated the required service may be made upon the Secretary of State. It provides in any event for the service upon some one, but as to that service, in as far as making it on the Secretary of State is concerned, the statute prescribes a condition, namely, that the records of the office of the Secretary of State disclose that no person has been designated by the corporation for that purpose. If there is a designated person, service must be made on him; if there is none, then on the Secretary of State; but the right to serve the latter is conditioned solely on the nonexistence of the former.

When we examine the return of the sheriff (and we have recited above its essential particulars), we find an entire absence of any recital upon the subject as to whether the defendant foreign corporation had filed any designation of a person to be served. The only statement is that he served the summons on the Secretary of State. But as, by the terms of the statute, there was no authority to serve the Secretary of State unless it appeared that there was no designation of a person on file in his office, the return of the sheriff should have shown the existence of this condition, upon which alone service on the Secretary of State could be either authorized or sustained. If it was a fact that no designation had been made, it should have been contained in his return, and his failure to so make it renders the return insufficient to show that any such service had been made as would give the court jurisdiction of the defendant.

In Works, Courts & Their Jurisdiction, p. 291, it is said: "Where service is allowed on one person only where some other person cannot be found, the proof of service must, where service is made on the second person, show that the first could not be found. In other words, where service is allowed to be made on a particular person or officer only on condition, the return must show the existence of the condition, or it is insufficient."

In Nevada a statute of that state similar to ours provided that, in a suit against a foreign corporation doing business there, service of process might be made upon the Secretary of State in the event of a failure of such corporation to appoint and keep an agent within that state upon whom service might be made. In Brooks v. Nickel Syndicate, 24 Nev. 325, 53 Pac. 597, passing upon the validity of a judgment of default upon substituted service, where the record showed, from the return of the sheriff, that he had served the summons on the Secretary of State, but his return did not show that the corporation had not appointed an agent within the state upon whom service might be made under the act, it was held that the return was insufficient to give the court jurisdiction. It was there said: "The statute of 1889, under which service of summons was made in the case at bar, authorized such service upon the Secretary of State in the event of the failure of the appellant to appoint and keep an agent within this state, upon whom such service could be made, and such facts should be affirmatively shown by the record." To the same general effect are Cairo & Fulton Railroad v. Trout, 32 Ark. 23; Glines v. Supreme Sitting Order of Iron Hall (Sup.) 20 N. Y. Supp. 275.

It is insisted, however, that in the case at bar the fact that the defendant corporation had designated no person upon whom service might be made appeared from the certificate of the Secretary of State to that effect, which was attached to the summons as returned. But in the first place, the statute does not provide for any certificate of the Secretary of State as evidence of that fact in aid of the sheriff's return, or otherwise; and, in the second, if it could be availed of at all, it does not pretend to be and is no part of the return of the sheriff, nor is it any part of the record, which, in cases of judgments by default, consists of the summons, with affidavit or proof of service, the complaint, with a memorandum indorsed thereon of the entry of defendant's default, and a copy of the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 670, subd. 1. As the motion to quash was made solely on the record, and as this certificate was not part of it, it is unavailing for any purpose.

It is further insisted by appellant that the court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the affidavits of certain persons, offered by him on the hearing of the motion. But as none of these affidavits, or the substance of them, appear in the transcript, there is nothing upon which appellant's point in regard to them can be considered.

We are satisfied, for the reasons given, that the order of the superior court vacating the service of the summons and setting aside the judgment was properly made, and is therefore affirmed.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SETTLEMENT — MISTAKE IN NOTICE—TRANSACTIONS IN LIFETIME OF DECEASED — MARRIED WOMAN — ACTION FOR PERSONAL SERVICES—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—GIFT — SEPARATE ESTATE—AGREEMENT WITH HUSBAND—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. Though the day fixed in plaintiff's notice for the presentation of the bill of exceptions, proposed amendments of which had been proposed by defendant, was a day later than provided by the statute, settlement was proper; it being shown that the mistake was the result of an excusable inadvertence of plaintiff's attorney, thus making a proper case for relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, providing that parties to an action on a claim against a decedent's estate may not testify to a matter or fact occurring in deceased's lifetime, a married woman suing for services rendered deceased may not, for the purpose of showing that her earnings were her separate estate, testify to the

3. For the purpose of showing, in an action by a married woman on a claim for services rendered by her, that the claim was her separate estate, by agreement with her husband, as authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, the husband, who has testified that he had had an understanding with her ever since their marriage as to the control and management of her earnings, may testify as to who had had the management and control thereof during such time.

4. Civ. Code, § 172, providing that a married man may not make a gift of community property unless his wife, in writing, consent thereto, does not apply to a gift by him to her.

Arthur H. Barendt and Chas. E. Naylor (Wm. P. Hubbard, of counsel), for appellant. Alexander D. Keyes, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The court did not err in settling the bill of exceptions, notwithstanding the fact that the day fixed for the presentation thereof in the notice given by the plaintiff was 11 days after the defendant had served his proposed amendments thereto. It was clearly shown by the affidavits and by all the circumstances of the case that the mistake of one day in fixing the time was the result of an excusable inadvertence on the part of plaintiff's attorney, and this made a proper case for relief under section 473, Code Civ. Proc.

The plaintiff was a married woman, and the action was on a contract for services alleged to have been rendered by her to the deceased in his lifetime as nurse and attendant upon him. The defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and alleged affirmatively that the indebtedness sued on was community property of the plaintiff and her husband, and that there was a defect of parties, by reason of the fact that the husband was not made a party plaintiff. At the close of the testimony a motion by the defendant for a nonsuit was granted.

The plaintiff urges with much persistence that there was sufficient evidence to justify findings in her favor, and hence that the motion for nonsuit should not have been granted. In view of the conclusions that we have reached upon the rulings of the court rejecting certain evidence offered by the plaintiff, we think it unnecessary to decide the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence. One ground of the motion for nonsuit was that the indebtedness sued on accrued during the marriage of the plaintiff and her husband, and that there was no evidence of any agreement between her and her husband to the effect that her personal earnings should be her separate estate. This appears to have been one of the main reasons for granting the nonsuit. It follows that the exclusion of any evidence tending to show that such earnings were not community property would be prejudicial error.

The testimony of the plaintiff concerning the course of conduct of herself and husband with respect to her earnings was properly excluded. It related to matters of fact which must have taken place in the lifetime of the deceased, and therefore it would be inadmissible under the provisions of subdivision 3, § 1880, Code Civ. Proc. See Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 672, 72 Pac. 142.

The husband of the plaintiff testified in her behalf that he had had an understanding with her ever since their marriage as to the control and management of her earnings. He was then asked the question: "Who has had the management and control of your wife's earnings during the past fifteen years?" The objection that this question was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial was sustained, and in this we think the court erred. Other questions as to whether or not he had himself had the management or control of such earnings, or had consented at all times to the control and disposition thereof by his wife, or had ever objected to her management and control thereof, and as to what she did with her earnings, and what the agreement was between them with respect thereto, were put to him, and upon objections, chiefly to the form of the questions, the witness was not allowed to answer, and the result of the entire effort of counsel on this subject was that no testimony of this character was obtained from the witness. It may be admitted that the other questions mentioned were objectionable in form, although, owing to the apparent dullness of the witness, the court should have been more liberal in its rulings in this regard. But the question above quoted was not subject to this objection, nor did it call for the conclusion of the witness—at least, not to such an extent as to make it objectionable for that reason—and it should have been allowed. There can be no doubt that the husband may make a gift of the community property to the wife, and that the effect of such gift will be to transmute it into her separate estate. The provision in section 172 of the Civil Code that he cannot make a gift of community property unless the wife, in writing, consent thereto, is a provision for her benefit and protection, and it has no application to the case of a gift by the husband directly to the wife. And so, also, he may, under sections 158, 159, Civ. Code, contract with her by an agreement that her personal earnings shall be her separate property, and this may apply to future as well as past earnings, and the effect of such an agreement will be to convert such earnings from the status of community property to that of separate property of the wife. Wren v. Wren, 100 Cal. 276, 34 Pac. 775, 38 Am. St. Rep. 287. Now, it may well have been the case that the husband could recall no conversation between them in which such an agreement was distinctly expressed. His testimony strongly indicates this condition of memory. And yet it might also be true that the fact that there was such an agreement was perfectly well understood between them. In such a case resort may be had to circumstantial evidence. The conduct and actions of the husband with respect to such earnings, indicating that he did not regard them as community property, or that he had relinquished to her the right to control and dispose of her receipts from that source, would be competent evidence and admisisble to prove the agreement. It had been shown that the plaintiff had been for more than 20 years keeping a lodging house in San Francisco; that she had rented the house herself, had collected all the rents, and had managed the disbursement of all funds in relation thereto; and that the services sued for had been rendered to the deceased by the plaintiff while he was an inmate of her house as a lodger and boarder. The husband testified, as above stated, that he had made an agreement with her concerning her earnings, but was not allowed to state the effect of that agreement. If, in connection with all these facts, the plaintiff had been allowed to prove that during the 22 years of their married life the wife had had exclusive and undisturbed control of her earnings, treating the same as her own property, and disposing of them as she pleased, without consulting her husband, such evidence would certainly tend to prove an understanding between them that such earnings were to be her own separate estate. The question tended directly to elicit evidence of such facts, and, if answered as the plaintiff manifestly expected, it would have produced competent and material evidence in her behalf.

The amendment to the complaint, inserting an allegation that there was an agreement between the plaintiff and her husband that her earnings should be her separate property, which amendment was made after this question was excluded, was not necessary as a foundation for testimony of that character. Before that amendment was made, the complaint contained a statement that the deceased was indebted to her for the services in question. Under this allegation she was entitled to introduce evidence of an agreement whereby her earnings during the marriage should be her separate estate, and thus show that the indebtedness was to her, and not to her husband.

The order denying a motion for new trial is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SMITH, C. This is a suit brought by plaintiff against appellant, Wilson, and his surety, for the sum of $4,200, as damages for failure of said defendant, as sheriff, to sell under execution certain personal property held by him under attachment in the suit of plaintiff against Anderson & Berry. The defendants pleaded in justification an injunction issued from the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California in bankruptcy proceedings there pending; and the defendant Wilson further pleaded by way of counterclaim that plaintiff was indebted to him in the sum of $568 for money paid by him as keeper's fees, at plaintiff's request, while in charge of the property. The findings were for defendant, except as to the counterclaim, as to which the court finds: That the defendant Wilson did employ keepers of the property in his charge, who remained in possession until after the judgment; that an order was made by the superior court in the case allowing him the sum of $284 as his necessary expenses of keeping and preserving the property under the attachment; and that the said sum has not been paid to the defendant. But the court gave him judgment for his costs only, disallowing the counterclaim. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and the relief demanded is that the judgment be modified so as to adjudge to the appellant the amount of his counterclaim, as found by the court. The judgment was affirmed by this court on the appeal of the plaintiff June 30, 1904, 77 Pac. 706. There is no brief on file for respondent. The counterclaim seems to be a just debt; and no reason suggests itself to us as to why it should not be allowed (Lane v. McElhany, 49 Cal. 421, Shumway v. Leakey, 73 Cal. 261, 14 Pac. 841, and St. 1869–70, p. 158, c. 144, therein cited), and we are of the opinion that it should be so ordered.

We advise that the judgment be modified as above indicated, and, as modified, that the same stand affirmed.

We concur: GRAY, C.; COOPER, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment appealed from is modified by adding thereto a clause to the effect that the defendant also recover of plaintiff the further sum of $284, with interest from September 24, 1901, and, as so modified, stands affirmed: SHAW, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.

SMITH v. SMITH. (S. F. 3,053.)*

NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF ORDER—DILIGENCE—DIVORCE.

1. Though an order granting a new trial "on the sole ground that it appears that defendant was sick, as alleged in" the affidavits, is indefinite as to whether it was granted because of abuse of discretion of the court in not granting an adjournment, or because defendant was prevented by unavoidable accident from attendance at the trial, it may be sustained on the latter ground.

2. It appeared on a motion for a new trial in a divorce case that defendant conducted the defense in person, without an attorney; that after the commencement of the trial an adjournment of several days was had; that during the adjournment defendant was sick, but expected to be able to proceed with the trial until the morning of the adjourned day, when she discovered that she was unable to do so; that she immediately sent a letter to the judge, stating her condition, and asked an adjournment; that after discovering her condition there was insufficient time to call a physician and obtain his certificate, or an officer to prepare an affidavit. Held to disclose sufficient diligence to justify a new trial, at least in an action for divorce.

3. The acceptance of money by defendant in a divorce case under a prior decree of maintenance does not prevent defendant from assailing the decree of divorce on motion for a new trial.

4. By admitting service of papers on a motion for a new trial by an attorney for defendant without objection, and by serving papers in plaintiff's behalf on such attorney, the objection that the attorney is not the attorney of record is waived.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Peter F. Dunne and Foshay Walker, for appellant. Aylett R. Cotton, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order granting the defendant a new trial. The action was for divorce, the pleadings being verified. The complaint charged extreme cruelty, and all its allegations were specifically denied by defendant in her answer. When the case was called for trial in the lower court the defendant appeared in propria persona, and during several days, while the trial was in actual progress, and up to an adjournment on December 20, 1900, actually conducted the proceedings in her own behalf. At the close of the daily session of the court on December 20th, the evidence thus far being introduced on behalf of plaintiff, the case was continued; the further hearing to be resumed at 10 o'clock December 24th. When the court resumed its session on this later date, the judge announced that he was in receipt of a letter from the defendant stating that she was sick and unable to be present, and that she wished him to continue the trial till some time in 1901. No one was then present, appearing or representing the defendant. The attorney for the plaintiff refused to consent to any further postponement, and objected that there was no sufficient showing to authorize it, and the trial was thereupon proceeded with; resulting, on the same day, in findings and a decree in favor of plaintiff being made and signed by the trial judge. In due course the respondent moved for a new trial on various grounds, but particularly on account of alleged abuse of discretion on the part of the court in refusing to continue the further hearing of the cause, and in proceeding with the trial during her absence while she was sick and unable to attend, and further on account of accident which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, and which precluded her presence in court upon the day to which the adjournment had been had.

Without particularly discussing the evidence presented upon the motion under the affidavits, it unquestionably appears therefrom that after the adjournment of December 20th respondent became sick, and was confined to her bed on the 21st, 22d, and 23d days of December; that on the morning of December 24th, though still ill, she attempted to prepare for her attendance at court, and while doing so she became dizzy, and found herself so weak as to be hardly able to stand; that, realizing she would be unable to reach court, she sent by messenger a letter to the superior judge presiding at the trial, informing him that she was too ill to attend, and asked him to kindly continue the case. Upon this showing the court granted her motion for a new trial, and stated in its order that the motion was granted "upon the sole ground that it appears that defendant was sick, as alleged in her affidavit and in that of Ellen Sexton." While this order is apparently specific enough, as far as it goes, it affords no information as to which particular ground of the motion the new trial was awarded on—whether for abuse of discretion on the part of the court, or because respondent was prevented by unavoidable accident from being present at the resumption of the trial. This, however, we do not deem of particular moment, because, while a vigorous attack is made upon the order, if treated as one granting a new trial for abuse of discretion on the part of the court, on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, and, further, because the point could only be availed of upon a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case, and not by affidavits, yet we think the order can and should be sustained, as being based upon a sufficient showing of providential accident, preventing the attendance of respondent at the further hearing of the case upon adjournment, and for which the Code provides a new trial may be granted.

And while the sufficiency of the showing made by respondent in support of her motion on this ground is also questioned, we think it was sufficient to sustain the order of the court. Under her motion, on this ground, the essential fact to be established was the unavoidable accidental interposition of sickness which prevented her attendance. This was, however, established to the satisfaction of the lower court by the affidavit of respondent and that of her landlady—the only evidence on the point presented at the hearing. Her illness was an unfortunate occurrence, the happening of which she could not prevent, and through the existence of which her rights should not be prejudiced, and it is from a judgment obtained against one under such circumstances that the Code contemplates that relief shall be afforded by granting a new trial. It is insisted, however, that the respondent was wanting in reasonable diligence in calling the attention of the court to the fact of her illness, and her inability to attend at the adjourned hour of trial, both in the method and the manner she adopted; that she should have presented an affidavit, or at least a certificate of a physician, or should have employed an attorney to prepare the necessary moving papers, represent her in court, and ask for a continuance. Undoubtedly this would have been the better course to have pursued, and, in ordinary actions, where the conduct of proceedings are under the control of attorneys familiar with the rules of procedure and the method of preserving rights, would be requisite, but cases may occur where the circumstances show that but little opportunity was afforded a party litigant to adopt this method, which involves some preparation and the lapse of time. Of course, it is no strong excuse that the respondent is not a lawyer, and hence was unfamiliar with methods of procedure, because that fact would not ordinarily relieve her from mistakes concerning rules of practice. But the cases are so exceptional in which a person acts as her own attorney, that, at least in divorce cases, where the policy of the law is to afford a full hearing on both sides, and to relieve the parties from a situation which prevented it, when it would not do so if property rights alone were involved, we think the fact that the defendant was not an attorney, and hence unfamiliar with rules of practice, may be taken into consideration in determining, with the other circumstances in the case, whether reasonable diligence was employed by her in presenting to the court, in the manner she did, the fact of her inability to attend the trial upon the day to which it was adjourned. When you add to this the other facts that, in truth, the respondent was too ill to attend on that day; that she had no attorney; that she had endeavored in the morning to prepare herself to attend court, and only failed to do so because she was too feeble; taking also into consideration the natural distress of mind under which she must necessarily have labored, proceeding from her anxiety to attend court, and her inability to do so; the short time that probably intervened between her discovery that she would not be able to attend and the hour when the session of court commenced, within which to send for and consult with a lawyer, or to have a notary attend in preparation of an affidavit, or to call a physician (she had none in attendance), and obtain his certificate, and that, under these circumstances, and in this situation, she sent the letter to the court, explaining her condition, and asking a postponement of her trial—we think these facts disclose sufficient diligence, at least in an action for divorce, to obviate the objection urged.

In discussing this matter, we have limited our consideration to the rule as applied to actions for divorce. It is a matter of public policy that divorces should only be granted where the fullest opportunity has been afforded both sides to be heard, and then only when adequate cause for divorce is shown. Whether such adequate cause exists can only be disclosed after both sides have had an opportunity to present all their evidence. The public has an interest in having no divorce granted excepting for good cause, and it is this consideration of public interest which has largely entered into the formulation by the courts of a more liberal rule to be applied in relieving from default in divorce cases than applies in other cases, where property rights alone are involved. And while this rule has been applied more particularly in divorce cases, where the application to set aside a judgment by default was under consideration, the principle of public interest is as directly applicable to cases where during the actual trial the party has been precluded by unavoidable accident from presenting her case on the merits, and a motion for a new trial is made in order that she may do so, as in cases where relief from a default judgment is asked when the party had failed to appear at all. In the one case, as in the other, the opportunity has not been given to hear both sides of the case, or to permit the court to determine whether adequate cause for a divorce exists, and the same general condition prevailing the same liberal rule should apply.

In McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 509, 20 Pac. 61, this court said: "The parties to the action are not the only people interested in the result thereof. The public has an interest in the result of every suit for a divorce; the policy and the letter of the law concur in guarding against collusion or fraud; and it should be the aim of the court to afford the fullest possible hearing in such matter." Subsequently, in Wadsworth v. Wadsworth, 81 Cal. 183, 22 Pac. 649, 15 Am. St. Rep. 38, where this court conceded that such negligence upon the part of the defendant appeared as in ordinary actions would entitle her to no relief, it was said: "So far as the divorce awarded to the defendant is concerned, the motion should have been granted under the rule laid down in McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 509, 20 Pac. 61. In that case the court, per Paterson, J., said: 'The parties to the action are not the only people interested in the result thereof. The public has an interest in the result of every suit for a divorce; the policy and the letter of the law concur in guarding against collusion and fraud; and it should be the aim of the court to afford the fullest possible hearing in such matters.' In the present case there seems to have been an honest desire on the part of the plaintiff to present her side of the case, and, while in an ordinary action the negligence shown might be sufficient to deprive her of a right to relief, yet in this kind of a case a more liberal rule should prevail. And we think that the same reasons require the application of a liberal rule to proceedings for the annulment of marriage, and therefore that the judgment should have been set aside as to the whole case." It is true that in both these cases the matter under consideration was relative to setting aside, upon application, judgments by default; but, as we have said, the same principle of public policy which requires that a full hearing in divorce cases should be had, and that a liberal rule to promote that end, as far, at least, as the showing is concerned, should obtain, applies in all cases where the application or motion is made within the statutory time upon the statutory grounds. And while, in the cases we have cited, the court speaks about the policy of the law being to guard against collusion and fraud, its policy is not limited solely to that end. It is as much public policy that divorces should not be granted, unless for adequate cause, as it is that they should not be obtained by collusion and fraud, because in either event they should not be granted at all, and this politic end can be best promoted and attained in the one, as in the other, by the fullest possible hearing.

In concluding this branch of the case, it may be said, as was generally declared in the Wadsworth Case, that there seems to have been an honest desire on the part of the defendant to be present at the trial and present her side of the case, and that, if we assume that in an ordinary action the showing she made might be deemed insufficient to warrant granting her a new trial, yet in this class of cases a more liberal rule should prevail, and the order granting her a new trial, as far, at least, as the objections now under consideration are concerned, should be sustained.

It is further insisted that the order granting the motion for a new trial should be reversed; it being contended that the record shows that respondent received money awarded her by the decree—$600—and hence, upon the principle that, having taken the benefit of the decree, she must bear its burden, she was not entitled to assail the decree on motion for a new trial. But this money was not received under the decree of divorce, but under a decree of maintenance awarded defendant in 1893. In the decree of divorce the court provided that the plaintiff continue to pay the amount provided for in the maintenance decree up to June 15, 1901, when further payment was to cease. This was the money paid defendant, but it was not under the decree of divorce, but under the decree of maintenance, which, by the terms of the decree of divorce, was not to be effective until June 15, 1901.

The further point is made that the notice of intention to move for a new trial is fatally defective because not signed by the attorney who originally appeared of record for the defendant. While it is true that said notice was signed by a different attorney, still it is apparent that any objection upon that ground was waived by appellant, in recognizing and treating the said attorney as representing the defendant on the motion for a new trial, by receiving and admitting service of papers from him in her behalf, without making or reserving any objection on that account at the time, and by serving papers in the appellant's behalf upon such attorney. Upon this subject it is said in Hayne on New Trial & Appeal, p. 59, at close of section 13: "But where the notice is not properly signed, the successful party must reserve his objection on that account at the time it is served upon him, and not treat the notice as sufficient. If he recognizes the attorney giving the notice as the one having authority to give it, he will not afterwards be permitted to question his authority. This is the rule with respect to notices of appeal, and it undoubtedly applies to notices of intention."

These are the only matters upon this appeal requiring attention, and the order appealed from granting a new trial is affirmed.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENT — LIEN—FORECLOSURE —LIS PENDENS — LIMITATIONS — PURCHASE SUBJECT TO LIEN.

1. Code Civ. Proc. § 409, providing that a purchaser of property in litigation shall be affected by the suit only when he purchases after the filing of notice of lis pendens, applies to suits to foreclose the lien of street assessments.

2. By its express terms, Code Civ. Proc. § 1908 (2), providing that a judgment is conclusive between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the action, is applicable only to persons who had notice of the action.

3. Under the statute authorizing enforcement of the lien of a street improvement by suit against the owner, who is defined by St. 1885, p. 159, c. 153, § 16, to be the person in whom record title appears to be, and who, by St. 1889, p. 166, c. 151, § 8, may be designated as "unknown," a suit to foreclose the lien of a street assessment is not a proceeding in rem, so as to make the judgment therein binding on the owner though not made a party.

4. Where, in an action to foreclose the lien of a street improvement, a purchaser of the land was made a party, but the action was afterward dismissed as to him, he was not bound by a judgment that his vendor was the owner of the land.

5. Under Street Improvement Act (St. 1885, p. 155, c. 153) § 9, providing that the lien of a street improvement assessment shall continue two years, the commencement of an action to foreclose within two years does not continue the lien after the expiration of two years as against a purchaser of the property not a party to the foreclosure action.

6. A provision in a deed that the conveyance is subject to any existing lien for street work does not render the vendee liable to the holder of a lien for street improvements.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Francis H. Page against the W. W. Chase Company. There was verdict for plaintiff, and from an order granting a new trial he appeals. Reversed.

Knight & Heggerty and Wm. M. Madden, for appellant. J. C. Bates, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. Action to quiet title. At the trial of the cause it was shown on behalf of the plaintiff that Rosalie M. Schwarze became vested with the title to the land in question on April 20, 1867, and that on March 19, 1900, she conveyed it to the plaintiff by a conveyance which was recorded in the office of the county recorder on April 2, 1900. The habendum clause of the deed contains the following: "Subject to any existing liens for street work." In its answer to the complaint the defendant alleged that on October 26, 1900, the superior court of San Francisco, in an action wherein it was plaintiff and Rosalie M. Schwarze was defendant, had rendered judgment that certain money was due to it, and was a lien upon the said land, and directed a sale thereof for the satisfaction of the lien, and that the said judgment was still in full force. At the trial herein the defendant offered in evidence the judgment roll in that action, from which it appeared that the action was commenced by it May 25, 1899, for the foreclosure of a street assessment against the land, and that Rosalie M. Schwarze, John Doe, and Robert Roe were named as defendants therein; that on October 2, 1900, Rosalie M. Schwarze filed an answer to the complaint therein, in which she disclaimed any interest in the land, and set forth that she had conveyed the same to the plaintiff herein on March 20, 1900, and that her said conveyance was recorded April 2, 1900, in the office of the county recorder; that the action was brought on for trial October 26, 1900, and that the court then ordered the defendants sued by the fictitious names of John Doe and Richard Roe dismissed therefrom, and gave judgment, which was duly entered of record, declaring a certain amount of money to be a lien against the said land, and directing its sale for the satisfaction thereof; that on September 18, 1900, prior to the filing of an answer by said Rosalie, the plaintiff herein was served with a copy of summons and complaint in said suit as and for John Doe, named as one of the defendants therein; that on November 13, 1900, he filed a demurrer to said complaint, which was sustained by the court on November 16th; that notice thereof was on the same day served on the plaintiff therein; that said plaintiff failed to amend its complaint, and that on November 30, 1900, the court gave its judgment, which was duly entered of record, by which it dismissed the action as to the plaintiff herein. The plaintiff then testified that he had no knowledge of the pendency of that action until the service of the summons and complaint therein upon him as John Doe on September 18, 1900. The defendant herein did not allege in its answer, nor was it shown at the trial, that a notice of lis pendens was filed in the recorder's office at the time the action against Schwarze was commenced, or at any time thereafter. The street assessment upon which the action was brought is shown by said complaint to have become a lien upon the land May 25, 1897, that being the date upon which it is alleged that the warrant and assessment were recorded by the superintendent of streets. Upon the foregoing facts judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff, and thereafter, upon motion of the defendant, the court granted a new trial. From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

It does not appear upon what ground the court made the order appealed from. In its notice of intention to move for a new trial the defendant stated as grounds therefor insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and errors of law occurring at the trial; but it is not claimed that there was any conflict in the evidence upon any probative fact in the case, or that the existence of such fact depended upon the weight which the court might give to testimony thereon. The question to which counsel have directed the attention of the court in their briefs upon this appeal, and which underlies the respective rights of the parties to the action, is the effect of the judgment in the street assessment suit upon the title acquired by the plaintiff from Mrs. Schwarze. If he took the title from her in subordination to the judgment to be thereafter rendered in that action, the defendant's right to the land is superior to his. On the other hand, if the title then taken by him would not be affected by that judgment, it is superior to that of the defendant.

1. The rule of the common law that a purchaser pendente lite of the subject of the controversy took as a volunteer or intruder, and in subordination to the judgment thereafter rendered in the action, is not in force in this state. In lieu thereof, section 409, Code Civ. Proc., authorizes the plaintiff in any action affecting the title to real property to file in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the property is situated a notice of the pendency of the action, and declares that "from the time of filing such notice for record only shall a purchaser or incumbrancer of the property affected thereby be deemed to have constructive notice of the pendency of the action." "The general rule is that one not a party to a suit is not affected by the judgment. The exception at common law is that a pendente lite purchaser, though not a party, was so affected. The qualification of the doctrine made by our statute is that such purchaser is not affected unless notice of such lis pendens be filed with the recorder." Richardson v. White, 18 Cal. 103. The proposition of the respondent that this section is not applicable to an action for the foreclosure of the lien of a street assessment cannot be maintained. No authority is cited in support of the proposition, and such action is as fully included within the terms of the section as is an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage or of any other lien. See McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 55, 53 Pac. 421. The decision in Reeve v. Kennedy, 43 Cal. 643, cited by the respondent, was made by virtue of an express provision in the statute under which the proceedings involved in that action were had that the lien of the tax should not be removed until the taxes were paid or the property had absolutely vested in a purchaser under a sale for the taxes, and the court held that "the precise object of these provisions was to subordinate to the lien of the judgment all rights acquired by purchasers intermediate the assessment and the rendition of the judgment." The provision in section 1908(2), Code Civ. Proc., that a judgment is conclusive with respect to the matter directly adjudged between the parties and their successors in interest by title subsequent to the commencement of the action, is by the concluding clause of the section applicable only to those cases where the parties have had "notice actual or constructive of the pendency of the action." In Wood v. Jordan, 125 Cal. 261, 57 Pac. 997, and in Crane v. Cummings, 137 Cal. 201, 69 Pac. 984, cited by the respondent, the grantors in the deeds there discussed were named as defendants in the street assessment suits, and were served with the summons therein, and the conveyances were not made by them until after judgment had been entered against them. In Archbishop v. Shipman, 69 Cal. 586, 11 Pac. 343, the plaintiff alleged that, as he was not named as a party to the street assessment suit, he was not bound by the judgment therein; and all that the court decided was that under the allegations of his complaint he had not shown any equitable ground for restraining the enforcement of the judgment against the parties against whom it had been rendered.

2. An action for the foreclosure of the lien of a street assessment is not a proceeding in rem, as contended by the respondent, except in the sense that the amount of the lien can be collected only out of the amount of the property involved in the action. It is not a proceeding wherein a judgment for the sale of the property will bind the entire world, or affect the interest therein of any owner except those who are made parties defendant in the action. There can be no proceeding in rem except it be authorized by statute, and in such a proceeding the res which is to be affected thereby is the defendant, and must be brought before the court either by seizure or by publication of notice. Unless notice of the proceeding is in some form given to the owner of the res, and an opportunity afforded him to defend the same, a judgment for its sale would have the effect to deprive him of his property without due process of law. The lien of a street assessment—like any other tax—is to be enforced only in the mode and to the extent authorized by the Legislature. See Thompson v. Boskowitz (Cal.) 78 Pac. 290. In this state the Legislature has authorized its enforcement by means of a suit in equity against the "owner" of the land; and in section 16 of the street improvement act (St. 1885, p. 159, c. 153) the "owner" is defined to be, for the purposes of that act, the person owning the fee, or in whom appears the legal title to the land by deeds recorded in the county recorder's office of the county. There is no provision that the land shall be made the defendant in such action, or that service of process shall be made upon it, as was provided by the statute involved in Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477, 91 Am. Dec. 595, and other cases cited in Crall v. Poso Irrigation District, 87 Cal. 148, 26 Pac. 797, invoked by the respondent upon this point. Under section 8 of the act (St. 1889, p. 166, c. 151), if the name of the owner is unknown to the superintendent of streets, the owner is to be designated in the assessment as "unknown," but it would not be contended that the contractor could select any person he might choose as the defendant in his action, and bind the land by the judgment therein as against its actual owner as defined in section 16.

3. The finding and judgment of the court in the street assessment suit that Mrs. Schwarze was the sole owner of the land involved therein at the time of commencing the action and at all times mentioned in the complaint therein is not conclusive upon the plaintiff herein. He was not named as a party to that action, and although he was served with the summons and complaint therein as John Doe, named as a fictitious defendant, he was dismissed from the action before the judgment was rendered. After he had been served with process in the suit, the plaintiff therein was informed by the answer filed by Mrs. Schwarze that he had succeeded to her interest in the land many months prior thereto, and if he had been retained as a party defendant, and judgment had been rendered against him, his interest in the land so derived would have been bound by the judgment; but instead thereof the plaintiff caused him to be dismissed from the action, and took judgment against Mrs. Schwarze alone. The effect of this proceeding was the same as if the action had been originally brought against her alone. It is unnecessary to determine whether it was competent for the court, after such dismissal, to take any action upon the demurrer which he had previously filed, or whether its action in sustaining his demurrer or its judgment dismissing the action against him is entitled to any consideration. In either case, whether by reason of his previous dismissal from the case, or by reason of the dismissal of the action as against him, he ceased to be a party to the suit, and is not bound by the judgment therein. There was therefore no constructive notice to the plaintiff of the street assessment suit at the time he purchased the land and took the conveyance from Mrs. Schwarze, and as he testified at the trial that he had no knowledge of the pendency of the suit until he was served with the summons and complaint therein in September—nearly six months after receiving the conveyance—he is to be regarded as an innocent purchaser, and it must be held that the title then acquired by him is not affected by the judgment therein against Mrs. Schwarze.

4. The assessment upon which the action was brought became a lien upon the land May 25, 1897, and by section 9 of the street improvement act (St. 1885, p. 155, c. 153) this lien continued for two years. At the time the plaintiff herein purchased the land from Mrs. Schwarze more than two years had elapsed since the date of the lien, and he therefore took the title discharged therefrom. The contention of the respondent that because the action upon the assessment was commenced within the two years the lien continued as against the appellant cannot be maintained. Randolph v. Bayue, 44 Cal. 367, and the cases following it, cited by defendant, do not support this proposition. All that was decided in those cases is that, as against the defendants in the action, the lien does not expire during the pendency of the action if it is commenced within the life of the lien. As in the case of any other lien, the commencement of an action for its foreclosure suspends the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the defendants in the action; but it continues to run so far as others are concerned.

5. The title of the plaintiff is not affected by the judgment against Mrs. Schwarze by reason of the provision in her conveyance to him "subject to any existing lien for street work." The evident purpose of this clause in her conveyance was to relieve her from any liability by reason of the implied covenant against incumbrances. The principle which renders a clause in the conveyance of land whereby the grantee assumes the payment of an existing mortgage or other lien thereon available to the holder of the lien is that he thereby takes the place of his grantor in reference to the obligation secured by the land, and creates an equity in favor of the mortgagee by which the latter may enforce the obligation against him to the same extent that he can enforce it as against his grantor. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868. The obligation thus assumed by him is, however, only such obligation as exists against his grantor, and is only an agreement for his indemnity. Biddel v. Brizzolara, 64 Cal. 354, 30 Pac. 609. It can be enforced only by foreclosure, and is limited to the amount for which a deficiency judgment can be docketed after the sale of the mortgaged premises. Roberts v. Fitzallen, 120 Cal. 482, 52 Pac. 818. If there is no personal liability on the part of his grantor, there can be no deficiency judgment rendered, and consequently the rule has no application. Ward v. De Oca, 120 Cal. 102, 52 Pac. 130. As there is no personal liability for a street assessment, there can be no deficiency judgment in an action for its foreclosure. Moreover, the language of the aforesaid clause in the conveyance to the plaintiff is not such as would render him personally liable for

MEACHAM v. BEAR VALLEY IRR. CO.

(L. A. 19,564.)

EJECTMENT — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY — JUDGMENT — PENALTY FOR VIOLATION OF RULES OF COURT—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTE — OFFICIAL REPORTER—PER DIEM—PAYMENT IN ADVANCE.

1. A judgment against defendant in ejectment, rendered as a penalty for failure to comply with a rule of court requiring half of the official reporter's per diem to be paid by each party before the witnesses are examined, is repugnant to the constitutional inhibition against the deprivation of property without due process of law.

2. Such judgment is also unwarranted by Code Civ. Proc. § 274, as amended (Amendment of Codes 1880, Code Civ. Proc. p. 54), providing that the reporter's fees for taking notes in civil cases shall be paid by the party in whose favor a judgment is rendered, and taxed up by the clerk of the court as costs against the party against whom judgment is rendered.

3. A complaint in ejectment alleging that at the time of the commencement of the action the plaintiff was the owner of, and in possession of, the entire tract of land sued for, and that for about one year prior thereto the defendant "had been, and now is," unlawfully in possession, without any right or title, of a described portion thereof, is demurrable for ambiguity.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; John L. Campbell, Judge.

Action by Harry D. Meacham against the Bear Valley Irrigation Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

G. E. Harpham, for appellant. Chas. J. Perkins, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. Action for the recovery of real property in the county of San Bernardino. A trial by jury of the issues in the above-entitled action was waived by the parties, and when the cause came on for trial the plaintiff's counsel read the verified complaint and answer, and called a witness to the stand, who was duly sworn by the clerk, whereupon the court made the following order: "This cause having been called for trial, and the pleadings read, and under the rule of court the parties were requested to deposit with the clerk each one-half of the reporter's per diem, to abide the result of this suit, and the reporter refusing to report the testimony unless the fees are paid, and the defendant refusing to comply with the order of the court, and the court deeming that this is a case where it is necessary to have a reporter, as it involves the examination of several witnesses orally, it is therefore ordered that the defendant deposit the fee of the reporter within five minutes, or a judgment will go for plaintiff, as prayed for." The defendant's counsel thereupon stated to the court that the defendant had no money with which to comply with the direction, and that he excepted to the order. Prior to this time the superior court of that county had adopted a rule, which was then in force, fixing the compensation of its official reporter at $7 per day, and declaring that "the per diem herein fixed shall, upon the opening of court and before the taking of notes by the reporter, be deposited, one-half thereof by the respective parties, with the clerk of the court for the use and benefit of said reporters, said amount to be thereafter taxed as costs by the party in whose favor judgment is rendered." Upon the expiration of the time named in the order, and the defendant having failed to deposit the reporter's fee as required by the order, the court, without any trial of the cause, ordered judgment to be entered in favor of the plaintiff, and thereupon judgment was entered in his favor for the recovery from the defendant of the possession of the property described in the complaint. From the judgment thus entered, the defendant has appealed.

The judgment thus entered by the court cannot be sustained. It was not within the power of the court to render a judgment giving to the plaintiff the right to property of which the defendant was in possession, without any evidence of such right, or affording to the defendant an opportunity to reply to whatever evidence the plaintiff might adduce. The failure or refusal of a defendant to pay the costs of an action, or any portion thereof, in advance of a trial, does not authorize the court to deprive him of his defense to the action. The guaranty of the Constitution that he shall not be deprived of his property without due process of law gives him the right to be heard in its defense against any claim that may be made against him for its possession, and he is not to be deprived of this right as a penalty for failing to comply with some rule of court. See Foley v. Foley, 120 Cal. 33, 52 Pac. 122, 65 Am. St. Rep. 147; Younger v. Superior Court, 136 Cal. 682, 69 Pac. 485. Not only has the Legislature not attempted to vest the court with such authority, but in section 274, Code Civ. Proc., under which the reporter's right to compensation is derived, as that section stood at the time the judgment herein was rendered (Amendments of Codes 1880, Code Civ. Proc. p. 54), the Legislature has expressly declared: "The reporter's fees for taking notes in civil cases shall be paid by the party in whose favor judgment is rendered and shall be taxed up by the clerk of the court as costs against the party against whom judgment is rendered." The amendment of this section in 1885 (St. 1885, p. 218, c. 167), requiring each party to pay the reporter's per diem before judgment or verdict is entered, was held unconstitutional. See Stevens v. Truman, 127 Cal. 155, 59 Pac. 397. If, upon the refusal of the defendant to comply with the order of the court, the plaintiff had desired a trial of the cause, he could have deposited with the clerk the whole of the reporter's per diem, and, if he had obtained judgment, included the amount in his cost bill, but he was not authorized to take judgment in his favor without a trial of the issues. In Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488, it was held that if the plaintiff, after demanding a jury, did not comply with a rule of the court requiring a deposit of the jury fee, the court did not err in refusing his demand and trying the case without a jury; but there is nothing in the opinion therein which justifies the action of the court in rendering a judgment without any trial.

The court also erred in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The complaint alleges that at the time of the commencement of the action the plaintiff was the owner of, and in possession of, the entire tract of land therein described; and it also alleged that for about one year prior thereto the defendant "had been, and now is," unlawfully in the possession, without any right or title, of a portion of the above-described premises, and unlawfully withholds the same from the plaintiff—describing the portion so withheld. The defendant demurred to the complaint for ambiguity, pointing out in its demurrer these averments as the particulars in which it was ambiguous, and its demurrer should have been sustained.

The judgment should be reversed.

Jesse W. Lilienthal and E. B. Martinelli, for appellant. Thos. P. Boyd and Jas. Alva Watt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. A demurrer of defendant county of Marin to the complaint for want of jurisdiction, and an insufficiency of stated facts to constitute a cause of action, was sustained without leave to amend, and judgment rendered for said defendant. From this judgment plaintiff appeals. The material averments of the complaint, which presents a proceeding in eminent domain, are that the plaintiff is a corporation engaged in the business of supplying the inhabitants of Marin county with pure and fresh water; that defendant county of Marin is a body corporate and a political division of the state; that, in order that plaintiff may exercise its public use of supplying water as aforesaid it is necessary for it to construct and maintain a dam and reservoir at a certain point, and to take certain described property for the purpose of flooding and permanently covering the same with water by means of said dam and reservoir. It is further averred that the title in fee to said premises is in plaintiff, but that they are "subject to an easement in favor of defendant county of Marin for the uses of a highway, and that the premises sought to be taken herein are a part of the highway or road sometimes called the 'Fairfax and Bolinas Bay Road.'" It is further averred that the public use for which the property is sought to be taken "is a more necessary public use than that to which it is now appropriated" for certain reasons stated. And it is further averred that defendant county of Marin has refused to vacate the part of the road sought to be taken, or to fix any terms upon which it will consent to permit plaintiff to acquire or have the use thereof. The prayer is that it may be adjudged that plaintiff have the right to take and hold the said premises for the alleged public use upon its making compensation to be ascertained, etc.

The question presented is an important one, and we do not know of any former decision of this court in which it has arisen or been determined. After a full consideration of the subject, we have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff has the right to the judgment of condemnation prayed for, if it can prove the averments of the complaint; and that, therefore, the demurrer was improperly sustained. It may be conceded that the right of a person, natural or artificial, to exercise the power of eminent domain, must be found in some statutory provision. The two provisions of law which are mainly important here are section 1237 and the first three subdivisions of section 1240 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1237 is as follows: "Eminent domain is the right of the people or government to take private property for public use. This right may be exercised in the manner provided in this title." It is contended by respondent that this definition of eminent domain confines it to private property; that this definition attaches to and qualifies all subsequent provisions; and that the property sought to be taken in the case at bar is not private property, and therefore not within the reach of the power of eminent domain. But section 1240, to and including subdivision 3, is as follows: "The private property which may be taken under this act includes: (1) All real property belonging to any person. (2) Lands belonging to this state, or to any county, incorporated city, or city and county, village, or town, not appropriated to some public use. (3) Property appropriated to public use; but such property shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has been already appropriated." These provisions of section 1240 describe and enumerate the kinds of property which, for the purpose of the exercise of eminent domain, shall be deemed to be private property, and "which may be taken under this act," and in subdivision 3 there is placed in this category, without qualification, "property appropriated to public use." Therefore property appropriated to public use—which includes the property involved in the case at bar—"may be taken" unless the particular property sought to be taken in a given case is excepted and excluded by some other provision. There is such an exception in subdivision 2, which provides that lands belonging to the state or a municipality can be taken only when the land had not already been "appropriated to some public use." In the case at bar the land which had been appropriated to a prior public use did not belong to the county of Marin, or to any other municipality; it belonged to appellant. There is here, then, presented the case of land belonging to a private person which had been appropriated to a public use, and which, under said subdivision 3, may be taken "for a more necessary public use than that to which it has been already appropriated."

Counsel on each side have given instances where unjust or mischievous consequences would follow from the view of the law opposite to that contended by them. The consequences which would follow any particular decision are hardly legitimate arguments to be considered in determining what the law is; but one or two of them may be noticed. Counsel for respondent say that, if appellant's view be sustained, then, for instance, a public square or park or schoolhouse might be taken by a private person or corporation under the power of eminent domain. But this apprehension is practically answered by subdivision 2 of section 1240, which provides that lands belonging to the state or to a municipality which have been already appropriated to a public use cannot be taken under eminent domain for another public use. On the other hand, it is said that, if a public road can, in no instance, be taken for a more necessary public use, then a city desirous of establishing waterworks, or a company furnishing water to a city, could not acquire and maintain dams and reservoirs in another county, no matter how necessary they might be, if a public road, though of little use, happened to run through part of the land necessary to be taken. However, whatever consequences may flow from any particular view, we must declare the law to be as we find it; and, considering all the provisions of the Code together as they stand, we think that the law on the subject is as above stated. The Legislature has always the power to change the law when experience shows that a change is necessary. We do not think that the provisions of the Political Code giving the board of supervisors certain general powers as to laying out and closing public roads have any bearing on the question here involved.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

PEOPLE v. COLEMAN. (Cr. 1,181.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INCREASE OF PUNISHMENT ON SUBSEQUENT CONVICTIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATUTES.

1. The increase in the penalty on subsequent convictions of the same person for crime, required by Pen. Code, § 666, does not punish accused twice for the same offense.

2. Pen. Code, § 666, provides for increasing the punishment of criminals on subsequent convictions. Section 988 provides that the arraignment must be made by the court, or by the clerk or district attorney under its direction, and consists in reading the indictment or information to the defendant, and delivering to him a copy thereof and of the indorsements thereon, including the list of witnesses, and asking him whether he pleads guilty or not guilty to the indictment or information. Section 1158 provides that whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged, the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty of the offense with which he is charged, must also, unless the answer of the defendant admits the charge, find whether he has suffered such previous conviction, and that their verdict shall be whether the charge of previous conviction is true or false. Held, that a contention that it is a discrimination and destruction of the uniform operation of the general laws in the trial of a case, where a former conviction is relied on to increase the penalty for the offense for which defendant is being tried, that the jury is prejudiced in advance from the fact of the reading of the indictment charging him with the previous conviction, and that thereby defendant is compelled to be a witness against himself, is untenable, in view of section 1093, directing that after the jury is impaneled and sworn in felony cases the indictment or information shall be read to the jury, the defendant's plea stated, and that where a previous conviction is charged, and the defendant has confessed the same, the clerk in reading the indictment shall omit therefrom all that relates to the previous conviction.

3. Under the statutes, in a case where a defendant charged with robbery and a previous conviction for the same offense is arraigned and tried in the same manner as any other defendant who has suffered a previous conviction to which a plea of not guilty is entered, followed by verdict of guilty and sentence for the crime charged with a previous conviction of robbery, there is not a deprivation of liberty without due process of law, within the direct inhibition of Const. U. S. Amend. art. 14.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Adam Dixon Warner, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., R. C. Van Fleet, and E. B. Power, for the People.

VAN DYKE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment sentencing the defendant to 15 years in the penitentiary for the crime of robbery, with a former conviction of robbery. The information alleged a prior conviction of robbery on the 11th day of March, 1892, and the new offense of robbery committed on the 25th day of November, 1903. On the arraignment of the defendant he stood mute as to said prior conviction of robbery as charged in said information, and the plea of not guilty was entered on the record by the clerk, whereupon the defendant entered a plea of not guilty of robbery as charged in the information, as committed on the 25th day of November, 1903.

The appeal is taken on the ground that the defendant did not have a fair and impartial trial, as intended by the Constitution of the United States and of the state of California, for the reason that the trial was conducted under the provisions of sections 666, 988, and 1158 of the Penal Code. These sections read as follows:

"Sec. 666. Second Offense, How Punished After Conviction of Former Offense. Every person who, having been convicted of petit larceny, or of any offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, commits any crime after such conviction, is punishable therefor as follows: (1) If the offense of which such person is subsequently convicted is such that, upon a first conviction, an offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for any term exceeding ten years, such person is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than ten years. (2) If the subsequent offense is such that upon a first conviction, the offender would be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for five years, or any less term, then the person convicted of such subsequent offense, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding ten years. (3) If the subsequent conviction is for petit larceny, then the person convicted of such subsequent offense is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years."

"Sec. 988. Arraignment, How Made. The arraignment must be made by the court, or by the clerk or district attorney under its direction, and consists in reading the indictment or information to the defendant and delivering to him a copy thereof, and of the indorsements thereon, including the list of witnesses, and asking him whether he pleads guilty or not guilty to the indictment or information."

"Sec. 1158. Jury May Find Upon Charge of Previous Conviction. Whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged in an indictment or information, the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty of the offense with which he is charged, must also, unless the answer of the defendant admits the charge, find whether or not he has suffered such previous conviction. The verdict of the jury upon a charge of previous conviction may be: 'We find the charge of previous conviction true,' or, 'We find the charge of previous conviction not true,' as they find that the defendant has or has not suffered such conviction."

Similar provisions have been contained in the statutes of various states for many years, and they have been uniformly sustained by the courts. Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 676, 16 Sup. Ct. 179, 40 L. Ed. 301. Penal laws are not so much for the punishment of the offender as for the protection of society, and experience has shown that the persistent and hardened offender is more dangerous to society than a person who has committed but one offense, and that a severer punishment is demanded in such case, the better to protect society. Appellant's counsel in his reply brief says: "It may be admitted that the prior conviction constitutes the subsequent violation of the law an 'aggravated offense,' for that, we may admit, is the meaning and intent and the force and effect of section 666, with which we have no quarrel." But he claims that this matter of aggravation is for the information of the court alone, and with which the jury has no concern and nothing to do. It may be replied to this that the former conviction is a fact, and a very important one, which constitutes or goes to make up this aggravated offense, and, being a material fact in the case, necessarily it must be pleaded; and if issue be joined in reference thereto, either by plea of not guilty or by standing mute, which amounts to the same thing under the Penal Code, that material fact must be proven as any other material fact in the trial of the cause. In People v. King, 64 Cal. 340, 30 Pac. 1029, in a like case, this court says: "But the charge of the previous conviction which entered into and made part of the aggravated offense was one to which the accused had the right to plead, and for which he had the right to be tried as in other cases. In such a case he is not being tried for a separate offense as intimated by appellant's counsel, but, as already stated, the fact of the former conviction is a part of the offense upon which he is being tried." In People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 114, 17 Am. Rep. 401, it was claimed, as here, that if the punishment for the second offense be increased because of a prior conviction for another offense the accused would be twice punished for the same offense, to which this court replies: "The ready answer to the proposition is that he is not again punished for the first offense, but the punishment for the second is increased, because by his persistence in the perpetration of crime he has evinced a depravity which merits a greater punishment, and hence to be restrained by severer penalties, than if it were his first offense." It is again contended on behalf of the appellant that it is a discrimination and destruction of the uniform operation of the general laws in the trial of a case like this, and that the jury is prejudiced in advance from the fact of the reading of the indictment charging him with the previous conviction, and that thereby defendant is compelled to be a witness against himself. To this it might be replied that the defendant has it in his power to avoid bringing before the jury the fact of a previous conviction, by confessing such previous conviction at the time of the arraignment before the court. Section 1093 of the Penal Code directs that, after the jury is impaneled and sworn, the indictment or information is read to the jury, "and in cases where it charges a previous conviction, and the defendant has confessed the same, the clerk in reading it shall omit therefrom all that relates to such previous conviction."

The provisions of the Penal Code and the practice thereunder in reference to cases of previous convictions are not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States or of this state.

In Moore v. Missouri, supra, the indictment charged that defendant, on the 11th day of January, 1877, in the city of St. Louis, in the criminal court therein, was duly convicted of the offense of grand larceny, and was sentenced by said court to imprisonment in the penitentiary for the term of three years, and was duly imprisoned in said penitentiary accordingly, and that thereafter he committed the offense of burglary and grand larceny on May 26, 1893. On being arraigned he pleaded not guilty. Among the grounds assigned on his motion for arrest of judgment was that the first offense was not included in the last offense, but was a separate and distinct offense, and that the statute upon which the indictment was founded was unconstitutional and void, in that it violated the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution, and the bill of rights of the Constitution of Missouri, in that it prescribed a second punishment for the same offense, and a different punishment for different persons for committing said offenses. The Supreme Court, however, held that these contentions were untenable; that the accused was not again punished for the same offense. "The punishment is for the last offense committed, and it is rendered more severe in consequence of the situation into which the party had previously brought himself." Citing with approval Ross' Case, 2 Pick. 165; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 17 Am. Rep. 401; Plumbly v. Commonwealth, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 413; Johnson v. People, 55 N. Y. 519; and a great number of other cases from various states.

In People v. Sickles, 156 N. Y. 548, 51 N. E. 290, 291, it is said in the opinion of the court: "Reason suggests that the persistent and hardened offender needs a severer punishment. The previous punishment having failed to reform him, his guilt, upon his further offending, is greater, and, being so, severer treatment is needed to compel him to reform his ways, and in furtherance of the effort to prevent crime. In enacting that, upon a conviction for a second offense, the punishment shall be one of greater severity, the Legislature has acted in accordance with the dictates of a wise policy and has invaded no constitutional right. How can it be said that the defendant has not had due process of law? The statute announced the enhanced penalty which he would incur by repeating his infraction of the laws against crime. The indictment charged him with the aggravated crime, and he was put upon his trial, under the charge of being for a second time an offender, and therefore liable to suffer a severer punishment. His sentence was pronounced after he had been tried and found guilty by the verdict of a jury. The course of the administration of justice was regular in all respects. When it is said that the presumption of the defendant's innocence was destroyed by the introduction of proof of his former conviction the proposition is based upon mere assumption, and it is the error in that assumption which affects the appellant's argument. The statute has not abrogated the rule as to the presumption of innocence."

The scope and meaning of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution were considered in In re Kemmler, 136 U. S. 436, 10 Sup. Ct. 930, 34 L. Ed. 519. The Supreme Court says in that case: "The fourteenth amendment did not radically change the whole theory of the relations of the state and federal governments to each other and of both governments to the people. The same person may be at the same time a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a state. Protection to life, liberty, and property rests primarily with the states, and the amendment furnishes an additional guaranty against any encroachment by the states upon those fundamental rights which belong to citizenship, and which the state governments were created to secure. The privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, as distinguished from the privileges and immunities of citizens of the states, are indeed protected by it; but those are privileges and immunities arising out of the nature and essential character of the national government, and granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States." Citing a number of former decisions by the same court. And again, in Leeper v. Texas, 139 U. S. 467, 11 Sup. Ct. 577, 35 L. Ed. 225, it is said "that by the fourteenth amendment the powers of states in dealing with crime within their borders are not limited, except that no state can deprive particular persons, or classes of persons, of equal and impartial justice under the law; that law in its regular course of administration through courts of justice is due process, and when secured by the law of the state the constitutional requirement is satisfied; and that due process is so secured by laws operating on all alike, and not subjecting the individual to the arbitrary exercise of the powers of government unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice." Citing a number of cases.

The defendant in this case, as appears from the record, was arraigned and tried in the same manner as any other defendant who has suffered a previous conviction is arraigned and tried, and therefore he was not discriminated against or deprived of due process of law, as shown by the decisions already cited and many others from the various states that might be cited to the same effect.

Judgment affirmed.

SHEEHAN v. SCOTT. (S. F. 2,309.)

STATES—LEGISLATIVE POWER—CONSTITUTION—CONSTRUCTION — DELEGATIONS — MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — CHARTERS — OFFICERS — QUALIFICATIONS — TAX COLLECTOR — RESIDENCE—EVIDENCE — INTENTION — FINDINGS —APPEAL.

1. Under San Francisco City Charter (St. 1899, p. 274, art. 4, c. 5, § 1), providing for the election of a tax collector, who shall be an elector of the city and county at the time of his election, and who must have been such for at least five years next preceding such time, a person elected to such office, who had not been an elector of such city and county for five years next preceding the time the votes were cast for him, was ineligible.

2. Const. art. 4, § 1, vesting the legislative power of the state in a Senate and Assembly, includes all legislative power of the state, the exercise of which is not expressly prohibited to the Legislature or conferred on some other body.

3. Though the Legislature can never increase or diminish the constitutional qualifications prescribed for eligibility to any of the offices created by such instrument, it may prescribe additional qualifications for all offices which it is authorized to establish.

4. Const. art. 11, § 6, prohibiting the Legislature from creating municipalities by special laws, and section 8, giving to certain cities the right to frame charters for their own government, which, if approved by the Legislature, shall become the organic act of such cities and supersede inconsistent laws, withdrew from the state Senate and Assembly the legislative authority of the state with reference to municipal government for such cities until after the proposed charter was prepared for submission, and then limited such authority to the mere approval or rejection of the charter formulated.

5. The authority so withdrawn and conferred on such cities is none the less a part of the lawmaking power of the state because contained in the article on "Cities, Counties and Towns," rather than in the article on "Legislative Department."

6. San Francisco City Charter (St. 1899, p. 274, art. 4, c. 5, § 1), requiring a person to have been an elector of the city and county for five years at the time of his election, in order to be eligible to the office of tax collector, is not unconstitutional, as beyond the power of the state Legislature and the legislative department of the city, in prescribing additional qualifications for office to those prescribed for constitutional offices.

7. A determination by the superior court of an issue of fact on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

8. In an election contest for the office of city tax collector, evidence held to justify a finding that defendant had not been a resident of the city for five years next prior to his election, as required by San Francisco City Charter (St. 1899, p. 274, art. 4, c. 5, § 1), and was therefore ineligible.

9. Evidence of defendant's intention to take up his place of abode in a certain city, unaccompanied with acts calculated to carry such intention into effect, other than the mere placing of his wife in the home of her father, in such city, and defendant's occasional visits to her, was insufficient to establish his residence in such city.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Edward I. Sheehan against Joseph H. Scott. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wal. J. Tuska and A. Ruef, for appellant. G. W. McEnerney and Jno. S. Drum, for respondent.

HARRISON, C. At the municipal election held in San Francisco November 7, 1899, the appellant received a plurality of all the votes cast for the office of tax collector of said city and county, and thereafter the board of election commissioners declared him to have been elected to said office for the term of two years from the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1900, and issued to him a certificate of election therefor. The respondent herein—an elector of said city and county—contested his right to the office upon the ground that, under the provisions of the charter of San Francisco, he was not at the time of his election eligible to such office, and on December 22, 1899, filed with the county clerk a verified statement setting forth the particular grounds of such contest. Upon the hearing thereof the superior court found that from the 1st day of January, 1893, until subsequent to the 1st day of January, 1895, the appellant was an inhabitant, resident, and elector of the county of Santa Clara, and was not an inhabitant, resident, or elector of the city and county of San Francisco; that he was not an elector of said city and county for five years next preceding the date of the election held on November 7, 1899, nor for five years next preceding the first Monday after the 1st day of January, 1900, and that he was not at any time during the years 1893, 1894, or 1895, until subsequent to the 1st day of April, 1895, an inhabitant or resident of San Francisco for a period of 90 days, and was not an elector of said city and county until after April 1, 1895, and thereupon held that he was not eligible to the said office of tax collector, and was not duly elected to said office, and rendered judgment annulling and setting aside his said election, and canceling the certificate of election issued to him. From this judgment the present appeal has been taken.

The charter of San Francisco was framed by a board of freeholders elected therefor, and was approved by the Legislature January 26, 1899. St. 1899, p. 241. Section 1, c. 5, art. 4, declares (page 274): "There shall be a tax collector of the city and county, who shall be an elector of the city and county at the time of his election, and who must have been such for at least five years next preceding such time." Under this provision of the charter, unless the candidate for the office has the qualifications thus named "at the time of his election," he is not capable of being elected thereto, and will not be entitled to hold the office, even though he receive a majority of the votes cast at the election. The rule declared in Searcy v. Grow, 15 Cal. 118, that, if a person is not eligible at the time the votes were cast for him, he will not be entitled to hold the office by reason of becoming subsequently qualified, has never been modified in this state. In Ward v. Crowell, 142 Cal. 587, 76 Pac. 491, and in State v. Van Beek, 87 Iowa, 569, 54 N. W. 525, 19 L. R. A. 622, 43 Am. St. Rep. 397, cited therein, the statute provided certain qualifications for holding the office, but none for rendering the candidate eligible to it.

The appellant, however, urges that the provision in the charter requiring him to have had such qualification for five years next preceding the election is unconstitutional; that it is not competent for the Legislature to prescribe any other qualifications for eligibility to an office than are prescribed in the Constitution as the qualifications of an elector; and that, even if it be conceded that this power exists in the Legislature, a municipality, which is but a subordinate creature of the Legislature, has not such power. The express declaration in section 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of this state, that "the legislative power of the state shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly," includes all the legislative power of the state whose exercise is not expressly prohibited to the Legislature or conferred upon some other body. In the face of this declaration, there can be no implication of the absence or nonexistence of such power, but whoever would claim that the power does not exist in any particular case, or has been improperly exercised, must point out the provision of the Constitution which has taken it away or forbidden its exercise. "The Constitution of this state is not to be considered as a grant of power, but rather as a restriction upon the powers of the Legislature; and it is competent for the Legislature to exercise all powers not forbidden by the Constitution of the state, or delegated to the general government, or prohibited by the Constitution of the United States." People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 46, 60 Am. Dec. 581.

It is not contended by the appellant that the Constitution contains any express inhibition upon the Legislature against prescribing qualifications for the officers whose appointment or election it may authorize, but he contends that the designation in the Constitution of the qualifications of certain officers named therein creates an implication therefrom that in all other cases no other qualification shall be required than those of an elector. It may be admitted that the Legislature can neither increase nor diminish the qualifications which the Constitution has prescribed for eligibility to any of the offices created by that instrument; but for all offices which the Legislature may authorize or establish, either by virtue of express authority therefor in the Constitution itself, or by virtue of its general legislative authority, it may prescribe such qualifications as, in its judgment, will best accord with public policy or subserve the interests of those affected thereby. That it is of public advantage that an officer shall be acquainted with the duties of his office needs no argument, and it is equally evident that the interests of a community will be better understood and subserved by one who has been identified with that community for a reasonable period of time than by a stranger, or by one whose introduction therein has been of recent date. Whether such qualifications shall be required, as well as their character and extent, and the particular offices for which they shall be required, are matters entirely of legislative policy. Such legislation is frequently found upon the statute book, and by section 54 of the county government act (Gen. Laws 1903, p. 143) itself the district attorney is required to have been admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of this state.

The authority to provide a municipal government for a city is referable to the lawmaking power of the state, and the enactment of the charter for a municipality is a legislative act. By section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution, the people have prohibited the Legislature of this state from creating municipalities by special laws; and by section 8 of the same article they have given to any city having a certain population the right to frame a charter for its own government, which, if approved by the Legislature, shall become the organic act of such city, and supersede all laws inconsistent therewith. The people have thus withdrawn from the Senate and Assembly the legislative authority of the state in reference to municipal government for cities, to the extent that neither of those bodies can exercise any legislative authority in the enactment of a charter for such a municipality until after its provisions have been formulated and approved by the city itself in the manner prescribed by section 8 aforesaid, and have limited their legislative authority to the mere approval or rejection of the charter so formulated. The authority thus withdrawn from the Legislature and given to the city is none the less a part of the lawmaking power of the state because it is contained in the article upon "Cities, Counties and Towns," rather than in the article upon the "Legislative Department," and the act of the city in formulating the charter and determining the provisions to be included therein has the same force and authority as would a charter with the same provisions enacted by a Legislature that was not restrained by any constitutional limitations. Its adoption by the city and approval by the Legislature in the manner prescribed by said section is the mode prescribed by the Constitution for its enactment, and has the same effect as that of a law which is passed by bill, under the provision of section 15 of article 4. It must be held, therefore, that the provisions of the charter of San Francisco in reference to qualifications for eligibility to the office of tax collector have been established by the legislative authority of the state, and are valid.

The finding of the court that the appellant had not been a resident or elector of San Francisco for the period of five years next preceding the date of the election is sustained by the evidence. Whether he had this qualification was an ultimate fact, depending upon certain probative facts; and the determination of the superior court upon these probative facts, so far as such determination was made upon conflicting evidence, or by reason of inferences from established facts, must be accepted as correct. After it had been shown that he had acquired a domicile in the county of Santa Clara, the burden of proof was upon him to show that he had acquired another domicile in San Francisco. It appears from the bill of exceptions that he became a resident of San Jose in the latter part of 1892, and engaged in business therein at that time, and continued to carry on the same until the latter part of February, 1895. In March, 1893, he caused himself to be registered as a voter in that county, and was not registered as a voter in San Francisco until July 31, 1896. His wife accompanied him when he first went to San Jose, and they furnished and occupied a house on St. James street, in that city, as their residence, and continued to live there until some time in the month of August, 1894, when they broke up housekeeping, and he went to live at another house, on North Fifth street, where he continued to live until the latter part of February, 1895. He packed up the furniture of their house on St. James street, and stored it in the basement of the house on North Fifth street, where it remained until he left San Jose. His wife was troubled with asthma, and found the climate of San Jose unfavorable to her health; and when they broke up housekeeping she went to the house of his father, in San Francisco, and occupied a room there for a while. As stated by her in her testimony: "Mr. Scott had some affairs to settle up his business, and he didn't like to leave me in the city alone, and, as I was ill, he thought the proper place for me was his parents' home; and so I stayed with them, and occupied the front room with Mr. Scott." The bill of exceptions does not show how long she remained at his father's house, or what amount of time she passed there; but during the summer months she visited several mountain resorts for her health, and from them appears from time to time to have returned to her husband at San Jose. She also testified that during the period between her going to his father's house and January 1, 1895, she visited San Jose at least once a week, and sometimes oftener, and at times remained there two or three days, during which she stayed with her husband at the house on North Fifth street where he was living. A witness who was a housemaid at this place until nearly the end of 1894 testified that the appellant and his wife lived there almost continuously during the time that she was there. The business of the appellant required him to visit San Francisco occasionally after he went to North Fifth street to live, and when he made such visits he would go to his father's house to see his wife, if she was then in that city, and at times he would pass the night there. He did not, however, take any house for himself in San Francisco until February, 1895, after he had closed out his business in San Jose. He then took a house on Haight street, and shipped his furniture to that place, and went there with his wife to live. Under this evidence the court was justified in finding that he did not become a resident of San Francisco prior to February, 1895.

There was evidence before the court that, when the appellant broke up housekeeping at San Jose, it was with the purpose of making San Francisco his place of residence, and many declarations by him of such intention were received in evidence; and it is urged in support of the appeal that, as the domicile or residence of a person depends upon the intention with which he selects his place of abode, the court should have held that this evidence of intention, coupled with his wife's taking up her abode at his father's house in pursuance of the agreement to that effect, and his subsequent removal there, made him a resident of San Francisco in August, 1894. The defect in this argument is that, however strong his intention may have been, it was not accompanied or followed by any immediate execution. These declarations all looked to the future, and were merely indicative of a purpose, but were not expressions giving character to the performance of an act. Declarations of the intention with which an act is done may illustrate the character of the act as a part of the res gestæ (Wright v. Boston, 126 Mass. 161; Code Civ. Proc. § 1850), but are entitled to but little, if any, consideration when made either as the narration of a past act, or as indicating the purpose with which an act is to be done in the future. The residence of a person will not be affected by such declaration until the intention is carried into effect by the completed act. "A change in the domicile of a person cannot be effected by an intention in the mind to make this change, unless it is accompanied by an actual change in the place of abode." Pickering v. Cambridge, 144 Mass. 244, 10 N. E. 827. "The residence can be changed only by the union of act and intent." Pol. Code, § 52 (7). "The mere intention to acquire a new residence, without the fact of removal, avails nothing; neither does the fact of removal without the intention." Id. § 1239 (9). See, also, State v. Frest, 4 Har. 558; Murphy v. Hunt, 75 Ala. 438; Foss v. Foss, 58 N. H. 283.

SCOTT v. SHEEHAN. (S. F. 2,875.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 7, 1905.)

ELECTION CONTEST—TITLE TO OFFICE—TRIAL—DE FACTO OFFICER—POSSESSION—INJUNCTION—APPEAL—ACADEMIC QUESTIONS—REVIEW.

1. The possession of an office, as between two rival claimants, does not depend on the mere physical possession of the rooms and appurtenances ordinarily used in the performance of the duties thereof.

2. The title to an office, as between two conflicting claimants, cannot be tried in a suit to enjoin one of them from interfering with the possession of the incumbent, who is alleged to be in the possession of the office, and performing the duties thereof, as a de facto officer.

3. Where in a prior election contest it had been determined by the Supreme Court that complainant was not entitled to the office, an appeal from a judgment in another action by complainant, enjoining defendant from interfering with him in his possession of the office as a de facto officer, and finding that complainant was in possession of the office at the time of the commencement of the action, presented a purely academic question, and would not be reviewed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge.

Action by Joseph H. Scott against Edward I. Sheehan. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Garret W. McEnerney and John S. Drum, for appellant. Wal. J. Tuska, A. Ruef, and P. F. Dunne, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. These appeals are from the judgment, and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The judgment enjoined the defendant from interfering with the position held by the respondent of the office of tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco, and awarding damages and costs of suit.

Sheehan was tax collector of the city and county of San Francisco. Scott was elected to succeed him. Sheehan, in good faith, believing that Scott was ineligible to fill the office, and that his election to fill the office was a nullity, and that he was entitled to hold the office until the election and qualification of a person eligible to hold the same, refused to surrender possession of the offices, books, and records therein contained, and commenced an action against Scott to contest his election, under section 1111, subd. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The result of the judgment in that action was a declaration of the ineligibility of Scott, which judgment has been affirmed upon appeal to this court. Sheehan v. Scott (S. F. 2,309, filed January 4, 1905) 79 Pac. 350. Pending the determination of that action, however, Sheehan being advised that Scott proposed to take summary possession of the offices, barricaded the doors and entrances so as to protect himself in the possession; and it is found that all of the preparations which he made were reasonable and necessary, according to his information, to enable him to maintain the possession of the office, and made upon his part solely by reason and on account of the threats and preparations made by plaintiff; that at noon, upon January 8, 1900, the day and hour when the newly elected officer was to enter upon the discharge of his duties, Scott made demand upon Sheehan to surrender possession, and, upon his refusal so to do, Mr. Scott's legal adviser told him to take possession. The result is summed up in the finding of the court as follows: "That thereupon a number of persons in confederation with plaintiff, Joseph H. Scott, acting under the orders of said Scott, and the said Scott himself, jumped over the counters and chairs in the tax collector's office, and struck, beat, bruised, and maimed a number of men in the occupation of said office by the leave and upon the direction of the defendant, Edward I. Sheehan, and undertook to take possession of said office and maintain such possession by force, and to drive out said Sheehan, his deputies, and the other persons in said office by leave of said Sheehan. The said Joseph H. Scott, and a number of other persons acting under his orders and by his directions, did from shortly after noon until the surrender of the occupation of the rooms of tax collector, by and in pursuance of the injunction as hereinafter alleged, occupy and hold by force a portion of one of the rooms of said tax collector. Whatever possession the plaintiff had of either of said rooms or said office before the time of the service upon the defendant of the injunction was had and procured by force in the manner above stated, and against the will and contrary to the desire of the defendant." In this situation of affairs, Scott sued to enjoin Sheehan from interfering with him in the conduct of his office; averring that upon the 8th of January, at the hour of noon, he had entered upon the discharge of his official duties, and at the time of the commencement of the suit still was the incumbent of the office, and acting de facto tax collector. The court found that the plaintiff, Scott, was in possession of the office at the time of the commencement of the action. It is contended that this finding is contrary not only to the evidence, but to the finding above quoted. It is, of course, well settled that the possession of an office does not depend upon the mere physical possession of the rooms and appurtenances ordinarily used in the performance of the duties. Yet in many instances, as in this, such possession is convenient, if not necessary, to the orderly performance of the duties which pertain to the office. It is, of course, equally well settled that, in an action such as this, the title to the office is not involved, and cannot be inquired into. In view of the decision of this court, to which reference has been made, deciding that Scott was ineligible to fill the office, and in view of the further fact that the term of office has long since expired, it becomes a question purely of academic interest to review the conflicting evidence, and to decide whether or not Scott had such possession of the office as to have justified the court in enjoining Sheehan from interfering with him in the performance of its duties. Sheehan, having taken all proper steps to resist Scott's claim and attempted intrusion, has not, of course, imperiled or lost any of his legal rights. But as is said in Sullivan v. Haacke, 5 Ohio N. P. 26: "How futile, then, to urge the court to adjudge that the plaintiff has been removed. Can the court so adjudge without first trying the question of title, and determining that the title is in the defendant? Clearly no; to find that the defendant has been removed necessarily decides the question of title, and this cannot be undertaken here." So in this case it cannot be said that there was not sufficient evidence before the court to justify its finding that Scott had entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and, that being so, it was proper to enjoin the defendant from interfering with the plaintiff. While obeying the injunction, as has been said, the defendant sacrificed none of his legal rights.

ROPES v. JOHN ROSENFELD'S SONS.

(S. F. 2,947.)*

SALES — BROKER — COMMISSION — RATIFICATION — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY — OFFER — TIME LIMIT — CALCULATION OF TIME — SUNDAY — APPEAL.

1. Where an offer to sell was made on Sunday, with the understanding that the offer would expire on the following day, Sunday is included, in calculating the time limit, and such limit did not extend to Tuesday.

2. A broker received the purchase price of a ship, for the sale of which negotiations had been conducted between him and the owner, and a contract made, by which the owner agreed to pay the broker a commission of 5 per cent. on the purchase price if sale was made within a certain time. The broker failed to find a purchaser within the time limited, but, after the expiration of the time, made the sale; the ship having in the meantime been delivered to the purchaser under a contract of sale between the owner and another representative of the same purchaser subsequent to the expiration of the contract between the broker and the owner. In paying over to the owner of the ship the purchase price which was paid by the purchaser to the broker, he retained 2½ per cent. as commission; that sum being paid by the owner to him by way of compromise of the claim for full commission; both parties reserving their respective rights, and the owner disputing the broker's right to any commission. Held insufficient to show a ratification by the owner of the sale of the ship by the broker, so as to entitle the broker to commission.

3. Where a broker is given the right to sell within a limited time for a specified commission, but a purchaser is not found within the time limit, able and willing to buy, the broker is not entitled to his commission for the procurement of a purchaser subsequent to the expiration of the time limit.

4. Where plaintiff in an action for commission on a sale alleged to have been effected as broker joined with his complaint for breach of a special contract a second count for work and labor, but all of his evidence was addressed to the alleged contract, and sale under it, a failure to find on the second count is not cause for reversal.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by A. G. Ropes against John Rosenfeld's Sons, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andros & Frank and Nathan H. Frank, for appellant. Goodfellow & Eells and W. S. Goodfellow, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Action for commission alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant corporation on account of the sale by plaintiff of defendant's steamer Peter Jebsen. It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff was at all times mentioned therein, and still is, doing business in the city of New York under the firm name of I. F. Chapman & Co., and that "R. J. Chapman, of San Francisco, doing business under the firm name and style of J. F. Chapman & Co., was the agent of said plaintiff." It is alleged that, on the date above named, R. J. Chapman, as such agent, entered into an agreement with defendant "whereby defendant promised and agreed to pay to said plaintiff a brokerage of five per cent. upon $215,000, provided the said plaintiff would secure the United States Navy Department as a purchaser for said sum of $215,000 of the Norwegian steamer Peter Jebsen"; that plaintiff secured the said United States Navy Department as a purchaser of said steamer at said figure, and defendant received the purchase price on May 26, 1898; that defendant thereafter paid plaintiff one-half of said commission, but refused to pay the balance thereof. A second cause of action is for this sum for work and labor performed in the same matter. Defendant denies that there was any agreement between plaintiff and defendant, other than as follows: That on May 22, 1898, defendant gave said R. J. Chapman a verbal offer to sell said steamer for the amount stated above, less 5 per cent., "subject to prompt reply," which the court found was understood by the parties to mean that the "offer would expire and cease to be binding unless the steamer was sold, and defendant notified thereof, on the following day." The answer avers that on May 23d "no prompt or other reply had been made to said offer, and on the afternoon of said 23d day of May the said offer was withdrawn, and the said R. J. Chapman was notified thereof, and thereto the said Chapman assented"; denies that plaintiff secured a purchaser for said steamer; denies the payment to plaintiff of any commission, or that any commission is still due plaintiff; and alleges that the defendant sold the steamer to the United States government for $215,000, "and that on the 26th day of May, 1898, the plaintiff herein paid to this defendant the sum of $209,625."

*Rehearing denied February 3, 1905.

The court found as facts that on May 22, 1898, defendant gave R. J. Chapman, as agent of plaintiff, "a verbal offer to sell the steamer in plaintiff's complaint referred to for the sum of $215,000, U. S. gold coin, less 5 per cent. thereof, 'subject to prompt reply'" (the meaning of prompt reply already stated); that on May 23, 1898, "no prompt or other reply was or had been made to said offer, nor was said steamer on said day sold, nor had any purchaser therefor been found; that on the afternoon of May 23, 1898, the said offer of defendant was withdrawn, and the said R. J. Chapman, as such agent, was notified thereof, and thereto assented"; "that, save as hereinbefore set forth, there never was any agreement between the plaintiff or his said agent and the defendant respecting the said steamer"; that after the said 23d day of May, 1898, defendant sold the steamer to the United States government for $215,000, and that the sale was not made through plaintiff's agency, nor did plaintiff secure the United States Navy Department as a purchaser of said steamer; and that there is not due plaintiff, as commission or otherwise, any sum whatever. Defendant had judgment, from which, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

The facts disclosed by the record are made up of verbal personal communications, messages by telephone, telegrams and letters of sundry persons, and testimony at the trial, and are somewhat voluminous. We will endeavor, without unnecessary prolixity, to state the established facts which appear to us to bear on the points raised in the briefs: Capt. Bradford, chief of the bureau of equipment of the Navy Department, at Washington, on Saturday, May 21, 1898, telegraphed plaintiff, in New York: "Am in the market for collier in the Pacific. Have you anything to offer?" Plaintiff thereupon replied by telegraph, "Will name you collier Monday," and also telegraphed to R. J. Chapman, plaintiff's agent at San Francisco: "Make us firm offer immediately if you desire the business. Colliers sale or charter give full description." Chapman called on defendant that afternoon to learn if it had a collier for sale, and was told it had. The parties agreed to meet next day, Sunday, May 22d, at 10 o'clock a. m., and they did so meet. There were present Chapman, Henry Rosenfeld, secretary of defendant corporation, and John and Louis Rosenfeld, the former president of the corporation. The steamer Peter Jebsen was then and there offered to Chapman for $215,000, less 5 per cent., or $205,000 net, "subject to prompt reply." Chapman did not inform defendant, nor did defendant know, for whom he was acting, or to whom he proposed to sell the steamer, but knew, in a general way, that Chapman was agent for plaintiff here, and that plaintiff was in the brokerage business. Chapman telegraphed plaintiff on Sunday, at 11 o'clock a. m., "Offer your firm Norwegian steamer Peter Jebsen" (describing her capacity, etc., briefly, and terms of sale, same as above). The time limit, however, was not stated in the telegram. On Monday, about 5 o'clock p. m., Henry Rosenfeld called up Chapman on the telephone, and inquired if they had any reply, who answered, "No; I have nothing yet," and Rosenfeld replied, "Our offer is withdrawn," to which, as testified by Rosenfeld, Chapman answered, "I am sorry," or "I cannot help it." "* * * He made one of those remarks." Thereafter, on Monday, May 23d, defendant offered the steamer to Lieut. Brooks, aide de camp of Admiral Kirkland, commandant of the Mare Island navy yard, "subject to prompt rely," for $215,000. On the next day, Tuesday, May 24th, about 2 o'clock p. m., a contract of sale and purchase was entered into in writing between defendant and Pay Inspector of the United States Navy Griffing, who was acting in the matter under the direct orders and by authority of Admiral Kirkland, and the steamer was delivered at the navy yard by defendant that evening. Defendant had no communication with Chapman on Monday, except as shown above; nor did Chapman, so far as appears, inform plaintiff on Monday that defendant had withdrawn its offer. While these events were transpiring at San Francisco, plaintiff, at New York, was dealing directly with the navy department, through Captain Bradford, and on Monday, May 23d, telegraphed him a short description of the Peter Jebsen, stating: "Will write full particulars." Receiving no reply to this telegram, one Murray, manager of plaintiff, at New York, went to Washington Monday night, arriving at Washington Tuesday morning, May 24th. On Tuesday plaintiff was telegraphing Chapman for further particulars about the steamer, and Chapman had also received another telegram in the morning: "Will report Jebsen soon." At 10:30 a. m. Tuesday, Chapman telegraphed, and, so far as appears, for the first time, that "the owners of the Jebsen have given refusal until to-night. Commandant navy yard here failing this vessel is still open for business" (giving further description of the vessel). Murray received at Washington from New York the following, dated May 24th: "Chapman wires Peter Jebsen telegraph immediately or we shall lose the business. Other parties are making her offer." Some time during that day, Tuesday, May 24th, Murray offered, in writing, the steamer to Bradford for $215,000, and Bradford accepted the offer in writing; and at 6:46 p. m. Tuesday a telegram was received at San Francisco from plaintiff, and was delivered to Chapman Wednesday morning, May 25th, stating the plaintiff had sold the steamer. Plaintiff had made no offer to sell the steamer prior to Tuesday. During that day some telegrams were exchange between Bradford and Kirkland; the latter informing the former that the pay office at San Francisco had purchased the steamer by his (Kirkland's) order, and the former informing the latter that he had purchased her from New York parties on that day, and informing the latter that he (Bradford) intended only that Kirkland should purchase the cargo. It does not appear in what sequence these messages were sent and received. Bradford, however, testified that the bureau gave Kirkland no authority to purchase the steamer, and he expressed the opinion that Kirkland had no such authority. What authority, if any, Kirkland had, does not appear. It only appears that he exercised it. There is in the record a letter of the Navy Department of April 8, 1898, authorizing the chief of the bureau of equipment to procure information about colliers, and, after inspection, to "recommend to the Secretary the purchase of those you deem advisable"; and Bradford testified that he reported the purchase of the Jebsen to the Secretary. It also appears that the vouchers were made out in the name of I. F. Chapman & Co., bearing date June 4, 1898, and payment was made to Chapman & Co. It also appears that each party persisted in claiming the sale, and that in the course of the controversy it came about that defendant agreed on Wednesday, the 25th day of May, by way of compromise, to accept payment from plaintiff, less 2½ per cent., if paid by 3 o'clock the next day. Chapman came to defendant on time with the money that had been transferred by telegraph to him by plaintiff. He paid defendant $209,625, and defendant receipted to him for this amount; i. e., "being $215,000 less 2½ per cent. commission," etc. It was, however, distinctly understood by both parties that defendant claimed that plaintiff was not entitled to any commission, and plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to full commission, and that the balance unpaid both understood was in dispute, and was not to be paid unless legally enforceable, in view of all the facts.

Construing the findings of the court to mean that the contract was one of brokerage, and accepting the finding as to the meaning of "prompt reply," but challenging the other findings unsupported by the evidence, plaintiff contends, first, that a purchaser was procured by plaintiff and presented to defendant within the time limited; second, that plaintiff was the procuring cause of the sale, and it is therefore immaterial (1) whether or not defendant knew that the party with whom it was dealing was induced to do so through plaintiff's instrumentality, or (2) whether plaintiff, during the negotiations, knew that he was the moving cause of the sale, or (3) whether the sale was actually consummated after the expiration of the time limited. Plaintiff also claimed that defendant ratified the sale by plaintiff; also that the time limit extended to Tuesday because the contract was made on Sunday. Defendant contends, first, that plaintiff's right, whatever it was—whether to earn commission or to purchase the steamer—expired on Monday, May 23d, and that the evidence is clear that there was no person able, ready, and willing to purchase the steamer at that time; and, second, that plaintiff, in any event, did not find the purchaser, and was not the moving cause of the sale.

As to the time limit, we think plaintiff had all of Monday in which to make the sale. His time had not expired when defendant attempted to withdraw its offer; and, had plaintiff on Monday found a purchaser then ready, able, and willing to purchase, he would have brought himself within the terms of the contract, and would have earned his right to the commission. Defendant could not deprive plaintiff of this right by revoking the authority given within the lime limit. The evidence as to the meaning of the condition "subject to prompt reply" brings the case within the principle discussed in Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 256, 26 Pac. 909, and distinguishes it from Brown v. Pforr, 38 Cal. 550. The distinction lies in the fact that in the latter of these cases there was no stipulation that the contract should remain in force for the time given in which to sell, while in the former there was such stipulation, as we think there was here, in effect. But in the former case it also appeared that the purchaser was found within the time limit, while in the present case defendant found no purchaser within that time limit then ready and willing to purchase this vessel.

Plaintiff's contention that, because the agreement was entered into on Sunday, the limit extended to Tuesday, cannot be maintained. If the agreement had been made on Saturday, there would be force in the argument that Sunday would be excluded under the statute. Code Civ. Proc. § 11. But the contract was not then made. On the contrary, the parties agreed on Saturday to meet on Sunday to make the agreement, and it was then made, and Chapman (plaintiff's agent) on that day telegraphed plaintiff the offer. Nor can plaintiff's contention that defendant ratified the sale by plaintiff, and thus waived the time limit, be sustained. The facts clearly show that, in accepting payment for the vessel through plaintiff, both parties reserved their respective rights as they related to the money now in question. And what money was paid as commission was paid by way of compromise; defendant distinctly disputing plaintiff's right to it under the contract, and with equal clearness disputing his right to anything further.

The question remains whether the procurement of a purchaser by plaintiff subsequently to the expiration of the time limit entitled him to commission. In Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 17 Pac. 642, the court quotes from Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co., 83 N. Y. 382, 38 Am. Rep. 441: "The duty assumed by the broker is to bring the minds of the buyer and seller to an agreement for a sale, and the price and terms on which it is to be made; and, until this is done, his right to commission does not accrue." The court then adds this further rule: "It must appear that the broker performed the duty assumed by him within the time limited in his contract, or within such extension of time as may have been granted by his employer. If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commission, even though he made efforts to sell the property, and first called it to the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault, or fraud of the owner." Citing Fultz v. Mimer, 34 Kan. 576, 9 Pac. 316; Wilson v. Sturgis, 71 Cal. 226, 16 Pac. 772. See, also, Clark v. Cumming, 77 Ga. 64, 4 Am. St. Rep. 72, where the broker was given authority to sell "for a certain time and day only." The Kansas case cited is directly in point, and fully sustains the rule above stated. Mr. Mechem says: "For many cases no more satisfactory general rule can be laid down than to ascertain: (1) What did the broker undertake to do? (2) Has he completed that undertaking within the time and upon the terms stipulated? And (3) If not, is the default attributable to his own act or to the interference of the principal? * * * It will be seen, from this rule, that where the time is limited the performance must be within that time." Mechem on Agency, § 965. Plaintiff cites this same author (section 967), where it is said: "If the purchaser is found and negotiations are begun within the time limited, it is immaterial that they were not fully consummated until afterwards." The case cited in support of the text is Goffe v. Gibson, 18 Mo. App. 1. In that case a leasehold was the subject of the sale, the agent having 60 days in which to effect a sale; and it was further stipulated that the owner reserved the right to sell, but, if he made the sale "in any wise through their [the agents'] influence or instrumentality, then I [the owner] will pay the above commission." While the contract had yet some weeks to run, the agents brought the property to the attention of one Hastings, and pointed out to him that it was more valuable than similar property he was thinking of purchasing, whereupon Hastings, by reason of the fact of the agent's having called his attention to the property, entered into negotiations with the owner before the expiration of the time limit, and concluded the purchase shortly after the expiration of the limit. What the author probably had in mind is further illustrated by Wilson v. Sturgis, 71 Cal. 229, 16 Pac. 772. There the broker found a purchaser within the time limit, but the completion of the sale was, through the owner's fault, prolonged beyond the time limit, and apparently to avoid paying commissions. It is not easy to deduce a rule from the cases alike applicable to all of this class. The rule laid down in Zeimer v. Antisell, supra, has never been questioned or overruled by this court, so far as we know, and must control the question. There is no evidence that plaintiff's failure to find a purchaser was caused by defendant's "negligence, fault, or fraud." Defendant's notice of withdrawal did not in any wise prevent plaintiff from finding a purchaser, and, notwithstanding the persistent and uninterrupted efforts of plaintiff, he did not find a purchaser ready and willing to purchase until late on Tuesday.

The failure of the court to find on the second count of the complaint will not justify a reversal. It is not claimed in plaintiff's brief that there was any evidence addressed to this issue, and in fact it was all directed to the alleged contract, and sale under it. Eva et al. v. Symons et al. (Cal.) 78 Pac. 648.

The finding that plaintiff, through his agent, Chapman, consented to the withdrawal of defendant's offer to sell the steamer, rests upon very unsatisfactory evidence. But the view we have taken of the contract makes it immaterial whether plaintiff consented or not.

The judgment and order should be affirmed.

T. Z. Blakeman, for appellant. Drown, Leicester & Drown, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by the special administratrix from the order of court settling her final account as special administratrix, and refusing to allow certain expenditures charged therein.

1. The court refused to allow certain items charged as expenditures in the matter of the collection of the claims of the Bell estate from the estate of Robinson. The circumstances, briefly, were these: L. L. Robinson had executed his promissory note to Thomas Bell in his lifetime for the sum of $29,000. This note Bell had deposited with the Bank of California as security for debts owing by him. The Bell estate had a separate claim against the Robinson estate for $1,287. Upon both of these claims there was accumulated interest. The Robinson note having been given to the Bank of California as security for the debt of Bell, it is apparent that it was to the interest of the estate of Bell to realize as much as possible upon that note, since for any deficiency the estate of Bell was responsible over to the bank. The principal asset of the estate of Robinson was the Los Medanos Rancho, in Contra Costa county, which was heavily incumbered by mortgage. It was important to secure a purchaser who would pay such price for the ranch as to leave sufficient funds over for the liquidation of the claims of the Bank of California and of the estate of Bell. Mr. Blakeman, the attorney for the special administratrix herein, had himself substituted as attorney for the Bank of California, and, as its attorney, undertook the collection of the claims. The result was that the rancho was sold for money enough to pay the claims of the bank and of the Bell estate in full. Mr. Blakeman testified that he proceeded to sell the Robinson rancho just the same as an owner would do, and for that purpose had to, and did, employ real estate agents, and agents to get special information, to search out prospective purchasers, to make maps, and the like. The payments for these purposes are the ones which the court refused to allow in settling this account. The court found, it should be added, that the special administratrix, in incurring the expenditures and in paying these sums, acted in good faith, and in accordance with what she believed to be the best interests of the estate of Bell, and believed the expenses to be necessary expenses in connection with her proceedings to collect and preserve the assets of the estate of Bell, and to collect the claims of the estate of Bell against the estate of Robinson. Notwithstanding the benefits which accrued to the estate of Bell, the court properly refused to allow these expenditures. They were not lawful expenditures for the special administratrix to make, and the court in probate well summed up the matter when it said: "The special administratrix of the estate of Bell had no authority, derivable from the statutes of this state, to engage in contracts with real estate or other agents for the payment from the funds in her charge of commissions on sales made of property belonging to the estate of Robinson." The matter of these expenditures is rigidly and properly governed by the express language of the Codes, and to say in this or in any case that an expenditure not authorized by the law could be allowed, because made in good faith, or because benefit resulted to the estate from it, would be not only to subvert the law, but it would substitute for the wise rule which the law has laid down the judgment, caprice, or whim of the court in probate. Nor can these claims be countenanced and allowed, as appellant seeks to have them under section 2273 of the Civil Code. That section provides that "a trustee is entitled to the repayment, out of the trust property, of all expenses actually and properly incurred by him in the performance of his trust. He is entitled to the repayment of even unlawful expenditures, if they were productive of actual benefit to the estate." This, it is true, is the express rule of law made applicable to trustees generally; but the foundation of appellant's argument, namely, that a special administratrix, being a trustee, comes within the provisions of the section, is completely overthrown by section 2250 of the Civil Code, which, being a part of the same chapter as the section above quoted, declares: "The provisions of this chapter apply only to express trusts, created for the benefit of another than the trustor, and in which the title to the trust property is vested in the trustee; not including, however, those of executors, administrators, and guardians as such." We have not considered it necessary to discuss separately each of the items growing out of the transactions of the Robinson estate which the court rejected. From what has been said, it is plain that, one and all, they were properly disallowed.

2. The estate of Thomas Bell owned shares of stock in the North Bloomfield mine. The special administratrix employed a Mr. Gassaway to examine and report upon the condition of the mine. He did so, and she paid him $565. The Robinson estate also owned stock in the North Bloomfield mine. The expenditure is justified by the special administratrix upon the ground that it was her duty to inform herself of the value of the stock, "because she was pushing the Robinson estate stock to sale, and there were parties seeking to purchase the Bell estate stock." This item was likewise properly rejected. It was no part of the duty of the special administratrix, nor, indeed, was it within her power as special administratrix, to sell this property. Her duty, so far as the Bell estate was concerned, was to preserve it; and, for the reasons heretofore given, the expenditure was not authorized as being an effort to determine the value of the stock of the Robinson estate.

3. The court refused to allow an item of $120 paid to a detective agency for services in watching the office occupied by Mr. Staacke and Mr. Maxwell, the former executors of the will of Bell, who had been removed at the suit of Mrs. Bell. The special administratix testified that Staacke and Maxwell had not yet turned over all the papers to her, and that she believed that they were criminals; but she failed to cite any instance in which either of them ever endeavored to conceal or make away with any of the papers, and the utmost shown in this regard was that certain letters addressed to George Staacke, and relating to some of the property in which the Bell estate was interested, were handed to one of the detectives by Mr. Maxwell when demand was made. She admitted that Mr. Staacke had readily given her all of the papers that she called for, and that he never refused to produce any paper when asked. In this state of the evidence, it cannot be said that the court was not justified in refusing to allow this item as a necessary or proper expenditure.

4. In her account as special administratix, Mrs. Bell charged the estate with expenditures incurred by her in her successful efforts to remove the executor George Staacke from office. The amount so charged was $12.50 by way of taxable costs, and more than $500 for expenses in no sense taxable as costs, and consisting of $220 paid to a bookkeeper for examining the books of the executor, $126.60 to the stenographic reporter of the court for transcribing notes of testimony, $55.80 paid H. S. Crocker & Co. for printing briefs, and the oral argument in the Supreme Court. These items were one and all properly rejected. Mrs. Bell's action for the removal of the executor was prosecuted by her "as the widow and an heir of the said deceased, and as a creditor of his estate." It matters not that the effect of the proceeding was beneficial to the estate. The attorney's fees, costs, and expenses are chargeable to the heir or creditor who prosecutes the proceeding. Says Woerner (2 Woerner's Administration, § 516): "Nor are the fees of an attorney employed by the heirs, or a portion of them, to contest the settlement, or hasten the administration; nor can the estate be charged with any part of the fees of an attorney who is employed by one of the creditors or beneficiaries, though thereby a fund is realized which is distributable among all the creditors or beneficiaries." The heir or legatee seeking the removal of an executor has no power to deal with, and no control over, the assets of the estate, and cannot make contracts which in any way will bind the estate; nor can the fact that such heir afterwards becomes special administratrix justify the payment out of the assets of the estate of any such item of expense.

5. The suit of John S. Bell v. Staacke was defended by the special administratrix. She employed Mr. Blakeman as her attorney, and the court allowed him fees as such attorney. It refused, however, to allow an item of $69 paid to Mr. Worley for engrossing the bill of exceptions in that case. Mr. Worley was a clerk in the office of Mr. Blakeman, but it is said that the evidence shows that the attorney for the administratrix was much pressed for time in preparing the bill of exceptions, that Mr. Worley was compelled to work beyond office hours, and that, as the fees allowed the attorney for his services were exceedingly small, they should be construed to include nothing but strict legal services. But the answer to this is that it is the duty of the attorney to engross, or cause to be engrossed, the bill of exceptions, and in this sense it is a part of the strict legal duty of the attorney. A special remuneration to his clerk is no more a legal charge against the estate for such services than would be a claim for his salary during the time that he was actually employed upon the work.

In appellant's reply brief, for the first time, she makes mention of the fact that the court, in disallowing the item of $1,000 paid to Baldwin & Howell, as real estate agents, in and about the sale of the Robinson Ranch, failed to credit her back with $107.45 and $87.79 with which she had charged herself, and which moneys were paid to her by other creditors of the estate of Robinson as their proportionate share of the $1,000 commission which she had paid to Baldwin & Howell, and, again, that, in disallowing the amount paid to Gassaway for his report upon the North Bloomfield mine, the court failed to allow her the item of $150 for which she had sold a copy of the Gassaway report, and with which she charged herself. It is manifest that these were errors of inadvertence by the trial court, and would at once have been corrected upon application to it. It follows, therefore, that the order of the court should be modified as to these items in the respects indicated, and that in all other respects the order stands affirmed; and as these errors of inadvertence should, in the first instance, have been called to the attention of the court in probate, appellant, upon this modification, should not be allowed to recover her costs. It is ordered accordingly.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

DENNINGER v. RECORDER'S COURT OF CITY OF POMONA. (S. F. 3,801.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1904.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — REGULATION OF GAS RATES — CONSTITUTIONAL AUTHORITY — SELF-EXECUTING PROVISIONS — MUNICIPAL ORDINANCES—PUNISHMENT FOR VIOLATION—FINE AND IMPRISONMENT.

1. Recorder's courts in cities of the fifth class have by St. 1883, p. 265, c. 49, a strictly limited criminal jurisdiction, and a conviction on a complaint which fails to allege facts constituting one of the offenses to which their jurisdiction is confined may be reviewed and annulled upon certiorari, or, in case of actual imprisonment, upon habeas corpus.

2. Const. art. 11, § 11, authorizing cities to make and enforce local police and sanitary regulations, and other regulations not in conflict with general laws; and section 19, providing that in cities having no municipal lighting plant any individual or corporation shall have the privilege of using the streets for the purposes of laying pipes upon condition that the municipality shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof—give to every municipal corporation the right to regulate the charges of any person or corporation supplying gas to the city or its inhabitants through pipes laid in the public streets; and fifth-class cities are given the power to carry the right into effect by St. 1883, p. 250, c. 49, providing such cities with a board of trustees who are empowered to pass ordinances not in conflict with the federal or state Constitution or laws.

3. Const. art. 4, § 33, providing that the Legislature shall pass laws for the regulation and limitation of charges for services performed and commodities furnished by gas corporations, does not require or authorize the Legislature to take away the right given incorporated cities by Const. art. 11, §§ 11, 19, to regulate the charges of gas companies within their limits, nor does the failure of the Legislature to pass the prescribed laws suspend or hold in abeyance the right of such cities to regulate gas rates; but until the Legislature has acted the right of the cities to act exists unhampered, except so far as restricted by general principles or specific provisions of the fundamental law.

4. St. 1883, p. 254, c. 49, empowering boards of trustees of fifth-class cities to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures for any and all violations of ordinances, is in no respect unconstitutional, and an ordinance passed in pursuance thereto, carrying out the authority given to such cities by Const. art. 11, §§ 11, 19, and St. 1883, p. 250, c. 49, to regulate charges for gas, which fixes a maximum rate of $1.50 per 1,000 feet, and declares it a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment to collect more, is valid.

5. Whatever the Legislature may punish as a misdemeanor it may authorize a municipal corporation to punish as a misdemeanor.

6. One who, acting for a corporation, collects more than the maximum rate fixed by ordinance for gas service, is guilty of a violation of the ordinance declaring it a misdemeanor to "collect or receive" a sum in excess of the prescribed rate.

In Bank. Paul J. Denninger was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Pomona of violating an ordinance of said city, and brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Herbert Cutler Brown and Garret W. McEnerney, for petitioner. Robert G. Loucks, City Atty., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner was convicted in the recorder's court of collecting from a resident of Pomona more than $1.50 per 1,000 feet for gas, contrary to the provisions of a municipal ordinance establishing that as the maximum rate, and declaring it a misdemeanor to collect or receive more. He seeks in this proceeding by certiorari a review of the judgment of fine and imprisonment, and the sole question to be determined is whether the recorder's court exceeded its jurisdiction.

Pomona is a city of the fifth class, and the recorder's court, in cities of that class, has a jurisdiction in criminal cases strictly limited in character (St. 1883, p. 265, c. 49); so that, if the complaint upon which a defendant is arrested and tried fails to allege facts constituting one of the offenses to which its jurisdiction is confined, a judgment of conviction may be reviewed and annulled upon certiorari, or, in case of actual imprisonment, upon habeas corpus.

The petitioner contends that the complaint upon which he was arrested and tried charges no offense: First, because the municipality has no power to limit gas rates by ordinance; and, second, because, even if it has the power to establish a maximum rate, it has no power to make the violation of such an ordinance a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment. Upon these two propositions the argument has taken a very wide range, but to them it has been confined. Whatever question may have arisen at any stage of the proceedings as to the sufficiency of the complaint to state a case within the penal clauses of the ordinance, no such question has been raised here, and we shall therefore confine ourselves to a consideration of the two propositions above stated.

Regarding both propositions, it is contended by the respondent that, in the absence of any other statutory or constitutional grant of power, every provision of the ordinance is fully supported by section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, which reads as follows: "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws." By this section the people have made a direct constitutional grant of the police power of the state to every municipal corporation for local purposes. It is conceded by the petitioner that the general grant of legislative power in the Constitution of a state includes the power to regulate gas rates by statute, and that this power may be delegated by statute to municipal corporations. If this is so, and if the regulation of gas rates by the state is an exercise of the police power, it would be difficult to say why, in the absence of more specific provisions in our Constitution relating to this matter, the municipal corporations of the state could not, by virtue of the section above quoted, adopt and enforce within their local limits ordinances as comprehensive, both as to the establishment of rates and the infliction of penalties, as the statutes which the Legislature is competent to enact for the state at large. But these are questions which we do not find it necessary to decide. The Constitution contains specific provisions relating to the matter of limiting the charges for gas furnished to cities and their inhabitants, provisions which in and by themselves furnish a complete answer to the petitioner's first proposition, and, in connection with others, an equally satisfactory answer to the second.

By section 19 of article 11 of the Constitution it is provided: "In any city where there are no public works owned and controlled by the municipality for supplying the same with water or artificial light, any individual, or any company duly incorporated for such purpose, under and by authority of the laws of this state, shall, under the direction of the superintendent of streets, or other officer in control thereof, and under such general regulations as the municipality may prescribe, for damages and for indemnity for damages, have the privilege of using the public streets and thoroughfares thereof, and of laying down pipes and conduits therein, and connections therewith, so far as may be necessary for introducing and supplying such city and its inhabitants either with gas light, or other illuminating light, or with fresh water for domestic and all other purposes, upon the condition that the municipal government shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof." This section very clearly gives to every municipal corporation the right to regulate the charges of any person or corporation supplying gas to a city or its inhabitants through pipes laid in the public streets, and, in the absence of any other provision relating to the matter, would be held to imply the power to exercise the right by the same methods by which its legislative power is exercised generally, so that nothing would be required to make the section completely operative beyond a law for the organization of municipal corporations and prescribing a mode of exercising their legislative power. In other words, a right to regulate, coupled with a lawful method of exercising the right, is all that is requisite to give validity to a regulation; and here we have the right conferred by the Constitution, and a mode prescribed by the Legislature for its exercise. That is to say, cities may be organized—as the city of Pomona has been organized—under the general municipal corporations act, by which they are empowered to pass ordinances. In cities of the fifth class they are provided with a board of trustees, who are empowered to pass ordinances not in conflict with the Constitution or the laws of this state or of the United States, and the forms to be observed in the passage of ordinances are definitely prescribed. St. 1883, p. 250, c. 49. This would seem to be conclusive as to the validity of that part of the ordinance establishing the maximum rate, and it would be entirely so if it were not for the fact that section 33 of article 4 of the Constitution provides as follows: "The Legislature shall pass laws for the regulation and limitation of the charges for services performed and commodities furnished by telegraph and gas corporations, and the charges by corporations or individuals for storage and wharfage, in which there is a public use; and where laws shall provide for the selection of any person or officer to regulate and limit such rates, no such person or officer shall be selected by any corporation or individual interested in the business to be regulated, and no person shall be selected who is an officer or stockholder in any such corporation."

It is contended that this section would be rendered entirely inoperative and meaningless if section 19 of article 11 should be held to be self-executing; that, the framers of the Constitution having enjoined upon the Legislature the duty of passing laws for the regulation and limitation of gas rates, no valid ordinance can be passed under section 19 of article 11 until the Legislature has first obeyed the mandate which required it to regulate the mode of regulation. In answer to this it may be said that we have not held that said section is in itself absolutely self-executing. It merely conferred or secured a right without the power of exercising or enforcing it, outside of those municipal corporations then in existence, and armed with powers similar to those which Pomona and all cities of the fifth class have since acquired by organizing under the general municipal corporation act. But for the fact that the enactment of this law was specifically enjoined by section 6 of article 11, it might perhaps have been deemed a compliance with the mandate of section 33 of article 4. Evidently, however, if that section is to have any operation, it must be construed in some other sense. What exactly it does mean it is difficult to say. It may mean, as held by Judge Wilbur of the superior court, that the Legislature was to pass a law for the organization of some board or commission to fix gas rates for rural districts not incorporated, but supplied with gas; and the wording of the last part of the section gives countenance to this view. Or it may mean that the Legislature must enact laws making it compulsory upon the governing bodies of our municipal corporations to establish rates at frequent intervals, and prescribing penalties for failure to do so, as the Constitution has itself done in regard to persons supplying water. Certainly, if the Legislature had passed a law of either character here suggested, there would have been no ground upon which this court could have held that something more was requisite to carry out the purpose of the Constitution. Petitioner's claim is that the purpose of this section was the protection of persons supplying gas and other commodities by leaving section 19 of article 11 inoperative as to the fixing of gas rates until the Legislature had enacted a code of procedure for the city councils, providing, among other things, for notice and hearing, and prescribing the period during which a rate once fixed should endure. But all this is purely conjectural. We do not know, and can hardly surmise, what the precise purpose of section 33 of article 4 was. We can be very certain, however, of one thing that was not its purpose. Without bringing it in direct and irreconcilable conflict with section 19 of article 11, it cannot be held to have required or authorized the regulation of gas rates in any incorporated city to be taken away from the governing body of such city and given over to any person, board, or officer to be selected outside of such governing body. And yet it does contemplate (in its last clause) the enactment of laws under which some person or officer is to be chosen (specially) to fix rates. This, as above stated, tends very strongly to sustain the view of Judge Wilbur that the laws contemplated and enjoined by said section 33 are laws applicable solely to districts outside of incorporated cities, and, if so, the failure to enact such laws—due, no doubt, to the absence of any actual occasion for applying them—can have no effect upon the operation of a provision of the Constitution relating exclusively to municipal corporations.

But waiving this view, and assuming that the intention of section 33 of article 4 was to lay a mandate upon the Legislature to enact such laws as might be deemed necessary to secure fairness in fixing and reasonable permanence in maintaining rates when fixed, it cannot be denied that the whole matter was committed to the discretion of the Legislature as to the time for action and the scope of action. It was assumed that when action was called for the Legislature would act, and that all safeguards found to be necessary would be provided, the municipalities being subject in the meantime to supervision and restraint by the courts if they should attempt anything in the nature of confiscation. What the framers of the Constitution assumed in committing this matter to the discretion of the Legislature the courts are justified in assuming. When further regulation is needed, it will be provided, but in the meantime the failure of the Legislature to act will not render nugatory a right granted by the Constitution and reenforced by a prescribed method for its exercise. The right and the power to regulate being conjoined, the duty to impose limits or conditions to the exercise of the right—supposing it to rest upon the Legislature—so long as it remains unperformed, simply leaves the right unhampered except so far as it may be restricted or qualified by the general principles or specific provisions of our fundamental law. The doctrine of this court is that all constitutional provisions are self-executing when they can be given reasonable effect without the aid of legislation, unless it clearly appears that such was not the intention (Winchester v. Howard, 136 Cal. 440, 64 Pac. 692, 69 Pac. 77, 89 Am. St. Rep. 153); and a necessary corollary to this proposition is that a constitutional provision not strictly self-executing becomes operative just as soon as it is supplemented by so much legislation as is absolutely necessary to supply its deficiencies; which is the case here.

As to the right of all persons to lay gas pipes in the streets of incorporated cities, subject only to its express conditions, section 19 of article 11 has been held to be self-executing (Re Johnston, 137 Cal. 115, 69 Pac. 973), and to hold that the correlative right of the municipalities to fix rates must remain in abeyance until the Legislature passes some law in obedience to the supposed mandate of section 33 of article 4 of the Constitution might forever deprive the municipalities of the state of a protection which the Constitution clearly designed to afford; for the Legislature, as to this matter, cannot take the place of the municipal bodies. It cannot regulate the charges for gas within municipal boundaries, though, according to the claim of petitioner, it can, by merely ignoring the supposed mandate of the Constitution, tie the hands of those upon whom the Constitution has conferred the right. We find nothing in the decisions of this court which leads to such a conclusion, and if, in the long array of cases cited by counsel from other jurisdictions, there may be found reasoning tending to support their contention, we do not feel constrained to follow it. We hold, on the contrary, that the two rights—the right to supply gas to cities and the right to fix rates—go hand in hand. Each exists by force of the Constitution, and each becomes effective upon the organization of a municipal government. If it be argued that the right to fix rates may be abused in the absence of restraining legislation, it may be answered that so also may the right to dig up and obstruct streets for the purpose of laying pipes be abused; but for any transgression of this sort the courts may be supposed to afford a sufficient remedy. In this instance we see nothing savoring of abuse in the provisions of the ordinance establishing the maximum rate. It was passed in March, 1903, was to take effect on the 1st of July following, and the rate was to stand for one year.

Petitioner's second proposition requires less extended discussion. Subdivision 16 of section 764 of the municipal corporation act empowers the board of trustees in cities of the fifth class to impose fines, penalties, and forfeitures for any and all violations of ordinances, etc. St. 1883, p. 254, c. 49. The ordinance in question, so far as it fixes the rate, is a valid ordinance, adopted not in pursuance of merely implied power, but in the exercise of a right specially secured by the Constitution; and unless the law empowering the city to punish its violation as a misdemeanor is unconstitutional, or is inapplicable to an ordinance of this character, the penal clauses are also valid. We know of no ground upon which this law can be held unconstitutional. The Legislature has made it a misdemeanor to ask or receive more than the sum allowed by law for the carriage of freight or passengers by rail. Pen. Code, § 525. An overcharge for gas cannot be distinguished in principle from an overcharge for a railway fare, and therefore it cannot be said that the penal clauses of this ordinance are in conflict with the policy of the state, as was said in Ex parte Ah You, 88 Cal. 99, 25 Pac. 974, 11 L. R. A. 408, 22 Am. St. Rep. 280. In that case an ordinance was held unreasonable and invalid because it authorized a fine of $1,000 for an offense, when the statute of the state limited the punishment of grosser offenses of the same category to a fine of $500. No such objection can be urged against this ordinance, which limits the penalty to $300. Besides the case last cited, we are referred to a number of decisions of this court where municipal ordinances not passed in pursuance of expressly delegated power have been held invalid because unreasonable. Ex parte Hodges, 87 Cal. 162, 25 Pac. 277; Ex parte Whitwell, 98 Cal. 73, 32 Pac. 870, 19 L. R. A. 727, 35 Am. St. Rep. 152, etc. These cases, involving not the right to punish an infraction of the ordinance, but the right to enact its substantive provisions, manifestly have no application to an ordinance the substantive provisions of which are held valid.

The question whether the Legislature can delegate to a municipal corporation the power to determine what shall constitute a criminal offense was considered by this court in Ex parte Guerrero, 69 Cal., at page 95, 10 Pac. 266. The decision of the point was, perhaps, not necessary in that case, where the validity of the ordinance in question might have been rested wholly upon the direct grant of the police power contained in section 11 of article 11; but the court sustained the ordinance on both grounds, citing with approval a Connecticut case where the only authority of the municipality was that conferred by its charter. Not only that case, but many cases decided in other jurisdictions, as well as the text of Dillon and other commentators on the law of municipal corporations, sustain the doctrine that whatever the Legislature may punish as a misdemeanor it may authorize a municipal corporation to punish as a misdemeanor. In this state, as we have seen, there is a law making the receipt of illegal railway fares or freights a misdemeanor—an act no more to be characterized as malum in se than the exaction of an excessive charge for gas. The constitutionality of this law, it is true, has never been passed upon; but no reason for holding it unconstitutional has been suggested, and none occurs to us. It would seem, indeed, that the exaction of excessive rates in a business charged with a public use is an offense of the same essential quality as extortion by public officers (Pen. Code, § 70), an offense clearly within the police power of the state. The ordinance, we conclude, is in no respect invalid.

There is an objection—not distinctly made, but suggested—to the sufficiency of the complaint upon which the petitioner was tried. It shows that he collected and received the excessive rate, not for himself, but for the corporation holding the franchise. But a corporation must act through the agency of natural persons, and the ordinance by its express terms applies to any person who collects or receives.

The judgment of the recorder's court is affirmed.

DENNINGER v. RECORDER'S COURT OF CITY OF POMONA. (S. F. 3,860, 3,861.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—REGULATIONS OF GAS RATES—VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE —COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 19, authorizing corporations to use the streets of a city to supply "gaslight or other illuminating light" upon condition that the municipality shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof, a complaint under an ordinance fixing the maximum rate for gas, and making it a misdemeanor to collect more, which charges defendant with having collected an excessive bill for gas furnished for cooking, heating, "and illuminating" purposes, charges an offense within the jurisdiction of the recorder's court of the city, whether the city has the right to fix a rate for gas furnished for cooking and heating purposes or not.

In Bank. One Denninger was convicted in the recorder's court of the city of Pomona of violating an ordinance of said city, and brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Herbert Cutler Brown and Garret W. McEnerney, for petitioner. Robert G. Loucks, City Atty., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. These cases are in all respects like the case of the same title (S. F. No. 3,801), just decided, 79 Pac. 360, except that in one of them the petitioner is charged with collecting the excessive rate for gas furnished for cooking, heating, and illuminating purposes. Section 19 of article 11 does not directly confer upon any individual or company the right to lay pipes and conduits in the streets of a city in order to supply gas for cooking and heating purposes, but only so far as may be necessary for supplying the city and its inhabitants with gas light. The same gas, however, which furnishes light also serves for cooking and heating, and the pipes and connections necessary for the one purpose make the gas available for the other purposes without subjecting the streets to any additional burden. It was accordingly held in Ex parte Johnston, 137 Cal. 122, 69 Pac. 973, that an intention to permit the use of gas for other than illuminating purposes afforded no ground for prohibiting the laying of the pipes by a party claiming the benefit of the constitutional grant. For the same reasons it must be held that the right of the city to fix the rate for gas is unaffected by the use which is made of it. It covers all gas furnished through the pipes laid in the street.

The judgments are affirmed.

I concur: VAN DYKE, J.

ANGELLOTTI, J. I concur in the judgments. The determination of the question as to whether the municipality had the right to fix a rate for gas furnished for cooking and heating purposes is not necessary to a decision of either case, and I therefore express no opinion thereon. The complaint against petitioner in the recorder's court charged him with charging, collecting, and receiving the excessive rate for gas furnished to one Witman, not only for cooking and heating purposes, but also for illuminating purposes. As it thus charged the collecting and receiving of the excessive rate for gas furnished for illuminating purposes, it charged a public offense, within the jurisdiction of the recorder's court. Denninger v. Recorder's Court (S. F. No. 3,801) 79 Pac. 360. It cannot, therefore, be held that the recorder's court has exceeded its jurisdiction, and this proceeding must fail.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgments. I do not think it necessary to resort to a somewhat difficult construction of section 19, article 11, of the Constitution, in order to give to a municipality the power to regulate the charges of a corporation or natural person in charge of works devoted to the public use of supplying inhabitants thereof with gas solely for heating, which includes cooking. That section applies only to water and light, and does not specifically include any materials used for heating alone. The power of a municipality in such cases comes from the general grant of authority to make such local, police, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws found in section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, in connection with the general power to pass ordinances given by section 764 of the municipal corporation act (Gen. Laws 1903, p. 871). Every corporation or person who, by reason of privileges received from the state such as the right to use the highways, or the right to exercise the power of eminent domain, is in the business of supplying the general public with any commodity or service necessary or convenient for the general comfort and welfare, is subject to the dominion and supervision of public authority, so far as may be necessary to prevent such business from being carried on unjustly or oppressively by the imposition of excessive charges for such commodity or services. This dominion is exercised for the general good, and it is one form of what is known as the police power. 1 Tiedeman on State Control, §§ 96, 97; Cooley, Const. Lim. (7th Ed.) 870; Munn v. Ill., 94 U. S. 125, 24 L. Ed. 77; Budd v. N. Y., 143 U. S. 517, 12 Sup. Ct. 468, 36 L. Ed. 247; People v. Budd, 117 N. Y. 1, 22 N. E. 670, 682, 5 L. R. A. 559, 15 Am. St. Rep. 460; Brass v. North Dakota, 153 U. S. 391, 14 Sup. Ct. 857, 38 L. Ed. 757. There was much dissention among the judges of the United States Supreme Court upon the question how far private business affected with a public use, but not the recipient of any privileges from the state—such as warehouses—could be interfered with in the exercise of this power, but all were agreed as to the nature and character of the power itself. Nor can there be any serious question that the business of supplying gas to the inhabitants of a city is subject to such regulation by the proper public authority in charge of this power. In this case, by virtue of the constitutional grant, the city of Pomona has the exercise of the power for all purposes local to the city, and has the proper public authority to make the regulations here in question.

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—LIMITATION—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION—COMPLAINT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 337, providing that an action on any contract founded on an instrument in writing executed in the state must be brought within five years, the bar of the statute as to a mortgagor is not affected merely by the death of a co-mortgagor before the note given with the mortgage is barred.

2. In an action to foreclose a mortgage, where the complaint showed on its face that the action was barred as to a surviving mortgagor because the suit was not commenced within five years, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 337, and the only evidence offered by the plaintiff, except as to nonpayment, was the note and mortgage, the cause of action was shown by the evidence to have been barred; and hence error in overruling a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the action was barred was not cured by the subsequent proceedings.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society against P. Boland, administrator of the estate of Annie Lennon, deceased, and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. Boyer, for appellants. Tobin & Tobin, for respondent.

SMITH, C. Appeal of the defendants from a judgment foreclosing the mortgage to the plaintiff of the defendant Lennon and his deceased wife, Annie Lennon, the defendant Boland's intestate. The mortgage was made February 21, 1893, to secure the joint and several promissory note of the mortgagors for the sum of $400, with interest, due one year from date, and was recorded the same day. The suit was brought May 16, 1900. The case, as shown by the pleadings and findings, is as follows: The allegations of the complaint, so far as material, are that the note was made and the mortgage executed and recorded as above stated, and that it has not been paid; that the defendants Lennon and Boyer "have interests in or liens upon said real property, but the same, whatever they may be, are subsequent and subject to the lien of said mortgage"; that the said Annie died intestate on or about March 29, 1893; and that the defendant Boland was appointed her administrator March 1, 1900. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint by the defendants Lennon and Boyer on the ground that it appeared on the face of the complaint that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 337, Code Civ. Proc., and there was also a demurrer by the administrator, but both were overruled. The answer of the defendants Lennon and Boyer alleges that on or about January 9, 1892 (a little over a year prior to the mortgage), and afterwards until January 27, 1900, the defendant Lennon was the owner of the mortgaged premises under a deed of the former date, recorded January 27, 1900, and that on the latter date he conveyed the same to the defendant Boyer; that neither the defendant Boland nor his intestate in her lifetime ever had any interest in the mortgaged premises since the mortgage was made; and that the plaintiff's action is barred by the provisions of the above-cited section 337, Code Civ. Proc. All the allegations of the complaint are found to be true, except the allegation as to the interests of the defendants Lennon and Boyer in the mortgaged land; and with regard to this, and the corresponding allegations of the answer, it is found that at the date of the mortgage the mortgaged property "stood of record in the name of [Mrs.] Lennon," who by deed of grant of date January 9, 1892, had conveyed the same to the defendant Lennon, and "that the defendant Lennon acquired said real property by said deed," and the said Boyer by conveyance from him, as alleged in the answer. There is no finding upon the plea of the statute, nor of facts from which such finding may be inferred. But it is claimed by the respondent that certain of the conclusions of law are to be regarded as findings of fact, and that these are sufficient to defeat the plea. These are "that the said decree [referring to the deed of Mrs. Lennon to her husband] was void as to the plaintiff up to the time of recording the same," and, in effect, that the defendants Lennon and Boyer thereby acquired an interest in the mortgaged property "subsequent and inferior to the lien of plaintiff," and "subject" thereto. But obviously these propositions are in their nature what they purport to be—that is, mere conclusions of law based on the specific facts found, which, it appears from the bill of exceptions, were the only facts put in evidence. A personal judgment was entered against the defendant Boland as administrator for the amount due on the note, and a judgment of foreclosure against the defendants generally.

It is admitted that under the provisions of section 353, Code Civ. Proc., the plaintiff's cause of action is not barred as to the defendant administrator. But the contrary is claimed as to the defendants Lennon and Boyer, and whether this contention can be sustained is the only question involved in this appeal. It will be considered first as presented by the demurrer to the complaint, and afterwards as affected by the subsequent proceedings:

As to the former aspect of the question, it appears on the face of the complaint that the suit was brought more than six years after the note and mortgage became due, and nothing appears in the complaint to rebut the defense of the statute, unless it be the bare fact of the death of Mrs. Lennon before the note was barred. But this, it is clear upon principle, could not affect the bar of the statute as to the surviving mortgagor, and it has been so held. Vandall v. Teague, 142 Cal. 471, 76 Pac. 35; Sichel v. Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493. On the facts alleged, therefore, all that the plaintiff was entitled to was a judgment against the administrator of Mrs. Lennon only, and such as "in no wise to prejudice the title of" her co-mortgagor. Vandall v. Teague, 142 Cal. 471, 76 Pac. 35. This decision does not conflict with the decision in Estate of Bullard, 116 Cal. 355, 48 Pac. 219, cited by the respondent's counsel.

Nor was the error in overruling the demurrer cured by the subsequent proceedings. The plaintiff was, perhaps, entitled to controvert the affirmative defense set up in the answer, and, without pleading, to prove any facts tending to rebut it (Code Civ. Proc. § 462, and cases cited, Pomeroy's Ed.), and a finding in its favor on sufficient evidence upon the issue of the statute would have been sufficient to support the judgment. But as appears from the bill of exceptions, the only evidence offered by the plaintiff, except as to nonpayment, was the note and mortgage, which were admitted over the objection that it appeared on their face that they were barred by the statute as pleaded. On the evidence, therefore, as well as on the complaint, the plaintiff's cause of action appears to be barred, and there is no finding, express or implied, to the contrary.

We advise that the judgment appealed from be reversed.

We concur: HARRISON, C.; GRAY, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed: McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

FOUR OIL CO. v. UNITED OIL PRODUCERS et al. (S. F. 3,102.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1904.)

CONTRACT FOR PURCHASER—CONDITIONAL ACCEPTANCE OF OFFER.

1. There is no contract for purchase where plaintiff in its letter offers to sell oil of a guarantied gravity of 15 degrees, and defendant in its letter, in which it states it accepts the proposition, says that it wishes it to be distinctly understood that the 15 degrees gravity is to be at a temperature of 60 degrees.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. C. B. Hebbard, Judge.

Action by the Four Oil Company against the United Oil Producers and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Williamson, Livingston Jenks, and J. A. Elston, for appellant. James G. Maguire, Houx & Barrett, and A. L. Weil, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued defendant corporation and its stockholders, seeking a recovery for alleged breach of contract for the purchase of oil. Upon trial plaintiff sought to prove the contract by the introduction in evidence of the following letters:

"San Francisco, Cal., Dec. 19, 1900.

"United Oil Producers, Phelan Bldg.—Gentlemen: We beg to offer you crude petroleum of a guaranteed gravity of not less than 15 at the rate of 2 cars per day, as a minimum, to 3 cars, as a maximum, for one year from February 1st, 1901, to February 1st, 1902, at the price of 52½c, f. o. b., Bakersfield. In case this offer meets with your acceptance and you desire to include January next within the contract, we shall be pleased to supply you during that month at the same rate and at the same terms. Yours truly,

"Four Oil Company,
"Charles Musaus, Secty."

"San Francisco, Dec. 20, 1900.

"Number Four Oil Company, Mills Bldg, City.—Gentlemen: Replying to your favor of the 19th inst., would say that we accept your proposition therein contained for fuel oil for one year at 52½ cents, f. o. b., Bakersfield, on 2 cars per day minimum, and 3 cars per day maximum. The gravity of the oil to be 15 degrees Beaume, as you state, but we wish this distinctly understood under this agreement to be 15 degrees Beaume at a temperature of 60 degrees Fahrenheit. We presume that all oil will be of this grade, as it has been thus far, but we do not wish any oil below that gravity at that temperature. Yours truly,

"United Oil Producers,
"By Shafter Howard, Secretary."

It accompanied its offer with an additional offer to prove the meaning of certain technical terms and abbreviations understood by the parties. The court sustained defendants' objection to the introduction in evidence of the letters, and judgment followed for the defendants, from which plaintiff appeals.

The rules for determining whether or not a proposal and acceptance constitute a binding contract are well settled, and by this court have been expressed in the following language: "To constitute a binding contract made in this form [letters] there must be a proposal squarely assented to. If the acceptance be not unqualified, or go not to the actual thing proposed, then there is no binding contract. 1 Wharton on Contracts, § 4. A proposal to accept, or an acceptance based upon terms varying from those offered, is a rejection of the offer. National Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 51, 25 L. Ed. 822. An offer imposes no obligation, unless it is accepted upon the terms upon which it was made. Tilley v. County of Cook, 103 U. S. 161, 26 L. Ed. 374. An acceptance must be absolute and unqualified. A qualified acceptance is a new proposal. Civil Code, § 1585." Wristen v. Bowles, 82 Cal. 84, 22 Pac. 1136; and see, also, Yore v. Bankers' Mut. Life Ass'n, 88 Cal. 609, 26 Pac. 514. Under these principles of law it is clear that the court's ruling was correct, and that the minds of the parties had not met in the creation of a legal obligation, and this for the reason that the acceptance of the defendant was conditional and imported into the contract a term not found in the original proposal, and one requiring the assent of the plaintiff before either could be bound. This term is found in the following sentence: "But we wish this distinctly understood under this agreement to be 15 degrees Beaume at a temperature of 60 degrees Fahrenheit." The original proposition contained no limitation upon the temperature at which gravity was to be determined. That the matter of temperature was regarded as of importance is not only shown by the condition expressed in respondent's answer, but is further shown by a copy of another contract made by plaintiff, where it is specified that the gravity shall be determined at a temperature of 70 degrees Fahrenheit. Plaintiff having failed to prove its acceptance of the new condition imposed by defendant's letter, it follows that the acceptance was not absolute and unqualified, but was conditional, amounting to a new proposal upon the part of the defendants to which the plaintiff never assented. There was thus no completed contract between the parties, and the judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WOOD. (Cr. 1,168.)

HOMICIDE—CORPUS DELICTI—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—ESCAPE OF CONVICTS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Evidence that deceased was shot through the body, and died within a few moments, is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, though there was no autopsy to discover what particular organs of the body were pierced by the bullet.

2. On the trial of a convict for murder in trying to prevent recapture, it was proper to admit evidence of a conspiracy among the prisoners, including defendant, to escape, and of declarations by defendant and others that they would not be taken alive, and that, if the militia sought to recapture them, they would ambush and kill a few, and in the confusion thus caused manage to escape.

3. On a trial for murder it appeared that defendant and other convicts escaped, and that a pursuing posse surprised them at a camp; that deceased was shot by some of the convicts, and that they then fled. Held, that articles found at such camp, identified as having been previously in defendant's possession, were admissible as evidence that defendant was himself present when deceased was shot.

4. Where it appeared that thirteen convicts escaped, and that four of them were present when one of them killed deceased, an instruction that, "if several persons confined in the state's prison conspire to escape, and, if necessary, to kill any person who shall lawfully attempt to arrest or recapture them, and the death of a person so engaged in the attempt to lawfully arrest or recapture them ensue in the prosecution of said common design, it is murder in all who are present aiding and abetting in the common design," is not subject to the objection that defendant could be found guilty if he was one of the thirteen who originally conspired to escape, though he was not one of those present at the time of the homicide.

5. Under Pen. Code, § 105, which makes it a crime for a person confined in the state prison for a term less than for life to escape therefrom, if defendant, with others, conspired to effect the escape of himself and others, some of whom were imprisoned for a term less than life, all engaged in such conspiracy are engaged in a conspiracy to commit a crime, though defendant was serving a life sentence.

6. On the trial of a convict for murder in resisting arrest after his escape, where the evidence showed that defendant, with 12 others, conspired to effect their escape, and a part of the case of the prosecution consisted of proof that the 13 convicts had been convicted and sentenced to the state prison, and were at the time of the escape serving their sentences, it was proper for the jury to consider the evidence of such trials and convictions, including that of defendant.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Eldorado County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

John H. Wood was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

John P. G. Miller (W. F. Bray, of counsel), for appellant. U. S. Webb. Atty. Gen., and C. N. Post, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death. From the judgment of conviction and from an order denying a motion for a new trial he appeals to this court.

He was one of thirteen convicts who attempted to escape from Folsom Prison on July 27, 1903. On August 1st, according to the theory of the prosecution, he, with four other of the convicts, were at a place called "Manzanita Hill," in Eldorado county, and encountered a posse in pursuit for the purpose of recapturing them. In the conflict that ensued, one of the posse, J. Festus Rutherford, was killed, and for his death the defendant was convicted of murder.

It is contended that the corpus delicti was not proven, because, it is said, there is no proof that the wound inflicted upon the deceased caused his death. There is no merit in this contention. The deceased was a young man, nearly 19 years old, a member of the state militia, apparently in good health, and was actively engaged, at the time he was shot, in pursuing the convicts to rearrest them. He received a wound from a bullet which entered on his right side, and, passing through the body, came out on the left side some two inches higher than the point at which it entered. Its course was such that it would probably pass through a part of the heart. Immediately on receiving the wound the deceased dropped, and within a few moments was dead. There was no autopsy, and hence it cannot be said with certainty what particular organs of the body were pierced by the bullet. An autopsy is not necessary as a part of the proof that death was caused by a wound of this character. The circumstances above detailed are sufficient to satisfy any reasonable mind that the deceased came to his death by reason of the wound.

It is further contended that the proof of corpus delicti is defective because it has not been shown that the bullet which killed the deceased was fired by the defendant or either of the convicts with him. It is true that no witness testified that he saw the defendant on that occasion, but there is sufficient circumstantial evidence to show that the defendant and four other convicts were camped on Manzanita Hill at the time the posse arrived there in pursuit, and that when the deceased and several others of the posse were within 25 or 30 feet of the convicts' camp, and before they had perceived the convicts, they were fired on by the convicts themselves, and that the deceased fell at the first fire. There is much confusion in the testimony, as given in the transcript, as to the whereabouts of the other divisions of the posse at the time this first firing occurred. The defense claims that this first shooting was by some other division of the posse, who fired on the division in which the deceased was engaged. The uncertainty in the evidence as given arises from the fact that the witnesses had before them a large map, upon which was designated the topography and the location of the physical objects to which they referred, and that in testifying they would point to the places on the map and designate them by the words "here" and "there." From the manner in which the testimony is reported, we cannot determine what places they were referring to, or the relative positions of the different places. This uncertainty is caused primarily either by the manner of preparing the bill of exceptions or by the failure of the witnesses to describe in words the places referred to at the time they were pointed out on the map. These motions of the witnesses were, however, a part of the evidence, and the failure to report them or describe them in the bill of exceptions does not lessen the force and effect of the evidence as given to the jury, nor authorize us to conclude that it must have been uncertain, or that it required a different conclusion from that reached by the jury. The map was before them also, and it does not appear that they did not fully perceive and understand the relative positions of the different places. There is nothing in the record indicating to us that the pursuing posses fired on each other. The evidence, so far as it can be understood, clearly points to the convicts as the persons who fired the fatal volley. In this condition of the record we must assume that the jury understood the evidence, and properly concluded that the deceased was killed by the fire of the convicts, and not by a shot from one of the other divisions of the pursuing party.

It is claimed that there is no evidence that the defendant was present with the other convicts at the time, but this claim is manifestly untenable. Numerous articles were found at the place from which the shots were fired towards the deceased, indicating that there had been a camp at that place, which had been hastily broken up and many articles left on the ground. Among these several were found which had been previously in the possession of the defendant. It is unnecessary to state the evidence in detail. There were numerous circumstances, and, taken together, they were sufficient to prove that the defendant was one of the party encamped on the hill, and that it was this party that fired the shot which killed the deceased.

There was no error in admitting evidence of the conspiracy among the prisoners confined at Folsom, including the defendant, to escape, nor the declarations of the defendant and others of the conspirators that they would never be taken alive, and that, if the militia came after them, they would ambush them, and kill a few, and in the confusion thus caused manage to escape. These threats and plans were made by the defendant himself, with the others. and the fact that afterwards he and four others separated themselves from the remainder of the party does not destroy the effect of these plans and threats as evidence tending to show a guilty intent on the part of the defendant, and a common purpose, in the accomplishment of which the fatal shot was fired.

We do not clearly understand the point of the objection to the evidence of the tracks leading from the place where the convicts were last seen up to the camp on Manzanita Hill where the shooting occurred, and other tracks found the next day leading away from the spot. They were admitted for the purpose of showing that the convicts had been on Manzanita Hill. They were clearly competent for that purpose.

The several exhibits taken from the camp on Manzanita Hill were properly admitted in evidence. They consisted of tin cans, a spoon, a barley sack, hat, and various other articles commonly found about a camp. Their presence at the camp after the party using them had departed indicated a hasty departure, and supported the theory of the prosecution that the convicts had been surprised at their camp, and immediately after the shooting had departed without gathering up these articles. In addition to this reason, as several of them were identified as having been previously in the possession of the defendant, they were competent as evidence that the defendant was himself present on that occasion.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "If several persons confined in the state's prison conspire to escape therefrom, and, if necessary, to kill any person who shall lawfully attempt to arrest or recapture them, and the death of a person so engaged in the attempt to lawfully arrest or recapture them ensue in the prosecution of said common design, it is murder in all who are present aiding and abetting in the common design. The law makes no distinction or difference between any of the parties so engaged." As we understand the appellant's contention, it is that this is erroneous because, as he claims, it informs the jury that they could find the defendant guilty if he was one of the thirteen who originally conspired to escape, although he was not one of those present at the time of the homicide. We do not think it can be so construed. The entire case of the prosecution consisted of an effort to prove that the defendant was present at the scene of the conflict in which the homicide occurred. It was never contended that he could be convicted if he were proven to be one of the thirteen who escaped, although not of the number present at the conflict on Manzanita Hill. The jury could not have so understood the instruction, and it is not fairly susceptible of that meaning. Its application is limited by its terms to those who were present aiding and abetting, and this could only be understood to refer to their presence at the time of the attempt to make the recapture. The same objection is made to other instructions, but, taking all of the instructions together, we think the jury could not have supposed that the defendant could be convicted unless they were satisfied from the evidence that he was one of those present at the time of the death of the deceased.

There was an instruction to the effect that under section 105 of the Penal Code it is a crime for any person confined in the state prison for a term less than life to escape therefrom, and that, if two or more persons confined in the prison, only one of whom was sentenced to a term less than life, should conspire together and agree to a scheme to escape from the prison, all the persons engaged in the conspiracy are engaged in a conspiracy to commit a crime. We can see no error in the instruction. It is immaterial that the defendant was confined for the term of his natural life, and that there could be no criminal conspiracy, under the section of the Code referred to, with reference to his escape. If he, with others, conspired to effect the escape of himself and the others, some of whom were imprisoned for a term less than life, such conspiracy would be a crime within the meaning of the law.

After the argument was concluded, and the court had formulated its charge, the defendant asked the following instruction, which was refused: "You are further instructed that you are not to consider any other trials or convictions of this defendant as having any bearing on this case. It is your duty to consider no other matters except the evidence and the instructions of this court." The court instructed the jury at great length that they must consider no other matters except the evidence and the instruction of the court. So far as the instruction asked required the jury not to consider evidence of other trials and convictions, it was erroneous, and the court properly refused it. Part of the case of the prosecution consisted in proof that the thirteen convicts had been convicted and sentenced to the state prison, and were at the time of the escape serving their said sentences. It was proper, therefore, for the jury to consider the evidence of such trials and convictions, including that of the defendant.

We have carefully read the evidence and the briefs of counsel, and can find no error in the record. It is true, as counsel says, that many objections made by the defendant's attorney were overruled, and many objections to testimony offered by him were sustained. But in each case we think the rulings of the court below were proper.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

ABNER DOBLE CO. v. McDONALD. (S. F. 2,968.)*

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1905.)

FINDINGS OF FACT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CURING PLEADINGS.

1. The evidence in an action for goods sold and work done held sufficient to support a finding as to there being a contract.

2. Failure of the cross-complaint to allege that the amount demanded had not been paid is cured by the answer thereto denying the original indebtedness, and by failure to object to evidence on this ground, and by the findings.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Wm. R. Daingerfield, Judge.

Action by the Abner Doble Company against M. C. McDonald. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

---

*Rehearing denied February 2, 1905.

Jese W. Lilienthal and William F. Gibson (Frohman & Jacobs, of counsel), for appellant. Edward Lynch, for respondent.

SMITH, C. The plaintiff sues to recover the sum of $7,269.75 as balance due on an account for goods sold and delivered to the defendant, and for work and labor done for him at his request. The allegations of the complaint are denied, and a counterclaim is set up by the defendant, by answer and cross-complaint, for the sum of $383.60 paid by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff at its request. The goods in question consisted of mining machinery, and the work and labor counted on by the plaintiff was done in installing the same in the Gover mine, the property of the Gover Mining Company. The money expended by the defendant was expended in the installment of the same machinery. The findings were for the defendant on all the issues, and judgment was entered in his favor for the sum demanded in the cross-complaint, with costs. The appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The questions involved are as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the court.

At the time of the transactions in question the Gover Mining Company was heavily indebted, and without assets except the mine, and this had been attached, and was in imminent danger of being ruined for lack of funds to keep it free of water. The plaintiff was heavily interested in the company as a stockholder and creditor, and was also its surety for an indebtedness of $15,000 (secured by mortgage on the mine), and for other indebtedness, to the Anglo-American Bank. It was represented in the management of the mine by two of its own managers, Robert and William Doble, who were directors of the mining company, and, with its president, Emery, appear to have had the management and control of it.

Under these circumstances, in the early part of September, 1894, the defendant McDonald—who prior to the transactions in question had no interest in the mine—was applied to by Emery and Robert Doble, as the former says, "to take hold of the mine" and to "keep (it) clear of water so that we could sell it," for which purpose it was proposed to put the mine "in his hands to sell." Robert Doble's account of the matter is somewhat different. It is, in effect, that he proposed to McDonald to purchase the bank mortgage and to acquire the mine by foreclosure, and he assured him that the plaintiff would not spend any more money on the mine. The implication seems to be that the plaintiff abandoned its interest in the mine to McDonald; but the evidence does not go to this extent. The last conversation between this witness and McDonald took place on September 7th or 8th, and on the 13th William Doble approached McDonald on the same subject, referring to the previous interview between Robert and McDonald, but the latter "had not arrived at a definite conclusion." But on the next day, the 14th, the witness says McDonald told him "that he had considered the matter favorably, and had decided to take up the Gover matter, and requested (the witness) to send a telegram to (his) brother Robert," which was done accordingly, the telegram being written or dictated by McDonald. The witness adds: "Before I went McDonald had stated that he had decided to take up the Gover proposition, and I completed my mission when I sent the telegram which he requested," etc. The telegram alluded to, which is of date September 14, 1894, and addressed to Robert Doble and signed by William, is as follows: "McDonald has authorized Hale to keep water out of Gover under your directions." Hale was the superintendent of another mine for McDonald, and was instructed by telegram of same date: "Take charge under Robert Doble of Gover Mine. Keep water out at my expense. Will write." At the same time McDonald wrote him: "I have wired you this P. M. to take charge of Gover under Doble, to keep water out. Bank will not do it, and they will get into more trouble if the mine fills with water, so I will do it for awhile until something is agreed upon. I really don't know if the mine is worth anything or not. You don't want to promise to deliver wood to the Gover, unless you are sure what they will do for paying for it. * * * Yours truly. That Gover has broke everybody that has fooled with it yet, so I want to be careful."

It was under these circumstances that McDonald took hold of the mine, and it is clear that up to and including this date all that he had undertaken had been to keep the water out of the mine, and that there was no obligation on his part to do this any longer than he should choose. But, according to the testimony of William Doble, there was another interview between him and McDonald on the 17th of September, on which occasion Doble says he was instructed by McDonald to purchase the machinery in question and have the same put up at the mine, for and on account of the latter; and this, the witness says, was done accordingly. But it is denied by McDonald that he gave such an order, or that it was understood or agreed that the machinery was to be purchased or put up on his account, or that he was in any way interested in the purchase, and there were no witnesses as to what passed between the parties other than themselves.

Under the circumstances of the case the plaintiff's account of the matter presents some points of difficulty that require explanation. McDonald, according to his own account, was willing, for reasons stated, to go to some expense to assist Emery and the plaintiff, and it is not improbable that he anticipated making some profit in the future from his expenditures. But he did not have nor did he acquire any interest in the mine. Nor did he seek to acquire any, unless his attempt to purchase the mortgage to the bank can be so regarded; and had the proposed purchase entered seriously into his calculations, it would seem that before investing so largely, as it is claimed he did, he would at least have taken an option on the mortgage or otherwise secured himself. This could easily have been effected; and without this, and in the absence of any contract with the mining company or the plaintiff securing him an interest, there is an intrinsic improbability in the theory that he would have been willing to make so heavy a purchase on the mere chance of purchasing the claim against the mine. This it was equally open to any one to purchase, and the plaintiff itself, as the surety of the mining company, had the option to acquire it by mere payment. Whatever advantage, therefore, there was in the privilege of acquiring the claim was peculiarly the plaintiff's; and without an option from it, or from the bank, the defendant's chance of acquiring it was dependent entirely upon the plaintiff's future consent. On the other hand, there is no improbability in the supposition that the plaintiff should be willing to go to the expense of the machinery in order to save its large investment, and it is to be noted, in this connection, that it retained all its rights in the mine intact. The transaction, as detailed by William Doble, was therefore simply that McDonald consented to expend upon the property of the mining company, in addition to about $4,000 expended under the original understanding, the further sum of over $7,500, without acquiring any interest in, or security upon, the property, and without any motive that could be reasonably ascribed to a man of average intelligence.

The court below was therefore justified in finding for the defendant on the main issues, and also on the cross-complaint; and, indeed, it would have been justified in doing so, even if the probabilities of the case had been more equally balanced. Other points made by appellant relate to matters not affecting the result. The failure of the defendant to allege in his cross-complaint that the amount demanded had not been paid was cured by the plaintiff's answer, which denies the original indebtedness, and also by the failure to object to the evidence on this ground at the trial, and by the findings. We see no material error in the record.

We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

ALLEN v. STOWELL et al. (L. A. 1,300.)

MANDATORY INJUNCTION—CONSTRUCTION OF DAMS—DIVERTING WATER.

1. Mandatory injunction to remove dams constructed by defendants, diverting water onto and injuring plaintiff's lands, may be granted without any finding as to damages.

2. Defendants cannot justify their construction of dams diverting water onto and injuring plaintiff's land on the ground that they were endeavoring to obviate mistakes of a railroad company in locating culverts, the dams not having reinstated natural conditions, but created new ones.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Allen, Judge.

Action by Benjamin F. Allen against Sheridan A. Stowell and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Burnett, for appellants. Jas. Burdett, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. Defendants appeal from a judgment for plaintiff granting a mandatory injunction compelling defendants to remove a certain dam erected by defendants which caused the flow of water to be diverted from its natural course onto plaintiff's land. The bill of exceptions does not pretend to bring up all the evidence, but, as stated in appellants' brief, "is intended only to present two questions of law adopted by the court and applied to the case." These questions are: (1) Will the remedy of mandatory injunction lie where the evidence is conflicting on the point at issue, unless there first be a verdict of a jury or decision of the court finding that actual, at least nominal, damages have been awarded plaintiff? (2) Did the court err in its ruling that defendants had no right to build the obstruction for the purpose of correcting a mistake of the railroad company in locating its culverts?

It appears from the findings of the court that plaintiff's land is planted to orange trees in full bearing. Prior to the commencement of the action, and when defendants commenced the construction of the dam complained of, "plaintiff demanded of them that they desist and cease from said work and protested against the construction thereof, and explained to them the nature of the damages that said dam would cause him and his said lands and orchards, but defendants refused to abandon said work, or to cease the construction of said dams, and continued the same to completion." It appears from the bill of exceptions, and is substantially found as the facts by the court also, that the evidence of plaintiff tended to show that the dams referred to, which were erected after the railroad company had built its track, were so constructed that "all water flowing down said ancient way * * * would be diverted by said dams from its natural course, and caused to flow in one accumulated body southerly along the east of these dams through said railroad culverts, and thence in a like body through the lands of S. A. Stowell to the northeasterly corner of plaintiff's land, and would then flow in said accumulated volume with great force southwesterly and diagonally across plaintiff's lands, the natural effect of which would be to destroy a great number of his trees growing upon said land, and to excavate deep gulches and water courses diagonally through the same; that the construction of said dams would and did arrest and divert water, and cause the same to flow upon the lands of plaintiff as last above found, which would not naturally flow there in times of flood and high water;" and this the court found "would cause him [plaintiff] and his said land and orchard great and irreparable injury and damage."

There was a certain part of the dam and wing dam erected by defendants which the court, "in the absence of results from actual experience," was unwilling to order removed on the evidence then before it, but found certain other portions of the dam to be a nuisance, "and should be removed and leveled to the original and natural surface of the ground."

Relief by injunction will be given to prevent a deprivation of ancient rights, and if it be shown that plaintiff's house is, by the obstruction which he seeks to enjoin, rendered in a substantial degree less fit for purposes of occupation than before, "equity may interfere, even to the extent of making its injunction mandatory by directing the restoration of matters to the condition in which they were before defendant's erection was begun." High on Injunction, § 860. A trespass irreparable in its character and of a continuing nature may be restrained by a mandatory injunction, thus restoring things to their original condition; health officers may be restrained by mandatory injunction from allowing a sewer to remain open. Id. § 708. Trespass upon public lands may be enjoined by the United States, and the injunction be made mandatory to compel the defendant to remove obstructions such as fences (Id. § 723a); and in a case of a nuisance to a dwelling house the injunction will be made mandatory if the circumstances of the case require it (Id. § 792).

It has been held that a bill to enjoin the erection of a nuisance in close proximity to plaintiff's buildings, which contains allegations of irreparable injury to complainant, is not demurrable, because it fails to show that the rights of the parties have been settled at law. Id. § 791. This court said in Learned v. Castle, 78 Cal. 454, 18 Pac. 872, 21 Pac. 11, that the right to an injunction in a case like the present one "does not depend upon the extent of the damage measured by a money standard; the maxim de minimis, etc., does not apply. The main object is to declare a nuisance and to prevent the continuance by a mandatory injunction."

The court found that the waters, diverted upon plaintiff's land by the dam erected by defendant, would not flow there if allowed to take their natural course. To thus wrongfully cause water to flow upon another's land which would not flow there naturally is to create a nuisance per se. "It is an injury to the right, and it cannot be continued because other persons (whether jurors or not) might have a low estimate of the damage which it causes." Id. Mr. Wood says: "Every such act is an invasion of another's right, and is actionable because of the injury to the right, whether the damage be great or small. Indeed, the act is wrongful per se and in its inception, and is actionable without any special damage." Wood on Nuisance, § 376. See, also, section 782. An obvious distinction between "injury" and "damage," not always observed in dealing with the question before us, is clearly pointed out by Mr. Wood. Id. § 783. Speaking of a man's right of dominion over his property, and the jealous care with which courts have guarded this sacred right, the author says: "Whatever invades this right is a legal injury, whether damage ensues or not. It is a right, for the violation of which the law 'imports damage to support it,' and courts of equity have always interposed, in a proper case, to protect the right, without any reference to the question of actual damage, the motive which instigated the party to invoke its aid, or the benefits that he derives from the act." Id. (Italics the author's.)

The principles upon which mandatory and prohibitory injunctions are granted do not materially differ. The courts are perhaps more reluctant to interpose the mandatory writ, but in a proper case it is never denied. It was said in Johnson v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 567, 4 Pac. 575: "The jurisdiction of the court to grant a preliminary injunction, restraining the defendant from interfering with the flow of water pending the litigation, cannot be doubted, and we cannot see that its jurisdiction is exceeded when it requires the removal of the means by which the diversion is made. The ultimate aim of the injunction is the undisturbed flow of the water. The objections to the removal of the means by which the diversion is made are no more cogent than the objections to preventing the diversion of the water itself." As the court has jurisdiction, the only question is, has it properly exercised its jurisdiction? We need not pursue the subject further. On the showing made in the bill of exceptions it clearly appears that "the construction of said dams (by defendants) would and did arrest and divert water, and cause the same to flow upon the lands of plaintiff as last above found, which would not naturally flow through in times of flood and high water"; and by the finding of the court, presumably on sufficient evidence, the effect of these dams in so diverting the water would be to "destroy a great number of his (plaintiff's) trees growing upon said lands, and would excavate deep gulches and water courses diagonally through plaintiff's land," rendering a considerable portion of it and the orchards thereon useless, and cause plaintiff and the said land irreparable injury. This was quite sufficient, in our opinion, to warrant the court in granting the relief given by the judgment. Rudel v. Los Angeles County, 118 Cal. 281, 50 Pac. 400.

The second point may be briefly disposed of. Whatever was the effect on plaintiff's land from any defective construction of the railroad company's roadway, or locations of its culverts, defendants cannot justify or defend their acts on the ground that they were endeavoring to obviate the mistakes of the railroad company and failed. Conceding their right to go on their own land for this purpose, the fact remains, as found by the court, that it was defendants' dams that were the cause of the injury. The dams did not merely reinstate natural conditions; they created new conditions. What the court stated it would have held had the facts been otherwise is immaterial, and presents no question now for review.

We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

SHEA et al. v. PACIFIC POWER CO. (S. F. 3,058.)*

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE MACHINERY—BOILERS—EXPLOSION—DEATH OF FIREMAN—NEGLIGENCE OF ENGINEER—VICE PRINCIPAL—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS.

1. In an action for the death of a fireman by the blowing off of the mud drum of defendant's boiler, evidence held to sustain a finding of defendant's negligence in failing to apply a bursting test to the boiler, which had been in use for some four years at the time of the accident, after the nipple connecting the mud drum to the boiler had been repaired.

2. The negligence of defendant's engineer in charge of its engine and boiler in failing to see that it was in a safe condition, by reason of which a fireman in defendant's employ was killed by the bursting of the boiler, was the negligence of the defendant.

3. The owner of an engine and boiler is not absolved from liability for injuries to a servant, caused by the bursting of the boiler while in use, merely because he had procured an independent contractor to repair it.

4. In an action for the death of a servant by the explosion of a boiler, evidence as to the condition of the packing rings, and their efficiency to prevent oil from getting into the boiler, a year or two before the accident, coupled with the declaration on plaintiff's part that it would be shown that the condition continued to the time of the accident, was admissible.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Hugh L. Shea and others against the Pacific Power Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Van Ness & Redman, for appellant. Mullany, Grant & Cushing, for respondents.

GRAY, C. This action is brought by the heirs of John H. Shea to recover damages for his death; he having been scalded to death while in the employ of defendant as a fireman, as the result of the blowing off of the mud drum from defendant's boiler. The plaintiffs had a verdict for $25,000. Rather than have a new trial of the case, plaintiffs consented that the judgment should be for $10,000 only. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying it a new trial.

The main contention of appellant is that there is no evidence that the blowing off of the mud drum was in any way the result of defendant's negligence, and hence nothing to show that the death of Shea was caused by the negligence of defendant. It is argued that the parting of the mud drum from the boiler was occasioned altogether by a structural weakness in the latter, and that it was caused by the failure on the part of the constructor of the boiler to properly bell or expand the nipple which connected the mud drum with the headers of the boiler tubes. It would serve no useful purpose to here recite the evidence. It is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, there was some substantial evidence tending to support the theory that the excessive amount of oil that was allowed to enter the boiler, and accumulate there from month to month, in some way weakened the holding power of the nipple, and caused it to pull out of the mud drum. The evidence also tended to show that allowing so much oil to enter the boiler might have been avoided by proper care, and that its presence in such large quantities was evidence of a want of ordinary care in handling the engine and boiler. Aside from this, it also appears that the boiler had been in use for some four years at the time of the accident. When it was first set up, a 300-pound pressure hydrostatic test was applied to it; otherwise called the "bursting test." A few weeks before the accident it had been discovered that the boiler needed repairing. One of the nipples was leaking—apparently the one that subsequently pulled off. The repairs were made; consisting, among other things, in expanding the end of the nipple which was inserted in the mud drum. Subsequent to these repairs the bursting test was not applied to the boiler. Two certain witnesses testified that it was not usual or customary to apply this test, but that the test for leaks at a pressure of about 200 pounds to the square inch was the customary one. Smith, the engineer in charge of the engine and boiler, on the contrary, testified, in substance, that the bursting test should have been applied, but that he applied only the leaking test after the repairs. A short time thereafter the mud drum blew off, when the boiler was being worked at no greater pressure than 200 pounds to the square inch. It is apparent that, if the bursting test of 300 pounds had been applied after the repairs, the mud drum would have thereby been blown off, revealing the defective holding power of the nipple, and Shea would not have lost his life in the subsequent explosion. The jury was not bound to take the statement of the two witnesses that the bursting test was not usual or customary, as against the one witness, corroborated by the circumstances showing that it had been treated as the usual and proper test of this very boiler. We do not feel warranted in holding that, as a matter of law, the evidence and circumstances developed in this case established that it was not necessary or customary to apply the bursting test. The negligence of the engineer of defendant who ran the engine, in failing to see that it was kept in a safe condition, was the negligence of the defendant. Tedford v. Los Angeles Electric Co., 134 Cal. 76, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85. We think the jury were warranted in finding, as we have a right to infer they did find, that the engineer whose duty it was to look after the engine and boiler was negligent in not seeing to it that the bursting test was either applied by himself, or some other person, after the repairs were completed. If it was necessary to apply this test after the boiler had been originally set up and the mud drum had been coupled to it, it was equally necessary to apply the same test after the repairs were made as disclosed by the evidence.

It is not, and never has been, the law in this state that the owner of an engine and boiler is absolved from all liability on account of the bursting of the boiler while in his use, simply by procuring an "independent contractor" to repair it. It is plain that, in addition to this, he must use reasonable diligence to see that it is kept in repair. Whether he has used reasonable diligence is almost always a question of fact for the jury. And it was for the jury, aided by the trial judge, to measure the evidence, not only as to what witnesses testified to directly, but as to the circumstances developed, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom, and the conclusions of fact to be reached, and thus solve the ultimate question as to whether the death of Shea was the direct and proximate result of the want of ordinary care on the part of defendant's engineer. Pacheco v. Judson Manufacturing Co., 113 Cal. 541, 45 Pac. 833. We see no ground for interfering with the decision of the court and jury as to the facts in the case. Nor do we find any material error of law in any action of the trial court.

The evidence as to the condition of the packing rings, and their efficiency for preventing the oil from getting into the boiler, a year or two before the accident, was coupled with a declaration on the part of respondent that it would be shown that this condition of things continued down to the time of the accident. In view of this declaration, there was no error in overruling the objection to the evidence.

Some other objections are urged to the rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence, but the evidence excluded or admitted was not of sufficient importance to affect the result in the case, and for this reason we deem it unnecessary to separately discuss each one of these objections.

We see no error of the court in giving or refusing instructions. Indeed, the appellant fails to specifically point out any error in this direction.

We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

SAN FRANCISCO SAV. UNION v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 124. (Sac. 1,010.)

SWAMP LANDS — RECLAMATION — DISTRICTS — QUASI PUBLIC CORPORATIONS—RIGHT TO SUE — STATUTES — CONSTRUCTION—PROSPECTIVE OPERATION—DEBTS — MANDAMUS — LIMITATIONS—EXECUTION.

1. A reclamation district organized as provided by St. 1867–68, p. 515, c. 415, § 30 et seq., cannot be sued except as authorized by law.

2. Act March 10, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 77, c. 102), provides that all reclamation districts now legally existing formed under the provisions of any statute of the state prior to January 1, 1873, which are now, and have been ever since their creation, prosecuting the objects for which they were created, shall be subject to the provisions of the Political Code, etc. Held, that where a complaint in an action against a reclamation district organized as provided by St. 1867–68, p. 515, c. 415, § 30 et seq., did not allege that at the time of the passage of the act of 1885 it was prosecuting the objects for which it was created, and that it had been so doing ever since its creation, it did not show that such district was within the act of 1885, so that authority to sue the same was conferred by such act.

3. St. 1885, p. 77, c. 102, in force March 10, 1885, authorizing certain reclamation districts to be sued, provides that nothing in the act shall affect any proceedings that shall have been already commenced for the levy or collection of assessments in such districts when the act takes effect, nor shall it affect any act done or performed in relation to the affairs of the district prior to January 1, 1873, nor the indebtedness of the district theretofore incurred. Held, that such act did not render such reclamation districts subject to the provisions of the Political Code as to suits for debts existing on March 10, 1885, nor change the sole pre-existing remedy of mandamus for the enforcement thereof.

4. St. 1885, p. 77, c. 102, providing that certain existing reclamation districts shall be subject to the provisions of the Political Code providing that nothing in the act shall affect any proceeding that shall have been already commenced for the levy and collection of assessments in such district when the act takes effect, nor shall it affect any act done or performed in relation to the affairs of the district prior to January 1, 1873, nor the indebtedness of the district theretofore incurred, was prospective in its operation only, and did not revive rights of action against a district barred by limitations when the amendment was enacted.

5. Where claims against a reclamation district organized under St. 1867–68, p. 515, c. 415, § 30 et seq., were allowed by the trustees, and warrants were drawn, payment of which was refused for want of funds, the creditor was entitled at once to bring mandamus either against the county treasurer to compel payment, if there were funds available, or against the trustees and supervisors to compel an assessment to raise funds if there were none, and hence limitations at once began to run, and barred the creditor's right thereto at the expiration of five years thereafter.

6. Since a reclamation district has no right to acquire property except to carry on the work of reclamation and matters incidental thereto, property devoted to such use is not subject to levy to satisfy judgments against the district.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Jno. F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Savings Union against Reclamation District No. 124. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Campbell, Donald Y. Campbell, and Campbell, Fitzgerald, Abbott & Fowler, for appellant. E. A. Bridgford, J. F. Bowie, Sullivan & Sullivan, Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler, and Hudson Grant, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action to recover money due the plaintiff on warrants drawn by order of the board of trustees of the defendant on the county treasurer, approved by the board of supervisors, presented for payment, and not paid for want of funds. The complaint consists of 89 distinct counts upon a like number of warrants, amounting in the aggregate to $18,169.63. The defendant's demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment entered accordingly. The only ground of demurrer necessary to mention here is the general one that neither the complaint as a whole nor any count thereof states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The reclamation district was organized in 1871, under the act of March 28, 1868. St. 1867–68, p. 515, c. 415, § 30 et seq. The contention of the appellant is that the defendant is not a corporation, but a "public agency," as it has been termed, charged with the local administration of some of the functions of state government, and that as such it was not subject to an action until the passage of the amendment of 1899 to section 3453 of the Political Code, declaring that "from and after the election and qualification of said trustees said district shall be deemed organized, and shall have power to sue and be sued"; that, as it could not be sued, the statute of limitations could not run against the cause of action until an action was authorized; and that this action was begun within the time limited and after the amendment aforesaid.

There is considerable discussion in the briefs upon the question whether a reclamation district is or is not a corporation. We do not think it necessary to decide this question. If it is a corporation, it is necessarily a quasi public corporation, similar to a county or school district, and therefore it could not be sued until such time as an action against it was authorized by law. People v. Reclamation District, 117 Cal. 114, 48 Pac. 1016; Whittaker v. County of Tuolumne, 96 Cal. 100, 30 Pac. 1016; Skelly v. School District, 103 Cal. 652, 37 Pac. 643; Colusa County v. Glenn County, 117 Cal. 434, 49 Pac. 457; Gilman v. County of Contra Costa, 8 Cal. 57, 68 Am. Dec. 290. The same rule would apply if it should be declared to be a public agency of the state. Hensley v. Reclamation District, 121 Cal. 96, 53 Pac. 401.

In the petitions for rehearing and upon the reargument a question was presented which was not urged upon the first hearing, and which we think is fatal to all the causes of action stated in the complaint. In Reclamation District v. Kennedy, 58 Cal. 124, this court decided that the Political Code did not apply to districts organized under prior statutes. Under the decision in Swamp Land District No. 121 v. Haggin, 64 Cal. 209, 30 Pac. 631, a reclamation district formed under the act of March 26, 1868, could not reorganize under the Political Code. It was held in that case that section 3478, allowing districts formed under laws in force prior to May 27, 1868, to reorganize under the Code, did not apply to districts formed under the act of 1868, and that the Code provisions did not, of their own force, apply to such districts. This decision was rendered in September, 1883. In 1885, which was the next ensuing regular session of the Legislature after that decision, a law was enacted declaring that certain districts should be subject to the provisions of the Political Code, and it is by virtue of this statute only that the appellant can claim that section 3453 of the Code applies to the defendant. The act took effect March 10, 1885, and is as follows: "All reclamation districts, now legally existing in the state, which were formed under the provisions of any statute of the state prior to the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-three, which are now, and have been ever since their creation, prosecuting the objects for which they were created, shall, after this act takes effect, be subject to the provisions of the Political Code of the state relating to reclamation districts for reclamation purposes, the same as though such districts had been formed and created under the provisions of article two of said Code, relating to 'swamp and overflowed, salt, marsh, and tide lands': provided, that nothing in this act shall affect any proceeding that shall have been already commenced for the levy or collection of assessments in such districts when this act takes effect; nor shall it affect any act done or performed in relation to the affairs of the districts prior to said last mentioned date, nor the indebtedness of the districts theretofore incurred." St. 1885, p. 77, c. 102. We are of the opinion that under the facts stated in the complaint the defendant district does not come within the scope of this act. The act, by its terms, applies only to reclamation districts which at the time the act was passed were, and ever since they were formed had been, "prosecuting the objects for which they were created." The presence of this express limitation in the statute raises the necessary implication that there were, at the time the act was passed, some reclamation districts in existence formed prior to January 1, 1873, which were not then, or had not been since their formation, prosecuting the objects for which they were created, and that this qualification was inserted in the act to carry out the legislative intention to exclude these districts from the operation of the act. The effect of the clause is that districts of that class are not subject to the provisions of the Political Code, and that the amendment of 1899 to section 3453 does not authorize the maintenance of an action against them. It is the general rule that actions cannot be maintained against such organizations. The right to maintain such an action is an exception, existing only when the right is expressly or by necessary implication authorized by law. Hence the rule of pleading applies to this case that a party who would bring himself within an exception to a general rule or condition must state the facts which take his case out of the general rule and place it within the exception. The rule is well stated in Clough v. Shepherd, 31 N. H. 494, as follows: "Where any qualification or exception is stated in the enacting clause of a statute, the declaration or plea founded upon it must allege the facts which are necessary to bring the case within the qualification or to exclude it from the exception." Or, as stated in Gould on Pleading, c. 4, §§ 19, 20: "Where matter is introduced by way of exception into a general clause, the pleader must show that the particular case does not fall within such exception." The following authorities are to the same effect: McGlone v. Prosser, 21 Wis. 273; Gould v. Kelly, 16 N. H. 562; Harris v. White, 81 N. Y. 546; Commonwealth v. Hart. 11 Cush. 135; People v. Board, 40 Barb. 626; Baptist Church v. Utica, etc., Ry. Co., 6 Barb. 313; U. S. v. Cook, 17 Wall. 168, 21 L. Ed. 538; Steele v. Smith, 1 Barn. & Ald. 99; Jones v. Axen, 1 Ld. Raym. 120; Stephen, Pl. 443; Bliss, Code Pl. § 202. In order to state a cause of action, the complaint must show that the defendant is subject to an action, and to do this it is necessary in this case to state that at the time of the passage of the act of 1885 the defendant was prosecuting the objects for which it was created, and that it had been so doing ever since its creation. The object of its creation was the reclamation of land, and keeping in repair the works necessary for that purpose. The complaint contains no averment to the effect that any such work had been or was being prosecuted, and for that reason it fails to state a cause of action against the defendant.

There is another clause of the act which affects the first 77 counts of the complaint, all of which relate to warrants drawn prior to its passage. The act provides that nothing therein contained shall affect "the indebtedness of the districts theretofore incurred." The effect of this provision is that, although the districts embraced in the act were thereafter subject, generally, and as to future proceedings, to the provisions of the Political Code relating to reclamation districts, the same as if originally organized thereunder, yet with respect to the debts then existing they were not subject to the Code, or, in other words, that the provisions of the Code should not in any respect apply to existing debts. We think this limitation upon the operation of the Code upon these districts must be held to apply to future amendments of the Code as well as to the provisions in force when the act of 1885 was passed. In effect, it is the same as if the law had declared that such districts, with relation to debts then existing, should remain subject to and be governed by the act of 1868, under which it was organized. Under the act of 1868 the only means available to a creditor of the district for the collection of his debt was by mandamus to compel the trustees to levy an assessment to raise the funds necessary for that purpose, or to compel the county treasurer to pay any warrants presented while there were funds applicable to its payment. A new law giving a new remedy to the creditor, a right to obtain payment by an ordinary action against the district on the debt, would clearly be a law affecting the debt. The act declares that, although the district shall be subject to the Code in general, yet that it shall not be subject to that Code so as to affect any pre-existing debt. Consequently, when the Code was amended so as to give a new remedy for the collection of the debts due from districts subject to its provisions, the effect of this limitation in the act was that this new remedy could not apply to debts of this district incurred prior to March 10, 1885, the reason being that this district, so far as those debts were concerned, was not subject to the Code. It follows that the amendment of 1899 to section 3453 does not authorize an action against this district to recover a debt incurred before March 10, 1885. The demurrer to the first 77 counts of the complaint was, therefore, properly sustained on this ground.

A more comprehensive objection to the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action is that the amendment of 1899 to section 3453 of the Political Code is not retroactive in operation so as to apply to the claims of the plaintiff. The general rule is that statutes should not be so construed as to give them a retroactive operation, unless it is clearly apparent that such was the intention; that, if there is nothing in the terms of the act to indicate a different construction, it should be given only a prospective operation. Gates v. Salmon, 28 Cal. 320; People ex rel. Thorne v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 127; Allen v. Allen, 95 Cal. 184, 30 Pac. 213, 16 L. R. A. 646. A statute general in its terms will not be construed to apply to a particular class of past transactions as to which it would be futile or practically ineffectual, unless the language necessarily requires such a construction. There is nothing in the language of the amendment, nor in the context, evincing an intention to make the amendment applicable so as to revive rights of action which had been barred by the statute of limitations at the time the amendment was enacted. The preceding part of the section provides for the election of trustees of the districts, and prescribes some of their duties. The amendment consists simply of an addition to the effect that after the election and qualification of the trustees the "district shall be deemed organized, and shall have power to sue and be sued." Taken in connection with the context, this would seem to be intended to have a prospective operation only. When considered in connection with the nature of the transactions to which it is here sought to make it applicable, it will be seen that the amendment would be absolutely ineffectual, unless it is given an exceedingly unnatural and strained construction. There does not appear to have ever been any dispute between the holders of the claims in question and the officers of the district concerning the validity of the claims, and there was no necessity for legislation to establish them. They were all allowed without objection, and warrants therefor drawn upon the county treasurer. The difficulty has not been in obtaining an allowance or recognition of the claims, but it has arisen entirely from the failure of the trustees to provide funds with which to pay the same. The claims accrued during the period from 1872 to 1887. They were all allowed, warrants drawn, payment refused for want of funds, and all existing remedies to compel payment barred by the statute of limitations, many years prior to the enactment of the amendment. If the amendment is construed to give the right to maintain an ordinary action at law upon these allowed claims, it will still be of no benefit whatever to the plaintiff. Its right to a mandate, either against the county treasurer to compel payment if there were in fact available funds, or against the trustees and supervisors to compel an assessment to raise funds if in fact there were none, became complete and perfect upon the original refusal to pay the claims. The statute of limitations at once began to run against this right, and became barred within five years thereafter, if not sooner. Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 48 Pac. 804, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153. A judgment against the defendant in an action upon these claims would be of no direct benefit to the plaintiff, and would set him no further on the road to recovery of his money than he was at the time the claims were originally allowed. The judgment could not be collected on execution. The district has, and under ordinary circumstances could have, no property subject to execution. Hensley v. District, 121 Cal. 96, 53 Pac. 401. It has no right to acquire property except for the purpose of carrying on the work of reclamation and matters incidental thereto. Property devoted to that sort of public use, and belonging to a public corporation or public agency, cannot be levied on and sold to satisfy judgments against such corporation or agency. The only means by which the plaintiff could obtain payment of such a judgment would be by resort to the remedy which he had in the first instance; that is to say, a suit in mandamus to compel the levying of an assessment whereby money could be raised with which to pay the same. But this remedy, as we have seen, has been long since barred. It would be an impossible construction of the amendment of 1899 to hold that it not only gives the right to maintain an action against the district upon these stale claims, but also revives the right to maintain the suit for a writ of mandate to compel an assessment, which had been previously barred by the statute of limitations. Such a construction could never be based upon implication merely, but would require express and distinct words to that effect. It must be admitted that, if the Legislature had intended such results, it would have expressed its meaning in terms fitly appropriate to describe a proposition so remarkable and unusual. Moreover, such construction would undoubtedly be productive of injustice and oppression. For many years these claims had been considered as outlawed. The owners of land within the district have no doubt considered their property free from any liability on account of the burden of these debts. During this period numerous transactions must have been made upon the belief that no such burden existed. There is nothing to indicate that the Legislature intended to re-establish this burden, and thus disturb long-settled conditions. The natural interpretation of the amendment, so far as it is retroactive at all, is that it was intended to give a right of action against the district upon unliquidated or disputed claims not barred by the statute of limitations, whereby the indebtedness of the district could be settled. In view of these considerations, we have no doubt that the power to sue and be sued given and imposed by this amendment was not intended to apply to causes of action against the districts, which were already barred by the statute of limitations at the time the amendment was passed, and, consequently, that it has no application whatever to the claims here sued on.

PEOPLE v. GALLANAR. (Cr. 1,198.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—PROBABLE CAUSE—CERTIFICATE—ALLOWANCE—REFUSAL—APPLICATION TO SUPREME COURT—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—STAY—TIME.

1. A certificate of probable cause for appeal, required by Pen. Code, § 1243, should be granted by the trial judge whenever there is room for an honest difference of opinion as to the existence of any prejudicial error in the proceedings leading to the conviction, regardless of his own opinion that the record is free from error, and unless the appeal is clearly frivolous.

2. Where a judge trying a criminal case refuses a certificate of probable cause for appeal, defendant was entitled to renew his application for such certificate before a justice of the Supreme Court.

3. Since an application for a certificate of probable cause for a criminal appeal made to a justice of the Supreme Court can be made only on the bill of exceptions duly settled, of which application notice must be given to the district attorney, defendant is entitled to a stay of execution during the time allowed by law for preparing such bill of exceptions, and for such further time as may be necessary for its settlement by the exercise of proper diligence, and for a reasonable time thereafter.

In Bank. George W. Gallanar was convicted of manslaughter, and he applies for a stay of execution pending an application for a certificate of probable cause for appeal. Granted.

C. F. Kimball and Shanahan & Braynard, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of manslaughter, and has appealed to this court. The trial judge refused a certificate of probable cause, and refuses to stay execution of the sentence until an application for such certificate can be made here. A criminal appeal, except in capital cases, does not stay execution unless a certificate is filed by the trial judge or a justice of the Supreme Court that in his opinion there is probable cause for the appeal. Pen. Code, § 1243. When there is probable cause the defendant is clearly entitled to the certificate as matter of right, and there is probable cause whenever there is room for an honest difference of opinion as to the existence of any prejudicial error in the proceedings leading to the conviction. In all such cases it is the duty of the trial judge to grant the certificate, notwithstanding his own opinion that the record is free from error. Matter of Adams, 81 Cal. 163, 22 Pac. 547. The defendant, in other words, is entitled to a stay of execution where his appeal is not clearly frivolous. But although the duty of granting the certificate devolves primarily upon the trial judge, his refusal to grant it does not conclude the matter. The defendant has a clear legal right to renew his application before a justice of this court, and his right to make the application here includes the right to a stay of execution until he can, exercising proper diligence, procure the settlement of a bill of exceptions; such record being the essential basis of any action by any other judge than the trial judge. Here the trial judge refused any stay of execution beyond the time for proposing a bill by the defendant. Defendant has filed a proposed bill within the time allowed for that purpose, but it has not been settled, and, as matters now stand, the stay of proceedings granted by the trial judge having expired, it has become the duty of the sheriff to transport the prisoner to the state prison before he could possibly have the hearing before a justice of this court to which he is clearly entitled. To prevent this injustice, and to secure the defendant in his right to a stay of execution pending his appeal, if in the opinion of a justice of this court there is probable cause, as above defined, it is obviously necessary that there should be a further stay until a reasonable time has elapsed after settlement of the bill of exceptions, for without that record we can have no means of determining whether there is probable cause or not. In a case in all substantial respects the same as this, it was said by Beatty, C. J., that: "It was the plain duty of the superior court to stay the proceedings during the time allowed by law for preparing the bill of exceptions, and for such further time as might be necessary for its settlement, provided the defendant exercised proper diligence in its preparation." People v. Lane, 96 Cal. 597, 31 Pac. 580. We approve this statement, and would say in addition that since the defendant is required to give notice to the district attorney of his application here for a certificate of probable cause, the stay, if demanded, should be extended to a reasonable time after the bill has been duly certified.

In this case, in default of a proper order by the trial judge, we have made the order ourselves.

BANK OF WOODLAND v. STEPHENS et al.

(Sac. 1,089.)

MORTGAGES — HOMESTEAD — EXEMPTION—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE—FAILURE TO FILE—EFFECT.

1. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, providing that, in foreclosure, a receiver may be appointed where the mortgaged property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, the court has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in foreclosure of a mortgage providing that, on the filing of a complaint to foreclose, the plaintiff should be entitled to a receiver, in the absence of an allegation that the property was probably insufficient to pay the debt, interest, and costs.

2. Where community property mortgaged was duly selected as the homestead of the mortgagors, and, in the settlement of the husband's estate, proceedings were taken, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1476–1486, whereby 100 acres of the mortgaged property was set apart to the widow as a homestead, and the balance was freed from its homestead character, the fact that the mortgagee failed to prove the mortgage as a claim against the husband's estate did not deprive him of his right to foreclose the same, as against the property found in such probate proceedings not subject to homestead.

On Rehearing.

3. An allegation in a complaint to foreclose a mortgage that the mortgaged premises are insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, without an allegation as to the value of the property, etc., constitutes a mere conclusion of the pleader, and is insufficient to authorize the appointment of a receiver.

Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; E. E. Gaddis, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Woodland against J. J. Stephens, as administrator of the estate of M. R. York, deceased, and another. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant Stephens appeals. Modified.

See 70 Pac. 293.

R. Clark, for appellant. Wm. M. Sims and Reiver & Sims, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by J. J. Stephens, as administrator of the estate of M. R. York, deceased, from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage executed by M. R. York and Susan F. York in their lifetime. The case is presented upon the judgment roll alone.

1. The mortgage contains a covenant that, upon the filing of a complaint to foreclose the same, the plaintiff would be entitled to have a receiver appointed to take possession of and lease the premises, collect the rents, and hold the same as security for the debt secured. The complaint in the action avers this covenant, but contains no showing that the property is insufficient to pay the debt. Upon this complaint an application was made to the court for a receiver, which was granted, and a receiver appointed, who took charge of the property accordingly. The decree appealed from provides that the receiver theretofore appointed should continue to act as receiver, and receive from the tenant in possession the rents and profits until a sale and redemption, and hold the same as security for the debt. The appellant objects to this portion of the decree upon the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction, under the facts of the complaint, to appoint a receiver, and therefore that it had no power to continue him in office after the making of the final decree. This contention must be sustained. In the cases of Scott v. Hotchkiss, 115 Cal. 94, 47 Pac. 45, and Baker v. Varney, 129 Cal. 565, 62 Pac. 100, 79 Am. St. Rep. 140, it was decided by this court that jurisdiction to appoint a receiver could not be conferred by a stipulation of the character here in issue, and that, notwithstanding the stipulation, the party who desired a receiver must state facts sufficient to show that the premises mortgaged are probably insufficient to pay the mortgage debt, with interest and costs, as provided in section 564, Code Civ. Proc. Upon the authority of those cases, which we fully approve, we hold that the part of the decree referred to is erroneous.

2. The mortgagors were husband and wife, and the property described in the mortgage was community property. Prior to the execution of the mortgage, the property was duly selected as a homestead by the mortgagors. Upon the death of M. R. York, the husband, an administrator was duly appointed, and thereafter an inventory was returned in the estate, showing that the homestead property was of the value of $15,000. Upon the return of the inventory, proceedings were taken, under sections 1476 to 1486, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereby the said homestead premises were admeasured, and a portion thereof, consisting of 100 acres, was set apart to Susan F. York, as the widow of said M. R. York, as a homestead, leaving the remaining 220 acres of the mortgaged premises, from that time forward, free from the homestead character. The mortgagee did not at any time present his mortgage debt as a claim to the administrator of the estate of M. R. York for allowance. The court found these facts, and gave a decree refusing a foreclosure as to the 100 acres set off as a homestead, but decreeing foreclosure upon the remaining part of the premises.

Upon these facts the appellant contends that the decree is erroneous, upon the ground that the entire property, at the death of the deceased, was a homestead, and that the mortgage cannot be enforced unless a claim therefor had been duly presented to the administrator for allowance. The general proposition that a mortgage upon the homestead cannot be enforced, unless a claim therefor had been duly presented to the administrator, has been settled ever since the case of Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20. See, also, Wise v. Williams, 72 Cal. 547, 14 Pac. 204; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 11, 21 Pac. 375;

Building Ass'n v. King, 83 Cal. 442, 23 Pac. 376; Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 57, 24 Pac. 606; Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 612, 24 Pac. 779; Perkins v. Onyett, 86 Cal. 350, 24 Pac. 1024. But we are of the opinion that this rule applies exclusively to the property described in the mortgage, which is impressed with the character of the homestead. At an early date in this state it was held that the homestead character applied only to so much of the property as did not exceed $5,000 in value. In Gregg v. Bostwick, 33 Cal. 228, 91 Am. Dec. 637, the court say: "If what is actually used as a homestead is of greater value than five thousand dollars, the excess is not a homestead, under the statute, though so in fact." In Estate of Delaney, 37 Cal. 180, the court says: "At its inception it is limited to five thousand dollars in value, and, when the property is enhanced in value so that it exceeds the statutory limit, the excess does not constitute a part of the statutory homestead. After the premises are worth five thousand dollars, every increase in value works a reduction in the area of the homestead." In the latter case the court held that under section 121 of the probate act, as amended in 1868 (St. 1867–68, p. 172, c. 192), which required the court to set off to the survivor the homestead selected under the general homestead law, but did not contain any provision for determining the area of the homestead, where the selected premises exceeded $5,000 in value, it was the duty of the court, nevertheless, to ascertain the amount of land necessary to make up the value of the exemption, and set off that amount alone as the homestead. It is the homestead only which is exempt from execution and forced sale. With regard to sales on execution during the lifetime of the homestead claimants, the process by which the excess can be reached by the creditor is prescribed by the Civil Code (sections 1245 to 1259, inclusive). Where, upon the death of the homestead claimant, the inventory shows that the premises claimed exceeded $5,000 in value, the method of determining what part is homestead and what part is subject to the debts of the deceased is prescribed by sections 1476 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, which sections were followed in this case. The effect of this procedure was that the portion not set off to the widow was then ascertained to be no part of the homestead, and it thereupon became subject to all debts of the deceased, including the mortgage in question. The rule which requires a mortgage upon the homestead to be presented to the administrator as a claim is based upon the provisions of section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is limited to cases in which the homestead does not exceed $5,000 in value, or in which the mortgagee seeks to proceed in foreclosure of his mortgage against the property which is eventually set off as a homestead, where the premises described in the homestead declaration exceed $5,000. It does not apply at all to a probate homestead. McGahey v. Forrest, 109 Cal. 68, 41 Pac. 817. The purpose of the provision, as stated in the leading case on the subject (Camp v. Grider, supra), is to preserve the homestead to the parties entitled thereto, if possible. It was not intended to have any application whatever to lands which, by the proceedings prescribed in that chapter of the Code, were eventually determined not to be a homestead, and there is no reason why it should be construed to apply to such land. We are of the opinion that it was not necessary for the mortgagee in this case to present his claim to the administrator, as a condition precedent to his right to foreclose the mortgage on the excess.

For the reasons herein stated, it is ordered that the decree be modified by striking therefrom the provisions relating to the continuance of the receiver in his office subsequent to the final decree, and that, as so modified, the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.

On Rehearing.

In Bank.

Hudson Grant, Arthur C. Huston, Harry L. Huston, and North & Lovejoy (H. G. W. Dinkelspiel, of counsel), for appellant. N. A. Hawkins and Phil Bruton, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Upon a further consideration of this case we adhere to the opinion heretofore rendered in department 1. It is proper to state further that there is an allegation in the complaint that "the mortgaged premises are insufficient to pay and discharge the mortgage debt," and the court finds that this allegation is true. On the authority of Scott v. Hotchkiss, 115 Cal. 94, 47 Pac. 45, it is claimed that this is a sufficient statement to uphold the part of the decree continuing the receivership. An inspection of the transcript in that case shows that there was in the complaint there under consideration a similar allegation. The entire discussion of the point in the opinion is as follows: "No stipulation can confer jurisdiction upon the court to appoint a receiver in a case where the court has no such authority given by law. It is not necessary to decide the matter in this case, however, because there is an averment that the security is insufficient." It is obvious that the subject of the sufficiency of such an averment as an allegation of fact was not fully considered in that case. Such a statement is no more than a conclusion. It is no better than the statement, sometimes contained in a complaint for an injunction, that, if the acts threatened are committed, "the plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury, which cannot be compensated in damages." This is always held insufficient to authorize or support an injunction. The same rule should be applied here. The appointment of a receiver involves the taking of the defendant's property from his possession—a measure more violent and drastic than an injunction. It should never be allowed in cases of mortgage foreclosure except upon a statement of facts showing that the actual value of the mortgaged premises is less than the debt secured, with interest and costs, and that resort to the rents and profits is necessary.

Subdivision 2, § 564, Code Civ. Proc., states the various conclusions which must be made by the court before it can appoint a receiver in foreclosure suits. The complaint or affidavit on which the application for a receiver is based must state facts which support one or more of these conclusions. It is not enough to state the conclusions alone. The value must be alleged. A mere averment that its value is insufficient, or that the premises are insufficient, will not do. Allegations of this character may be sufficient to uphold an order where the attack is collateral, but this cannot be allowed where, as in this case, there is a direct attack upon appeal. We do not think Scott v. Hotchkiss, supra, should be considered as holding such an allegation sufficient in form.

It is ordered that the decree be modified by striking out the part thereof relating to the continuance of the receiver in his office after the final decree, and that, as so modified, the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; ANGELLOTTI, J.; VAN DYKE, J.; McFARLAND, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. The allegation of insufficient value in Scott v. Hotchkiss was less precise and less positive than the allegation in this complaint, yet it was held sufficient in form and in substance to warrant the appointment of a receiver. That decision made a precedent which this plaintiff has followed, and it ought to protect him.

SADDLEMIRE et al. v. STOCKTON SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. (Sac. 1,247.)*

QUIETING TITLE — HOMESTEAD — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY—STATUTES—HUSBAND AND WIFE—WAIVER—DISMISSAL.

1. In a complaint by plaintiffs, as children and heirs at law of a deceased owner of real estate, to quiet title in plaintiffs thereto, the property was described as occupied by deceased and his family at the time of his death under a declaration of intent to claim the same as a homestead. It was alleged, also, that deceased left a widow surviving, in favor of whom, on her petition, the court set apart the property to the use of the family of deceased and adjudged that the property should not be subject to administration, and that the widow thereafter borrowed money from defendant and executed a deed of trust on the property to secure the loan, which deed the plaintiffs were induced to sign through fraudulent representations. The widow was not made a party. Held, that as, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, providing that, where a homestead is selected by the husband and wife during coverture and recorded, it vests on the death of either absolutely in the survivor, plaintiffs showed no right to maintain the action.

2. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, an order of court, made on the petition of the survivor after the death of a spouse who had declared a homestead conformably to the statute, setting apart the property as a homestead to the survivor, can have no effect on the title of the survivor, which vests through such selection.

3. Civ. Code, § 3513, providing that any one may waive the advantage of law intended for his benefit, has no application to show a waiver by a surviving widow of her homestead right, which vested through selection, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1474, where, on her petition to the court after the death of her husband, the same homestead was declared to be set apart to the use of the family of deceased and withdrawn from administration.

4. Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, stating the causes for which a dismissal or a judgment of nonsuit may be entered, but not expressly authorizing a dismissal for refusal of plaintiffs to amend after demurrer sustained, a judgment of dismissal is nevertheless proper, even in the absence of motion therefor, where plaintiffs were notified of the sustaining of a demurrer to their complaint and neglected for 30 days to amend their complaint.

Commissioners' Decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Birdie E. Saddlemire and others against the Stockton Savings & Loan Society. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. F. Ramage and C. H. Fairall, for appellants. Nicol & Orr, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. A demurrer to the second amended complaint for insufficiency of facts and for uncertainty was sustained, and, plaintiffs failing to amend, judgment was entered dismissing the action, and for defendant's costs. It is alleged in the complaint that D. J. Saddlemire died testate July 1, 1881, leaving Lavina, his widow, and plaintiffs, Birdie, Mary, and Frank, his children; that after due proceedings Lavina and Mary were appointed executors of the will; that the real property described in the complaint was, at the death of deceased, occupied by him and his family as a homestead (and the facts set forth in the complaint show that his declaration of intention to claim the premises as a homestead was conformable to the statute and was duly acknowledged and recorded); that on September 27, 1881, Lavina petitioned the said court "to set apart to the use of the family of said deceased [naming the widow and said plaintiffs] the real property selected as a homestead by said deceased, with the dwelling house thereon, and at the date of said petition occupied by the said family of said deceased [description follows]"; that on September 29, 1881, "the said superior court proceeded to hear said petition, * * * and duly gave and made its judgment and decree setting apart to the use of the family of said * * * deceased the above-described real property, and further ordered and adjudged that the said real property should not be subject to administration"; that ever since said date plaintiffs have been and now are the owners and in actual possession of said property (except about 10 acres sold and conveyed). This latter allegation seems to be a conclusion of law from the foregoing averments. It is then alleged that the defendants claim some interest in the property, but said claim is false and fraudulent, and is based on a certain instrument in writing of date September 23, 1901, the history of which is alleged to be as follows: On October 6, 1881, Lavina borrowed from defendant bank the sum of $2,600, and to secure the payment executed a conveyance by deed of trust of the said property, naming Shippee and West as trustees. On April 23, 1897, she executed another conveyance of the property to defendants Fred M. West and W. W. Westbay, as trustees, to secure the payment of her promissory note for $11,401.75, given to defendant bank. On the 23d of September, 1901, "in response to a request made to Lavina Saddlemire by said West, Lavina Saddlemire and Birdie Edna Saddlemire met said West at the office of defendant bank, and said West stated the object of the business was to have the mortgage renewed, and thereupon said West presented to Lavina Saddlemire for her signature, and she signed the same without reading or having read to her, an instrument in writing reciting [then follows what purports to be a deed of trust between Lavina and plaintiffs, as the parties of the first part, said West and Westbay, trustees, second parties, and defendant bank, third party, given to secure $14,468.22 borrowed by Lavina from defendant bank for which she executed her promissory note]." The remaining allegations relate to the representations alleged to have been made by said West, by means of which plaintiffs were induced to sign said deed of trust. The view we take of the case renders it unnecessary to consider these allegations. The prayer is that plaintiffs be decreed the owners in fee of said real property, and said defendants have no right or interest therein, and that they be restrained from asserting any claim thereto, and for general relief.

Unless plaintiffs had some interest in the property when the complaint was filed, they cannot maintain the action. Our conclusion is that from the allegations of the complaint it appears that at the death of her husband the property vested absolutely in Lavina as survivor, and, as she is not a party to the action, it becomes unnecessary to consider the alleged fraudulent representation made to plaintiffs. Section 1474, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor." The complaint does not state whether the property was community or separate property. But if it was community property, or the separate property of the husband, his declaration brought the homestead within the meaning of the statute, and the property vested absolutely in the surviving wife. If the land was the separate property of the wife, it was no part of the estate of the deceased husband, and the court sitting in probate had no jurisdiction over it, and could not deal with it as belonging to the estate. It does not appear when the homestead was selected, but this is immaterial, as it does appear that at the death of the declarant the statute above referred to was in force, and controls in the devolution of title. Tyrrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 474, 21 Pac. 116. It was held in Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 609, 64 Pac. 995, that the title of the widow, acquired by survivorship under section 1474, is not affected by a subsequent order of the court setting the property apart to her as a homestead—citing Sanders v. Russell, 86 Cal. 119, 24 Pac. 852, 21 Am. St. Rep. 26; In re Croghan's Estate, 92 Cal. 370, 28 Pac. 570; Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 Pac. 1011. "The effect of that order was to withdraw the property therein named from administration, and to this extent relieve the executor from the necessity of accounting therefor; but it did not qualify or affect the title that had vested in Mrs. Fath at the instant of her husband's death"—citing Rich v. Tubbs, 41 Cal. 34; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. 375; In re Ackerman, 80 Cal. 208, 22 Pac. 141, 13 Am. St. Rep. 116.

Appellants' contention is that the order setting apart the homestead was a judicial determination that no valid recorded homestead existed upon the premises on September 29, 1881, and vested the title in the minor children and the mother, and the decree cannot be collaterally attacked—citing section 1468, Code Civ. Proc.; Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 Pac. 769; Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 28 Pac. 1046; Hoppe v. Hoppe, 104 Cal. 94, 37 Pac. 894; In re Walkerly's Estate, 108 Cal. 655, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97; Estate of Hamilton, 120 Cal. 428, 52 Pac. 708; Estate of Matheny, 121 Cal. 268, 53 Pac. 800; Otto v. Long (Cal.) 77 Pac. 885; Freeman on Judgments, § 319f. Kearney v. Kearney was an action to set aside a probate homestead, which had been set apart to the widow, where there had been no homestead selected in the lifetime of the deceased. What was there said had reference exclusively to the rights of the widow under the decree, and did not involve the question as to the effect of a probate homestead, where one had previously been selected under the statute. In Sheehy v. Miles the court stated the settled law to be the same as shown in Estate of Fath, supra, and other cases. It was said, however, in the opinion of Mr. Justice Garoutte, that "the decisions are founded upon the previous determinations of the court that a valid recorded homestead upon community property is in full life at the date of such decree." Appellants assume that this justifies the conclusion that the decree of the probate court in setting apart the homestead in the present case adjudged conclusively that there was no valid selection of a homestead, and that the whole world, including, we suppose, creditors, mortgagees, and grantees of the survivor, is bound by such decree, no matter what rights may have accrued under the selected homestead. The incorrectness of this assumption is made very clear by the concurring opinion in the case. The point really decided in the Sheehy Case was that the purchaser, under his covenant of title, was not bound to accept the recorded homestead as importing a perfect title. Hoppe v. Hoppe, was a probate homestead, where no homestead had been selected in the lifetime of the husband. What was there said related only to such homestead as the court was dealing with. So, also, in Re Walkerly's Estate, and Estate of Matheny. In the recent case of Otto v. Long the action was to quiet title acquired by foreclosure sale under mortgage executed by Mary Wood, to whom the property had been set apart as a homestead. It was held that the order could not be attacked collaterally, and that the pleadings furnished no foundation for a direct attack. The question we have here was not before the court. If the order was not open to attack, its invalidity could not be urged on the ground that there had been a homestead selected in the husband's lifetime. The question as to the effect of the homestead selected prior to the husband's death did not arise.

It is suggested that Mrs. Saddlemire had a right to waive the provisions of section 1474, under the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3513, which provides that "any one may waive the advantage the law intended for his benefit." This maxim has no application to the facts here. The court was without jurisdiction to make an order affecting the title of Mrs. Saddlemire, which vested in her through the selected homestead under section 1474. The effect of the order pursuant to the petition, as we have seen, was merely to withdraw the property from administration.

It is claimed that the judgment of dismissal was unauthorized under any subdivision of section 581, Code Civ. Proc.; citing Pacific Paving Co. v. Vizelich et al., 141 Cal. 4, 74 Pac. 352. The judgment reads in part as follows: "* * * There having been no application for leave to file an amended complaint in said action, and no amended complaint having been filed therein, now, therefore, it is hereby ordered," etc. It appears that plaintiffs were notified of the ruling on the demurrer March 20, 1903, and the judgment was not entered until April 19, 1903. Plaintiffs manifestly stood upon their second amended complaint, and by neglecting, after notice of the ruling, to further amend the complaint, they in effect refused to amend, and there was nothing left for the court to do but render judgment for defendants, either dismissing the action or that plaintiffs take nothing by the action. In the case cited by the appellants, supra, the court held that the insufficiency of the complaint is not available on motion to dismiss the action, and cannot be considered upon appeal from an order granting the motion. That is not the case here. There was no motion to dismiss. An issue of law involving the sufficiency of the complaint was presented by the demurrer. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiffs refusing to amend, judgment of dismissal was proper.

It is advised that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: COOPER, C.; HARRISON, C.

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed: HENSHAW, J.; McFARLAND, J.; LORIGAN, J.

GUTTER v. DALLAMORE et al. (S. F. 3,852.)

ADMINISTRATORS — SETTLEMENT OF ESTATE — SALE OF LAND—MORTGAGE BY HEIR—EFFECT OF SALE—PROCEEDS—LIEN — FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Where the interest of an heir in land belonging to an estate in process of administration was mortgaged by him, and thereafter, in an action to foreclose the mortgage, it was answered that the land had been sold by order of the court in the administration proceedings, and purchased for a certain sum, and that the sale had been confirmed, and the court found "that the property was sold at private sale by the administrator to the defendants P.," such finding should be construed as a finding that the property was sold by the administrator under order of the court.

2. Where the interest of an heir in land belonging to an estate was mortgaged pending administration, and the land was sold under order of the court in probate proceedings, the purchaser's title related back to the time of the death of the deceased owner, and conveyed her title as it then existed, freed from the mortgage, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1555, providing that conveyances so made shall convey all the right, title, interest, and estate of the deceased in the premises at the time of his death.

3. Where an heir mortgaged his interest in certain real estate pending settlement of his ancestor's estate, and the land was sold in the administration proceedings to pay debts, the mortgagee was only entitled to a lien on the interest of the mortgagor in the surplus proceeds in the hands of the administrator.
